The Union City club finished its first year of social existence on Tuesday, February 18, and on that evening the members were entertained in the Academy parlors by Prof. and Mrs. Edwards, where the annual election was held. R. N. Brady was initiated after which impressive ceremony, officers were chosen as follows: President, Roy B. Mulkie; Vice President, John W. Cottrell; Secretary and Treasurer, LeRoy Hall; Reception Committee, Gertrude E. Church, R. N. Brady, F. W. Dillon. Installation followed and then it was decided to tender a reception to commencement visitors from Union City. A proposition from several other students to change the organization to an Erie county club was laid on the table for future action.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Mrs. Larison recently spent three days at her former home in Ringoes, New Jersey.

All who were awake at the time the Phi Gamma Delta boys gave their serenade, Monday evening, February 24, were greatly pleased by their fine singing and gentlemanly conduct.

We are glad to learn that Mrs. Nana Stephens nee Wilson, of the class of '87 has promised to write an article for the MIRROR on the Habits and Manners of the Japanese.

Very fortunate do the Senior girls consider themselves in graduating in '96, an unusually eventful year, the jubilee year of the University and the last leap year for eight years. Nor are these the only causes for tne years being memorable. One of the brightest recollections of their Senior year will be the delightful way in which they were entertained at the home of Mr. and Mrs. D. Bright Miller in honor of their son Frank.

The kind remembrance of the music Seniors by Prof. Aviragnet is truly worthy of appreciation. Professor delights in giving the girls a pleasant surprise occasionally. On Saturday, February 22, he entertained the following party at the "Haag House," Milton: Misses Aikin, Gertrude Morgan, Olivia Silvers, Elizabeth Walker and Sue Jones. The party left Lewisburg on the morning train, returning at 4 o'clock. In connection with rich treat, Professor presented each girl with a dainty little band finger ring, with her initials and '96 engraved within.

ACADEMY NEWS.

Douglass had the misfortune to lose a curtain by fire at his room in the west wing a short time ago. Otherwise his room was not damaged.

New hymn books entitled "Sermons in Songs" have been introduced in the evening devotional services, containg a choice selection of hymns appropriate for such meetings.

The members of the Third Form are busily engaged preparing for the Declamation Contest which is rapidly drawing near. The members of the class mean to make this a memorable event.

The Academy boarding department will close down on March 28 and open April 2. The boys think that the notice has been a little previous but there is nothing like giving them lots of time to think the matter over.

Shuhart has been granted the privilege of talking over the telephone to the girl at the central office and the "preps" do say that his recitations are showing the evil results of the change. He never misses a call though.

One of the servant girls left last Saturday in company with her intended husband and it was a signal departure. Proctor Allen played a Wedding March, and the Roomers wept aloud from their windows. We wish them many years of happiness.

The Hermenia Literary Society held their open meeting including a banquet at Huth's parlors, February 28, which was a very enjoyable affair. The Hermenians, so long noted for their delightful receptions, certainly outdid themselves on this occasion. Principal Edwards and wife and Miss Armitage—honorary members, Messrs. Hayes, Leiser and Hutchinson—Alumni, added much to the evening's pleasure.

Personals.

'53. Gen. Lewis Merrill U. S. A. died in Philadelphia, Pa., February 27, 1896. He was born in New Berlin, Pa., October 28, 1834, and after studying in the common schools of his native town, entered the University at Lewisburg, which he left in 1852 to become a cadet at West Point. He graduated there in 1855 and in the same year was appointed Brevet Second Lieutenant of Dragoons. He served at Jefferson Barracks, Mo. Forts Leavenworth and Riley, and Carlisle Barracks, and assumed command of the Second Dragoons in December, 1855. He was at Fort Riley, Kas. and took an important part in quelling the disturbances in 1856–58. In 1861 he was promoted First Lieutenant, and later in the same year assumed command of the Second Cavalry. In the War of the Rebellion he distinguished himself by his bravery. In 1861 he was Chief of Cavalry on General Fremont's staff. In 1862, he was Commander of a brigade in the Army of the Southwest, and in 1863 had Command of a brigade of Cavalry in the Army of the Arkansas, serving in the campaign that resulted in the capture of Little Rock. For gallant and meritorious services at Little Rock he was brevetted Lieutenant Colonel. In 1865 he was transferred to the Army of the Cumberland, and was brevetted Brigadier General of Volunteers. At the close of the war he returned to his regiment, and in 1868 rendered signal service in breaking up the Ku Klux in South Carolina. In 1876 he was in command of the troops in Philadelphia during the Centennial Exposition. In 1877, he served in the campaign against the Nez Perces Indians. During the building of the Northern Pacific Railroad he was in Command of the troops guarding the road. In 1891, he was made Lieutenant Colonel in the regular army and later was brevetted Major General. Since being upon the retired list, he has lived in Philadelpiha, where he was an active member of the Bucknell Alumni Club. R. B. McDanel.

MARCH 25, 1896.

THE chapel singing—how beautiful! How like some of the choruses that have stirred the hearts of thousands! How the strains of the Gloria Patri rise and swell in immeasurable volume! Nay! this is as we would like it; but not as it is. While it might not rival the world-stirring choruses, we yet believe it might be very greatly improved. That three hundred young men and twenty five young ladies can produce agreeable music needs no demonstration. It has been so frequently demonstrated that no one questions it. But why they do not is open to question; and the question is being asked. When the members of the Institute ceased to meet with us in chapel service, we discovered how great a part they contributed. Let us prove that we are not entirely dependent upon them.

EVERY friend of the University will rejoice because the increased attendance upon the schools demands larger accommodations; and there is confidence that the increased demands will be met. In this connection a suggestion may not be amiss. The work of the Young Men's Christian Association has grown to such proportions as a factor in the development of the University that better accommodations are almost a necessity. We believe that a building devoted primarily to the work of the Association should be erected. Such a building might contain rooms for the general use of the University, viz., a parlor or reception room, a hall for commencement and other public exercises, and several offices. With such a building the work with new students would be greatly facilitated and would become much more efficient. This work among the new students tends to elevate the moral tone of the school, and contributes much to the success which is now so marked.

THE efforts to arrange for an inter-collegiate debate between State College, Franklin and Marshall, Dickinson, and Bucknell are well directed. The plan has many good features. It will serve to foster and increase the fraternal feeling that exists between these colleges. Friendly rivalry, displayed in debates, athletics and contests of other forms will contribute more to the growth of all the institutions, than will any unfriendly or uncharitable relations. Such a debate would bring all the colleges concerned before the public, and would secure greater interest in the schools from the public at large. Athletics serve to secure such an interest; but there is a class of people who do not see the relation of athletic contests to education, who would readily see the relation existing between debate and education, and the interest of this class would also be secured. A third result would be the increased interest in debate and general literary work in each college. Everything that secures a wider recognition and a more favorable interest in a college is to be welcomed and warmly supported by its students. Success to the inter-collegiate debate!

TO THE RIVER.

Fair river! in thy bright, clear flow
Of crystal, wandering water
Thou art an emblem of the glow
Of beauty—the unhidden heart—
The playful maziness of art
In old Alberto's Daughter;

But when within thy wave she looks—
Which glistens then, and trembles—
Why, then, the prettiest of brooks
Her worshipper resembles;
For in his heart as in a stream,
Her image deeply lies—
His heart which trembles at the beam
Of her soul-searching eyes.

SOMETHING OF JAPANESE.

Mrs. Dr. Leroy Stephens, Inst., '87.

It is well said that the chief sight of a Japanese city to a new comer is the city itself,—with its quaint wooden houses which foreign structures have only partially replaced, the native dress which western style has not yet supplanted, the clatter of the clogs, the dainty children, many of them playing shuttle cock with babies tied on their backs, some laughing, some crying, others sleeping, all make up a spectacle not soon forgotten.

Mr. Lowell said that, "To stroll down the Broadway of Tokyo of an evening is a liberal education in every day art, for, whatever these people fashion, from the toy of an hour to the triumphs of all time, is touched by a taste unknown elsewhere." Dr. Chamberland said that Mr. Lowell as an artist in words, does not add what we simple recorders of facts are bound to do, that with so much appeal to the eye, Tokyo also has much that appeals to the nose.

The people have a sallow complexion, oblique eyes, and a short stature. Though we may consider ourselves a handsome race, yet in the eyes of many of the Japanese we are only "big red-haired barbarians with green eyes." The Japanese are very industrious, accustomed to hardships, heroic, desirous of fame. They are not noted for purity, temperance or love of truth for its own sake.

The ordinary costume of a gentleman looks much like that of the ladies. His gown of four widths of thirteen inch goods is lapped over in front, and held in place by means of a large belt. The ladies use for the same purpose a wadded sash thirteen inches wide and four and a half yards long. On occasion of ceremony a garment is worn, similar to the divided skirt called hakama, and a coat called hoari, both of these are invariably made of silk, and the coat is adorned with the individuals' crest between the shoulders and on each sleeve. The head is usually bare, while on the feet is a kind of sock called tabi reaching only to the ankle and having a separate compartment for the big toe. This is all that is worn on the feet on matted floors, but straw sandals are worn on the verandas and halls, and for out doors wooden sandals are used with soles from two to three inches thick, very different from the Chinese slipper. Most of the men wear a tobacco pouch and pipe in their belts and some also wear at their belts a portable inkstand with pen inside.

In feudal times the Somurai men (those of the gentry class) wore two swords at their belts and had long hair saturated with oil, and drawn from the back over the middle of the shaven pate. The wearing of swords in public was prohibited by law in 1876.

The Japanese women bestow lavish care on the dressing of their hair. This is worn in different styles at the various periods of life so that it is easy to distinguish the woman's age, and whether she is single, engaged or married. They sleep on a narrow wooden pillow, only touching the head below the ear, so that their hair may remain undisturbed. To arrange their hair in native style, the service of a hair dresser is always required, whose fees range from two cents to whatever they choose to offer. When these women become Christians they arrange their hair themselves in English style and give the money, which they would have paid the hair dresser, to benevolent purposes.

The artistic native dress is slowly being supplanted by the costume of the West, especially among the men, as almost all officials are now obliged to wear the European dress on duty.

A gentleman of high rank once told the writer, that he felt his western costume oppressive in warm weather on account of the overcoat. He was amazed when told that the overcoat was only for cold weather, for, he supposed that as he, in Japanese clothes would not be well dressed without the haori, neither would he be in European clothes without the overcoat.

It is the custom for a Japanese lady to walk behind her husband, never by his side or before him, but if both husband and wife wore the Western dress, they would also try to act as foreigners do, and the husband would have his wife then, preceed him in passing through a door. If she were to change to her native garb the same day and would pass before him she must apologize, begging his pardon, and confessing that she is very rude.

Children never wear swaddling clothes, but miniatures of their elders' dresses, except that they wear a bib, and at their sides hangs a charm bag containing a charm supposed to protect them from being run over or washed away. They also wear a metal ticket having on it their address, as a precaution against their getting lost. They are very interesting with their dainty little ways, conforming so perfectly to rules of etiquette, which they are taught rigidly as soon as it is possible for them to learn. They kneel, place their hands on the floor, and bow their heads on their hands with charming grace. This they do to greet visitors, to thank for favors just as their elders do. As soon as they begin to wear heavy wood soled sandals, they learn that they must always leave them at the door on entering their own or any other house. It would be thought as rude to wear a shoe on their floor, as we would think it rude to walk on the table with our boots. When the Japanese reprove their children for being rude, they find no stronger expression than to say, "you are as rude as a foreigner." They have so very many rules of etiquette, it requires a long time of closest attention before a foreigner can learn them. When introducing themselves the polite and common phrase is used as follows: "My name is (O Taku.) I am from (Tokyo) this is the first time I have had the honor to hang my eyes upon you." They then invariably comment upon the weather. A number of bows are given by both parties during the introduction.

When a speaker addressed an audience for the first time, he says "This is the first time I have had the honor to be hung up before your eyes." On entering an audience room, each one feels that he ought to take the lowest seat, which is by the door, so he gently elbows his neighbor to sit over and permit him to have his place. This occasions each one to move over, until the one who sat by the door first, will be half way around the room, or near the speaker, before they begin to form a new row, and no one of lower rank will sit in front of one of higher rank.

In calling, tea is always served the guests as soon as possible, and is made in their presence, with graceful movements, learned by rule. If any one crosses a room in the presence of others, he walks in a stooped manner with the right hand held out, in dipper shape before him. At each question or answer, both questioner and listeners bow to each other. When departing from the house, the guests must wrap up the cakes that have been given them, and take them along. They must bow to the host and hostess and each say "For the great feast which I have enjoyed I thank you much," at this the host and hostess say "Don't mention it. Please come again." After the guests have put on their shoes at the door, all bow again and say "Sayonara" (good bye.)

SHELLEY.

Shelley, like Scott, is a poet of the past. While Scott glorifies medieval life and manners, Shelley turns to the childhood of the race, a state of naive simplicity, of innocence, of sensuous delight. He is a disciple of Rousseau, but immeasurably above Rousseau in genius. His paradise is Mohammedan, except that it is not sensual. In his majestic drama, Prometheus turns out, when released, to be a jolly school-boy, who with Asia, Ione, Panthea, all of whom are children, will take an eternal holiday, in a grot "All overgrown with trailing odorous plants, and paved with veined emerald," where they "will entangle buds and flowers and beams," "like human babes in their brief innocence." Shelley wearied of the present, uses all his marvelous power of fancy, a power unequaled among poets, in painting a future which is a retrogression to a fabulous golden age, "a return to nature," in which men, become children again, shall passively drink in delight from beauty, light and love. Shelley knows nothing of the joy of action, the transport of creating, still less of the dignity of work, and the divineness of sacrifice. The reason that Shelley is not read by this age is that the age has risen far above him and every other who place the goal or glory of man in enjoyment, however refined, and a static condition however pleasingly described. The watchword of the ages is not a return to Eden, but an advance toward God.

THE BIBLE IN COLLEGE.

No other religious movement of modern times is destined, in time, to produce such far reaching result as the study of the Bible in College. It means that the trained intellect of the age is invited to investigate the Bible and its claims. There have always been scholars in this work, but they have always been a special class without a scholastic sympathy from others of the craft. Now the college is to have the Bible. This means of course, that it will be studied by means of the methods of science, reasoning from the facts up to principles, not starting with preconceived principles and reasoning down to the facts, which is sure to result in forcing the facts to support the principle. The most recent step toward extending Bible study was taken but a few months ago. Every one who reads has heard of the American Institute of Sacred Literature. Its work has been a power. Thousands have been helped by it to a better knowledge of the Bible. This work is now to be conducted on a new basis. A Council of Seventy or Sanhedrin of the best Biblical scholars of this country has been formed at the suggestion of President W. R. Harper. This Council will organize the efforts of all Biblical teachers in the country and will direct Biblical work in all lines, through summer schools, city institutes, college classes, Y. M. C. A.'s and other agencies. It will give unity, sympathy, power to the workers. Nearly half the members of the Council are already chosen and are as follows:

AFTER MANY YEARS.

The evening express slowed up as it neared the little red station, and the baggage-man threw the mail-bag on the front porch of the post-office. Then an unusual thing happened. The train stopped altogether and a man stepped down on the platform. As he stood beneath the dim station lamp, the group of loungers noticed that he was a gentleman of perhaps thirty years, although he might have been more. The train had moved around the far curve and was whistling for the next hamlet, before the stranger left the platform. He then walked rapidly up the main street until he had left the saloon, the post-office, and the general store far behind, and paused before a large mansion—one of those grand old plantation residences. It was the only thing that had changed in his absence—so changed in fact that he feared it had passed into new hands. For a moment he paused as if debating his course, and then passed up the drive to the house. As he reached the broad veranda, a light flared up in the hall. He waited a moment and then rang. Old Pete answered the bell. For a moment he peered into the twilight and then recognizing the stranger bowed again and again and ushered him into the cozy little reception room. Although the outside was changed, the interior remained the same. As he glanced around the familiar room it seemed to him as though it were last night he had said good-bye to Bess, ten years before.

When Bess entered, he noticed how she had changed. She was a woman now. The years had told on her spirits but not on her face. She was far more beautiful than when he left her, but there was a sad, depressed look in her great blue eyes that touched his heart. No doubt the recent death of her mother had affected her. She also noted the changes in him. From a wild impetuous youth he had been transformed into a sober man of the world. That he had prospered in life, she was able to tell at a glance; and yet there seemed to be something lacking to make his life altogether happy. In youth they had not been able to understand each other. She had told him in fits of jealousy that he fell in love with every pretty face. He had accused her of being too cold and unfeeling. Both had lived to see their mistakes.

They greeted each other quietly, and for a while conversed on the changes that had taken place. Then the conversation ended abruptly. He had noticed that something agitated her—probably her mother's death. After some moments of silence he said, "What troubles you, Bess?" calling her by the old name.

"Why do you ask?" she replied.

He rose, and crossing the room stood before her. "Because I love you," he answered. "I have loved you all these years, and have been faithful to you." He paused and raised her hand.

"I heard that you were married," she said.

"Nonsense, Bess," he replied, "But I will be within a week if you will consent."

"Receiving no reply he stooped down and gently kissed a tear from her cheek; and the ten years of waiting were rewarded.

A. J. HANNA, '99.

KODAKS.

C. A. LINDEMAN, '98.

He was the cynosure of all eyes; men about him breathlessly awaited any word he might let drop; his tongue clove to the roof of his mouth; the room began to swim about his head and he felt as though he must fall to the floor; he sank to his seat—he had flunked.

Dressed in his best he wandered down the street to her home, as every lamp post smiled its beams upon him he beamed his smiles upon it, he ascended the steps, he rang the bell, a moment's delay, the door was opened, a pair of slender arms were flung around his neck and between sobs and briney kisses he was told the baby had the measles—her home was two doors below.

"Confound your crooked ways; it tires me. Haven't I done all I could for you? Now you are not a particle of service to me. The money I have spent upon you is absolutely wasted. O yes! you are all right in appearance and my male friends do admire you when I take you out in public. But in private you drive me to desperation. The end has come, out you go." The window was raised and out was hurled his briar wood pipe, with crooked stem hopelessly clogged.

The time had come; he dreaded it, but it was inevitable; there was a trace of something more than sadness in his voice: "We must part; circumstances beyond my control ordain it, but before we separate I want to say that you have been my constant friend for a long time, my life has been largely in you, you have made me happy, and oblivious to the world's cold shoulder; your warming influence has pervaded my whole being and I can only hope that we may come together again as the closest of friends in some future time. The overcoat was a good one, and his "uncle" gave him a fair raise.

Some strong emotion seemed to be struggling within him; he opened his arms, stepped forward as one in a daze, clasped them around the frail form and was too full for utterance.—Two policeman persuaded him to believe that the lamp post would be able to stand without his assistance.

THE JUNIOR BALL.

Notwithstanding the fact that Friday, March 13,—that unluckiest of all days and all numbers,—was the date appointed for the Junior dance, it was a brilliant success in every particular and a fitting climax to Lewisburg's social season. The committee in charge of this happy event was composed of the following young men from the Junior class: F. W. Wagner, J. V. Lesher, Ed. Gilchrist, P. L. Williams, J. M. Wilson, J. A. Guie, H. C. Stanton and W. F. Eichholtz.

The patronesses who lent dignity to the affair are among the leading society ladies of Lewisburg and neighboring towns. They were Mesdames J. C. Bucher, J. T. Baker, J. E. Colt, Carl Seiler, E. M. Hummel, Wm. Leiser, W. C. Walls, R. F. Halfpenny, W. H. Hackenburg, A. A. Leiser, J. M. Linn, H. P. Glover, N. C. Marsh, J. F. Duncan, P. B. Wolfe and H. M. McClure.

Guests were present from Lewisburg, Milton, Muncy, Watsontown, Williamsport, Buffalo, Mifflinburg, Middleburg, Northumberland, Sunbury, Shamokin, Danville, Bloomsburg and Philadelphia. The energetic committee had spent much time in decorating the hall and it was the universal expression that "the Lewisburg Armory never appeared prettier." There was orange and blue bunting galore and while ninety-seven was making herself prominent on the floor below, "Bucknell '97" in orange and blue letters shone forth in all its brilliancy around the electric lights on the ceiling above. Truly it was a brilliant scene and one long to be remembered by that merry throng of dancers! The Sunbury Military Band made its first appearance in Lewisburg and furnished delightful music for the occasion. Dancing began at nine o'clock and continued until the wee sma' hours. At twelve a bountiful collation was served and at three "The Gondolier,"—that most beautiful of all waltz-songs,—was played and the Junior ball was a thing of the past. With "Moonlight on the Hudson" and "Land of my Dreams" still ringing in their ears the guests prepared to depart and as "the morn, in russet mantle clad, walked o'er the snow of yon eastern hill," groups of tired and weary waltzers could be seen slowly wending their way homeward, each one vowing to always look back with the fondest recollections on the night they spent at the Junior ball.

ATHLETICS.

A meeting of the relay runners was held in the Athletic room on the afternoon of March 10. Manager Dillon presided. About ten candidates were present. Trainer Cober gave the men some good sound advice in regard to training and urged upon them the necessity of faithful and conscientious work. Capt. Slifer of the track team made a few remarks, in which he told the men that the future of our track athletics depends to a great extent on our showing at Philadelphia on April 25.

An interesting game of basket-ball was played in the gymnasium on Saturday, March 14, between the classes of '98 and '99. From a scientific standpoint it was the best game that has been played here during the winter. The Sophomores were victorious, 12 goals to 5.

We had three or four fine spring days and the baseball men took advantage of them by getting in some out-door work. The infield was coached by Hering and several of the men showed considerable form. Smith, '94 is expected soon to take the men in hand for a week or ten days. He will coach the men in fielding and batting, at the same time giving some attention to the pitching squad. Harvey Smith will be remembered as one of the best baseball players that Bucknell has ever had.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Something of present importance—examinations.

The MIRROR board has decided to have their pictures in L'Agenda this year.

A. J. Hanna, '99 has a short sketch in The Commonwealth of March 14, on Dr. Hendrick as a Wit.

Dr. Perrine filled the pulpit of the Baptist Church in Muncy during several Sundays this month.

E. W. Cober '99 has been making his annual maple sugar trip among the boys. We will all be sweet next term.

During baseball practice recently, a large plate glass window in the front of the gymnasium was broken.

What next? Seniors—Commencement; Juniors—L'Agenda; Sophomores—MIRROR Cup; Freshmen—Mamma.

The Sunbury Military band that played for the Junior Ball gave a street concert when they arrived in Lewisburg.

Ellery Page, of Port Alleghany, Pa., has entered the Academy. He will be a candidate for baseball pitcher next term.

The March snow storm put an end to outdoor practice in athletics. It was the heaviest fall of snow during this winter.

Several of the boys fired with a zeal for the independence of the island republic have decorated their rooms with flags of Cuba.

Berger, '96, acted as attendant nurse for Sam Wittenmeyer of the Academy who was confined to the Infirmary for several days.

All students should bear in mind that vacation begins this week on Friday and lasts until Thursday, April 2. Many will stay in Lewisburg.

Carl Summerbell, '97, was a contributor to the educational number of the Herald of Gospel Liberty. The subject of this interesting article is "Mary."

R. B. Mulkie, '98, went to Hazelton Friday, March 6, to visit his sister, Mrs. Dr. Humphrey, and his mother. He returned on the following Monday.

In ordering their spring suits, students are requested to glance at the advertising columns of the MIRROR and find out who sells the best goods at popular prices.

Another vacation approaches and we have no glee club. Bucknell students have no good reason for not having a successful organization of their male vocalists.

Graduates of Keystone Academy met on Wednesday afternoon, March 11, and elected officers for this year: Rivenburg, '97, president; Thomas, '98, secretary; and Bunnell, '97, treasurer. The other members are: F. D. Finn, F. B. Hunt, '96; Miss Taylor, H. C. Stanton, '97; and G. H. Catterall, and Miss Myra Sprague, '99.

Pi Beta Phi entertained Miss Harris at the fraternity rooms on Friday evening, March 13.

Dr. Wayland Hoyt of Philadelphia has accepted the invitation to preach the annual sermon before the Y. M. C. A. on April 12.

When Dr. Wayland insisted that elocutionists should teach their pupils to say "No" with great force he doubtless forgot that 1896 is the last leap year for eight years.

Business manager E. R. Myers says, "L'Agenda will be out early in May." Alumni and students should have their orders in before the end of April.

In Milton, on Thursday evening, March 12, Prof. Hulley delivered his interesting and popular lecture, "An evening with Burns," before the Y. M. C. A. and friends.

The college men boarding at the Academy passed the following resolution unanimously one day recently: "Resolved that we send Macnab to Cuba—to get rid of him."

If the weather permits, the interclass relay race will be held at Brook Park track on Saturday, April 11. The Sophomores, Freshmen, and Academy will be represented.

"A Wreath of Hops," a continued story by Mrs. Katherine B. Larison, commenced in the Commonwealth of March 14, and is furnishing interesting reading for the College boys.

"Sectarianism in the Public Schools," by President Harris in the Commonwealth, can be read with interest and profit by those desiring to know the doctor's views on that important question.

Two thousand dollars received by our corporation for the general uses of the University, from the estate of Chauncey B. Ripley of New York City, have been added to the productive funds.

One of the large plate glass windows in the post office was accidently broken by a crowd of the fellows waiting for their mail one evening not very long ago. They were very sorry post facto. The glass was an old thing put in some forty years ago but cost over one hundred dollars.

If there is any one on the hill who has not introduced the pneumatic—gas pipe—telephone system let him come around to the MIRROR office and get a medal or his name in the paper which is just as good.

Tuesday afternoon, March 10, the editorial board of the MIRROR met in Euepia Hall. After accepting the resignation of D. E. Lewis as Senior editor, H. Harris Bower was unanimously elected to fill the vacancy.

Persons in the observatory on Monday evening, March 9, saw an unexpected sight. One of Jupiter's moons approached near enough to cast a shadow on that planet and appeared about to make a transit. Saturn is also in a fine position these evenings.

The Pittsburg Alumni will hold their annual banquet Monday evening, March 30. Alumni and former students residing in Western Pennsylvania should send their names and addresses at once to the secretary of the Pittsburg Club, W. M. Woodward, M. D., 520 Walnut St., McKeesport, Pa.

Registrar W. C. Gretzinger gave a fine gold medal, appropriately engraved, to Perkiomen Seminary at Pennsburg, Pa, which he attended several years before entering Bucknell. The medal will be presented to the winner of the prize contest in declamation at Perkiomen on March 20.

The Sophs. were not arraigned for Literature on Thursday, March 5. Gradually the news of an increase in the doctor's family was spread among the boys and when Professor Perrine arrived a little later at the hill with a countenance beaming with pleasant smiles, everybody wanted to congratulate him because of the young lady.

The second Junior debate was held in Bucknell Hall, Friday, March 13, and was attended by an appreciative audience. The subject—"Resolved, that in Time of Distress, either the States or the Municipalities should directly furnish Employment to the Unemployed Members of the Community," was ably debated by Kunkle, Sprague, Nelson, Grim, Fisk, Rivenburg, Collins and Barner. The first four were chosen to debate for the prize during commencement week.

Friend, who suddenly appears and finds "Doc" Brown attaching a jet to the gas pipe in his room:—"What is the matter, 'Doc', what are you doing now?" "Well you see I am tired of burning oil and I thought before the charm wears away, I might utilize some of the natural gas that McCay and his friends are wasting on their pneumatic 'phones."

The Bucknell Pedestrian Club has been organized with the following excellent membership: President, H. F. Harris '96; Secretary, H. H. Bower '96; Manager of tours, F. W. Dillon '98; Coach, B. F. Thomas '98; Honorary member, L. G. C. Riemer '95. The first tour was to Middleburg and return on March 13; distance 56½ miles; time, two days.

"Tomorrow, I have eighty pages to read in connection with the regular lesson in Ethics, contemporaneous events in France covering twenty years and 120 pages, for English History, and my thesis in Economics is almost due," said the pressed Senior, "yet I hear the Juniors continually talking of 'what a snap we will have next year.' Time will tell."

As announced in a recent MIRROR, Professor Hulley delighted a large audience by his address before the Pomona Grange of Union County on "Mistaken Views of Education." The lecture complete was published in the local papers of March 7, and to these, we refer the students. Lack of space forbids an enumeration of even the principal points in this able address.

Editor W. L. Kurtz of the Lewisburg Journal, has moved his establishment across Market Street to much better quarters on the first floor. This rising young newspaper man, who graduated from Bucknell in '85, is having deserved success both as a journalist and as a man of influence in local affairs. He always takes great pride in mentioning Bucknell's increased growth and prosperity.

Dr. Perrine's lecture for the Athletic Association in Bucknell Hall Thursday, the fifth, came too late for mention in the last issue. The attendance was large and all were interested and instructed concerning what really constitutes an English classic. Seldom has a subject been more thoroughly and pleasingly developed.

On Thursday evening, March 12, Zeta Literary Society entertained the Euepians in the Institute parlors. An interesting program was presented showing the results of the interest the ladies take in their society. After the program refreshments were served and a social hour only too soon passed away. The society was honored by the presence of President Harris and Doctor Wayland.

There was another class contest between Sophomores and Freshmen last Friday evg., March 24. This time it was one conducted by the ladies who showed what they could do in declaiming before a critical Bucknell audience. The contestants were: Sophomores—Misses Gilchrist, Slifer, Rodgers, and Siegel; Freshmen—Misses Gertrude Stephens, Thomas, Sprague, Mary Stephens, and Sharpless. The preliminary was held on March 4.

Once more the "special" fiend has appeared and this time Bucknell suffered. Shortly after the Ettlinger murder sensation in Centre county, a United Press report was sent out from Bellefonte stating how some medical students from Lewisburg were supposed to have carried away the murderer's body from its hastily made grave on the following Sunday. A party of reporters drove over to the scene of the shooting on that day; and without investigating, the frightened inhabitants took it for granted that the body was stolen. In other regards, the sensational telegram was entirely false.

Dr. H. L. Wayland, Editor of the Examiner, was at Bucknell on Thursday and addressed the students on sociological subjects. On Wednesday evening he lectured on the Armenian Question in the chapel of the Baptist Church before a large general audience. On Thursday morning in Bucknell Hall, he ably addressed the students on Compulsory Arbitration; at eleven o'clock, he spoke on a Scientific Basis of Charity; in the afternoon at two, he spoke on Wages and Wage Earners. The lectures awakened much interest among his hearers and at the Informal Conference held at three, many took part, discussing the situation in some of its practical and theoretical aspects. President Harris spoke on False Mythology of the Wage Question; Prof. Hulley on the Political Economy of the Prophets; Prof. Perrine on the Position of the Employer; Prof. Phillips, Messrs. Rohland, Douglas, Taggart and Miss Wheeler, on the Wage Question in Pennsylvania.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

A number of the Institute girls were invited to the Sigma Alpha Epsilon banquet, given Monday evening, March 9, at the Baker House. The fortunate ones report a more than splendid time.

The last meeting of the Athena Literary Society was especially interesting. The visitors present testify to the wide awake and enterprising spirit of Athena's young ladies. After the program the business of the society was discussed in a most exemplary and decorous manner, only one fair member being allowed to talk at a time.

A very interesting subject was debated in the Kalomathia Literary Society, Monday evening, March 9, the question being,—Resolved: that the new woman is not an improvement on the old. The speakers on the affirmative—Minnie Morris, Gertrude Kase, Ruth Bower, on the negative—Ella Bender, Edith Hartley. The negative side won.

A very entertaining number on the program was the reading of the society paper. In one of the " smile corners" was a series of conundrums, bringing in the names of all the members of the society, for example: "Cupid's sporting ground —Love-grove." The society bids fair to become a useful factor in the improvement of the "young ideas" marksmanship.

The snow, which fell several days ago, was very welcome for it afforded an opportunity for the young ladies of the Institute to take advantage of "Leap Year" and invite the boys to a sleighing party. Accordingly the young ladies met their guests at the Institute, Friday afternoon and proceeded to Mifflinburg where supper was served. Those composing the party were: Misses Armitage, Bates, Probasco, Angle, Bastress, Folmer, Jones and Dunham; Messrs. Purdy, Bayard, Clement, Elliot, Nesbit, Brady, Garner and H. B. C. Riemer.

Despite the stormy evening, the Alumnae meeting held on Tuesday the third was well attended the subject for the evening was Eugene Field. A solo by Miss Gould was the first number on the program. The members of the club then gave quotations from Eugene Field. Mrs. Seiler read a very interesting account of his life. A piano solo by Miss Aikin was followed by a recitation of one of Eugéne Field's poems for children by Miss Ruth Bower. At the request of the club, Miss Gould sang "Little Boy Blue" one of Field's prettiest poems. After some informal readings and conversation, the club adjourned.

The Institute girls were exceedingly delighted upon receiving the invitation to the "Brownie Party" given by Mrs. Edwards, in the Academy parlors, Friday evening, March 6; for they had partaken of Mrs. Edwards' hospitality before and anticipated the rich treat which was in store for them. Immediately after the reception by the host and hostess the girls began searching for "Brownies" which they found concealed in every nook and corner imaginable. The young men did likewise and then came that all important crises—it comes in every one's life—mating the "brownies." The anxiety on the part of the girls was just as marked as that of the other sex. By 10 o'clock every "Jack had found his Jill" and with her had partaken of refreshments, which were most delicious.

ACADEMY NEWS.

A translation in Virgil class: has equitibus distribuit—these he distributed to the calvary.

Quoth Anthony, "Fellows don't you think I can clap louder since I washed my hands?"

Double is going to lecture in the Opera House in the near future. He has announced his subject which is "Tools."

We are glad to welcome within our walls Mr. Page the prospective twirler of the sphere, whom we earnestly hope will fill his position with credit.

Mr. Samuel Wittenmyer being ill was removed to the college infirmary where we trust with quiet and careful attention he will soon return to his studies.

The Third Form Preliminary Declamation Contest was held March 14. The members of the class rendered their selections in a very able manner, and we feel safe to say that there will be a treat in store for those who attend the Contest which will be held April 25.

Friday evening, March 6, Principal and Mrs. Edwards again proved their ability to entertain their friends when the Academy boys and the young women of the Seminary assembled according to invitation at a Brownie Party. The evening was pleasantly spent in a social manner.

PERSONALS.

All Classes.—Graduates and friends from all departments of the university are requested to send items for this column. We hope through your co-operation to make the paper a more perfect means of communication between the friends of the institution.

'62. Rev. W. H. Conard gave an interesting address before Crozer Theological Seminary on March 6.

'62. D. Bright Miller was elected president of the Lewisburg and Mifflinburg Turnpike Co. at a recent meeting.

APRIL 10, 1896.

THE Vassar girls have revolted! Following the example of several other colleges, Bucknell among the number, they have requested the college authorities to substitute for commencement day essays an address by some speaker of note. The request opens several questions relative to commencement exercises. First, it is a question whether the attendants at these exercises (for whom the exercises are really arranged) prefer to hear one more noted and able speaker, or to listen to ten or more productions of lesser talent, but which have the attraction of being flavored with youthful effort and youthful imperfection. The fact that in our own institution Commencement Hall always contains far larger audiences upon the occasion of the actual commencement exercises, than during any of the other exercises of the week, would seem to indicate that the preference was for the productions of the students. We know that by such statements we are laying ourselves open to the charge of wishing to figure as an adornment of the commencement stage; but the fact that the classes of both '95 and '96 submitted the same request to the Faculty ought to secure the admission from all that we are but seeking to be impartial.

THE honor system of examinations is being adopted more and more generally, and it demands the attention and consideration of all our colleges. The essence of the honor system is contained in a pledge to be signed by each student affirming that he has "neither given nor received assistance during the examination." In detail the adoption of the honor system removes the necessity of Faculty surveillance, provides for a committee to be elected by the class which shall sit in judgment in all cases of alleged cheating, and obligates each member of the class to report any breaches of the system that may come under his notice. The adoption of the honor system implies that the present method of conducting examinations is at least, inadequate to prevent cheating. Still the question is open whether the transference of the duty of detecting and dealing with such cases from the Faculty to the students is the real remedy. It is a question whether it is an advantage to secure honor in one instance by offering an opportunity to transgress in another; for all students feel a repugnance against reporting an offence of this kind on the part of their fellows, and, if they bind themselves so to do and afterward fail to make such report, their word is broken and honor is violated—and most likely by those who would be last to personally act dishonorably in examinations. The progress of the system in actual working order will be watched with interest.

REMINISCENCES OF DR. ROBINSON.

When the University of Chicago opened, seven ex-presidents of colleges were enrolled among its faculty. The greatest of these was Dr. Robinson of Rochester Seminary and Brown University. In the list of faculty his name immediately followed that of President Harper, and to it was appended a list of the scholastic positions he had held:

Ezekiel Gilman Robinson, D.D., LL.D., Professor of Ethics and Apologetics. A. B., Brown University, 1838, and A. M., 1841; Graduate, Newton Theological Institution, 1842; D. D., Brown University,1853, and LL.D., 1872; LL.D., Harvard University, 1886; Chaplain, University of Virginia, 1843–4; Professor ot Hebrew, Theological Seminary, Covington, Ky., 1846–8; Professor of Theology, Rochester Theological Seminary, 1852–60; President of the same, 1860–72; President, Brown University, 1872–89; Lecturer on Apologetics and Evidences of Christianity, Crozer Theological Seminary, Pa., 1889; Editor of Christian Review, 1859–64.

One of the first glimpses his students had of him was as he stood in prayer in his class room before he began his lecture in ethics. He was an old man, past eighty it was said. His hair and beard were perfectly white; his figure very tall and only slightly stooped; his features strong; and his clear blue eyes remarkable for searching keenness. His old age and vigor inevitably recalled the words: "Yet was his eye not dim, nor his natural force abated." His prayer before his class that first morning was a remarkable one. There seemed to be no effort in it to voice the petition of his students. The voice was so low that it could be heard only by the most attentive ear. It was for himself, not for others that he asked enlightenment,—"For Thou O Lord, knowest our ignorance, our superstition, and prejudice." He seemed to be unconscious of the presence of the class and to be alone with the Infinite. The sunlight came through a half-open shutter and fell on his white head, and one would not have been surprised to see a halo there. That was the picture of the patriarch and saint.

Both of these he always was. But in lecturing his manner was so business-like and alert, and his statements so clear-cut and discriminating, that he appeared pre-eminently the scholar and logician. At the end of a lecture, opportunity was always given for questions; and his readiness and directness of reply were noteworthy. Students sometimes ventured away from the subject-matter of the lecture and asked irrelevant questions. One young man prone to do this was a southerner of the narrowest possible orthodoxy, and bent on probing his professor's straightness of tenet. He asked one day: "Dr. Robinson, do you think that Carlyle was a Christian?" The Doctor answered with a patient good nature but rather evasively. He was surprisingly patient with well meaning stupidity. The young man pressed his point: "Well, but do you think he was a Christian?" Then the old man's eye kindled. He flashed back at his questioner, "Thank God, I'm not his judge. If there's one thing that makes me choke up sooner than another, it's to hear any man pronounce that another is not a Christian. What right have I to say? He may not be a Christian according to my little pattern, but there are other ways beside mine. What authority have I to be his judge?"

Another thing that "rubbed his fur the wrong way"—to use a favorite expression of his own was to hears scienc disparaged. Thank God for science, he used to say emphatically. "It has cleared away a greatdeal of rubbish for us and has got to clear away a great deal more. It is impossible that there should be any conflict between true science and true religion, for they are both parts of truth. Men who talk and who write books about the 'Conflict of Religion and Science' make the great mistake of not understanding their terms."

Few souls have ever been more eager for truth than he, more fearless of new light, or more urgent of the pursuit of truth. With what vim he used to quote the sayings of Lessing!—"If the Almighty stood before me, with Truth in the one hand and the Pursuit of Truth in the other, and offered me the choice, I would choose Pursuit of Truth." His willingness to adopt a new idea prevailed in regard to religious truth as well as in regard to lesser things, and it prevailed to the last. Not that he was unstable or wont to be carried about with every wind. Far from it. But he realized, as few even among great men do, the idea of Emerson, "To prefer truth rather than one's past perception of the truth.'' He could even go so far as to say, ''If this faith of mine is a mistake, the sooner I have done with it the better. Let me have the truth and thank God for it wherever I find it.'' This saying may seem trite; but the openness of mind behind it is by no means common. Compare with it the following:—At a great demoninational gathering where the wisdom of a certain scholarly investigation was being discussed, a leader of the denomination, himself a famous teacher, was asked his opinion concerning it. He said very impressively: We want nothing that will change our opinion of Christ. If there is any likelihood that this investigation may do so, let us have none of it. Such a saying would have been impossible to Dr. Robinson. He would have said, ''By all means investigate; and when the results are established let them modify our present views as they may. The thing we most want is truth.''

Students sometimes remarked that Dr. Robinson had no interest in individuals. Many incicidents seemed to confirm this. Once the daughter of an old friend and former colleague of his came to the University and heard Dr. Robinson lecture. After the discourse she went to pay her respects to him; and, fearing that he might not recognize her at once, said, ''I am Dr. B's daughter.'' Without a word of inquiry as to her father or others of his friends whom she had recently seen, he remarked, ''Well, you see what we are getting at in this class; we have''—and he reviewed the argument for her and told her what would follow.

Yet it was not true that Dr. Robinson took no interest in his students personally. One who had sat at his feet for a year came up for examination for one of the higher degrees. These examinations are anticipated as trying ordeals. They are oral and are conducted with the utmost formality. Student and professors all appear in cap and gown, and any visitors who may choose to come are similarly arrayed. The candidate for degree takes the professor's chair, and the examiners sit below where they take turns in questioning and keeping the student on the rack for such time as they see fit,—the entire time, however, never being less than two hours. It was in such an ordeal as this, the student shivering with nervousness and the six examining professors looking most formidable in their black gowns, that Dr. Robinson came to the rescue with a kindliness which his student can never forget. As the oldest of the professors, he was asked to take his turn first in questioning. Before asking anything, he talked for a few minutes in such a manner as to put the student at ease and quiet the quaking nerves. Then when his questions did begin, they were found to be very answerable; and the student got up a courage which held out for the ordeal. When the catechising was finished, the other examiners shook hands and offered congratulations on the successful work done. Not so Dr. Robinson. He did not say a word in that class room to the now happy candidate; but he managed to leave the room at the same time, and as they went up the corridor together, he made the kindest inquiries as to the student's plans for future work; and on shaking hands for goodby he said, ''I think you have earned your degree.'' How those words were prized. They were precious above every formal expression of congratulation on success.

A short time after leaving the University in the spring of '95, Dr. Robinson passed away after only a brief illness. Memorial services were held for him at Rochester, Brown, and Chicago; and testimonials were made by multitudes whose lives he had uplifted, that it had been one of the greatest privileges they had ever known to sit at his feet and receive his teaching. Surely the two immortalities are his,—the one unknown to us, and the one vouchsafed to those noble souls who live again in lives made better by their presence.

Mrs. Lincoln Hulley.

THE NEW ELOCUTION.

The new elocution, which is destined in a short time to make the old elocution a thing of history, owes to a great extent its rapid advancement and development to Professor S. S. Curry, Ph. D., Dean of the School of Expression, Instructor of Elocution in Yale Divinity School and Newton Theological Institute, and formerly in Boston University and Harvard University. This new method has been used and developed at Bucknell for the past two years or more by our Instructor in Elocution, Professor L. Phillips, who has studied under Doctor Curry in the Summer School of the University of Chicago.

The distinctive character of this new method as compared with the old can best be shown by a brief summary of Doctor Currey's Lessons in Vocal Expression. The basis of the whole system is the study of Nature. The student is taught to understand thoroughly the selection and to express it in the most natural way. Impression preceeds expression. The old elocution taught the pupil arbitrary rules governing emphasis, inflection, and gesture, made the man an automaton going through the routine laid down by the teacher, all individuality being surrendered; whereas in the new elocution the pupil becomes a man, presenting his own interpretation of literature, natural in his mode of expression, responding by his words, voice, and pantomime to his own conception of the meaning of the author.

The effect of the introduction of this method at Bucknell has been very marked. One of our trustees said last spring that the orations at commencement were by far the best heard at Bucknell for a number of years. They had "less of the ear marks of the elocution teacher about them." In the Junior Exhibition and the Junior Debate last year more individuality was displayed by the speakers than in the same contests of any previous year. Another excellent example of the good results of this method was seen in the Contest in Declamation by the young women of the Freshman and Sophomore classes which was held in Bucknell Hall on Thursday evening, March 19. The exhibition was not characterized by the sameness which usually attends such events. Each speaker arose and delivered her selection and not that of the instructor.

What will be the result of this method on the world at large? It is hard to tell, but judging by the past it is possible to predict for it a wonderful influence. People will desire no longer the elocutionist with her un-called-for though graceful gesture, and the Delsarte class prettily mimicing their teacher; and place will be given to the true elocution, whose representatives will present to us a correct interpretation of the thought embodied in our glorious literature.

STUDY IN FOREIGN UNIVERSITIES

The Standard, in its issue of March 28, says: "A number of the professors of Colgate University are either now sojourning and studying in foreign countries, or will soon leave to go abroad. Prof. Sylvester Burnham is in Leipzig, Prof. N. L. Andrews is in the Orient, and Prof. E. F. Nichols is in Berlin. Prof. J. F. McGregory will soon leave for Chemical research in Herdelberg and Gottingen and Prof. T. F. Harvard will prosecute advanced study in Germany.

This is as it should be. The highest training is none too good for those who make teaching their life work. No institution suffers in thus granting leave of absence to the faithful men who prize greatly such an opportunity for further study. Yale, Harvard and other institutions grant a sabbatical year (every seventh year) to each professor, and in nearly every case it is spent in travel or in studying the methods of other universities.

How proud we are that the members of our own faculty have thus had the opportunities afforded by extensive travel and study in the great universities both at home and abroad. Prof Loomis traveled and studied in Germany and France; Prof. Groff in Germany and other countries; Prof. Rockwood in Italy and Germany; Prof. Owens specialized in chemistry at Berlin; Prof. Hamblin travelled in Europe; Prof Hulley took graduate courses at Harvard and Chicago; Mr. Phillips has specialized at Chicago; and Mr. Riemer will go abroad this summer.

"NOTHING SUCCEEDS LIKE SUCCESS."

"Say Jack, what do you think of that new man Wrightsey? Sort of a harmless greeny isn't he?" Jack, "Well he does seem green enough, that's certain. We ought to have some fun with him. Besides he's a Sophomore, you know."

The scene of the above conversation was a student's room in old ——— University. The speaker, Fred Haines was a confident Junior who sat conversing with his friend Jack Johnson, the first evening after college had opened. The subject of the conversation, Frank Wrights, was a new student, tall, ungainly and awkward. That he was a farmer and the son of a farmer, his movements and speech quickly betrayed. But despite all this he satisfied the Faculty that his preparation fitted him to enter the Sophomore Class.

"I say Jack, lets stir up the Freshmen to bump Wrightsey. We can all enjoy the fun, for he's such a farmer that his own fellows won't stand by him." "That's a go, Fred."

The next morning found Frank Wrights (whom we will call simply Frank, from this point on) at Chapel early. His rather course, ill-fitting clothes and his embarrassed awkwardness were the objects of some jesting and he was painfully conscious that he was under discussion. Now and then he overheard ominous words and caught significant glances. "Wrightsey ought to furnish some rare sport, fellows,—lets give him a taste of college life to-night," said Haines. "He looks rather formidable," said Harry Smith, a puny, sickly looking fellow, who always cautioned conservatism before a battle, but shouted louder than the most courageous hero after a victory had been won. Frank caught enough of such sentences as these to judge that trouble was in store for him; but he was no coward and determined to prove it if necessary.

As the boys, in groups, passed up the hill from Chapel, Frank was the only one walking alone. Several times the crowd behind him pushed one of their number against him, while those in front, with feigned indifference to immediate surroundings, stopped on the path, now and then, to remark about the farms in the distance and the farmers who lived there.

In Latin class Frank translated the passage assigned him very well for he was a thorough student. However, when the professor asked him if such a noun were ablative absolute, and he answered—"I reckon"—a general burst of laughter followed. He was hardly prepared for such an isolation of himself from the rest of the class and he became very much confused. Then, his answers to the simplest questions of construction were inaccurate and blundering, to the great amusement of the class. The girls thought his discomfiture inexpressibly funny, and after Frank sat down, their hysterical titter continued to the close of the recitation, with only now and then a few seconds of cessation to catch breath or write a note to a neighbor.

After class the girls were each eager to express an opinion about "Farmer Wrights" as they called him. As the little bevy walked along together, Kit Kelly turned and said—"He'd better be home thrashing pumpkins than to be here in College. Isn't he clumsy?—and that 'I reckon' ha, ha." Each one passed some pleasantry at Franks expense, except Blanche Avery. "What do you think of our dear, new class brother, Blanche? said several in concert, when they noticed that she alone had not ridiculed him. "I don't wish to say anything about him said Blanche, but I think we girls were mean to keep laughing after we saw how it confused him." "Well if he can't stand that, he's not much of a man," said Kit, straightening herself up as though she thought she looked manly, but she appeared only manish. The girls paid little attention to Kit, but still looked inquiringly at Blanche to hear what more she would say. "Don't you suppose it would be interesting to imagine what Mr. Wrights thinks of us? I wonder if he finds our courtesy able to stand comparison with that of country girls?" "Well I hope because we're college girls we don't have to be poky and solemn all the time" said Kit. "No indeed" said Blanche, "I like to laugh at funny things in class just as well as you; my risibles are easily aroused. It's hard to draw the line, I know, but I think that a laugh which we are sure will hurt some one ought to be restrained. This cuts out only a few of our laughs. There are many ludicrous happenings in any class and we all rightly enjoy laughing at them." "What a philosopher you are, Blanche. The Bible says there's a time to laugh and a time to weep. Is it the proper time to weep now?" said Kit. "Blanche is right" said May Fields who had been one of the first to make sport of the new student only a few moments before. "She laughs merrier than anyone of us, but she doesn't laugh at all, if she feels she might have reason to be ashamed of it afterward." Just then the girls came into their hall, and separated, going to their rooms.

During the day the boys got together and planned to surprise Frank. That evening he sat alone in his room, for his chum Jay Dickinson had been out all the evening. About ten o'clock Jay unlocked the door and walked in followed by thirty or forty fellows. "Frank, these fellows want to see you," said Jay. At that the light was blown out and Frank was hurried into the hall and down the stairs. He offered some resistance at first, but soon found it useless among so many. But he managed to keep his temper very well and exclaimed—"I reckon you, fellers have got the best of this bargain but I wouldn't care to swop places with any one of you to-night." The boys did not enjoy this honest expression and Frank got a little harder treatment because of it, but after a while the hazing fiend grew weary.

Several weeks passed by, during which Frank often found himself laughed at for his awkwardness and peculiar, provincial speech. After the first laugh, he often became confused and was scored down for his mixed, blundering answers. The professor told him that he could not pass without extra work in construction and grammar.

One day, during a practice game of foot-ball, one of the linemen was seriously hurt, and had to be carried off the field. There was no hope that he would be able to talk his place on the team again that season. Some one hinted that Wrightsey was surely heavy enough for a foot-ball player. A few days later Frank was given a suit and asked to come out and practice. He had a keen eye, good judgment and plenty of muscle to back them and soon he was given a place on the team. It was not long before he was a better man in his position than his predecessor had been. The first real game in which Frank played was a hard one but he held his man, and played a steady game. Once he broke through the line, seized a fumbled ball, and carried it twenty five yards for a touch down.

How opinions did change then! How the fellows gathered round after the game and shook his hand and vied with each other in their congeatulations. "You're all right?" "Wrightsey!" "Who's all right?" "Wrightsey!". "I propose three cheers for Wrightsey, are you all ready? hip, hip, hurrah, hurrah, hurrah!" The girls too, who had made fun of him before, now lionized him as their hero. He was surprised at this sudden wave of popularity, which bore him along.

A few days after this game, the college girls gave a reception to the foot-ball team. Of course the hero was invited. His class sisters were standing in a little knot, together, as he entered the parlor and there for the first time he was formally introduced to them. He had incidentally and informally met two of them before—Kit Kelly and May Fields. He had offered them some courtesy which they had at first seemed grateful to accept, but afterward they had turned in into a proctical joke at his expense. They had never apologized and so now were very much embarrassed after the introduction. They tried to conceal their confusion by overwhelming Frank with praise for his fine foot-ball playing. "Didn't you hear us shouting for you last Saturday, Mr. Wrights? They could not have played at all if you had not been there. We girls just watched you all the time," said Kit, as soon as she had acknowledged him. Each girl as he bowed to her tried to out do the others in her admiring flattery. Only Blanche was modest, and evidently sincere as she said "We are proud to have you belong to our class Mr. Wrights, for you have brought credit to us as well as to yourself." Frank was not elegant in his movements nor brilliant in conversation, but he had a kindly and agreeable reserve that found the favor of all who met him.

No longer did any one laugh at his "I reckon," "its all" etc., nor at his "fud" (for food), and so he began to recite every part of his lessons well. "Nothing succeeds like success." Being encouraged by the kindly feeling of all, so constantly expressed to him, his awkwardness gradually disappeared and a distinguished dignity and strength of bearing, which graceful men never possess, took its place. His provincial and rustic expressions were lost in a clear forceful Anglo-Saxon style of speech.

* * * * * * *

Space forbids my telling of the rest of his college days except this. He graduated summa cum laude, and took a $200 prize for the best oration delivered on Commencement Day. His college course was supplemented by that of a professional school from which he graduated last June with high honors. But he had won another prize in a more quiet way and I hold in my hand to-day the following:

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Avery request your presence at the marriage of their daughter Blanche
to
Mr. Frank Wrights,
Hazelwood, Pittsburg,
August twentieth,
Eighteen hundred and ninety-five.

Vincent B. Fisk, '97.

THE PITTSBURG BANQUET.

The Bucknell Alumni Association of Pittsburg, held its annual banquet at the Hotel Duquesne in that city on March 30.

Rev. Leroy Stephens, D. D., presided and spoke of the beneficial influence that the admission of women to the College classes has had upon the school. C. H. Hunter, Esq. of Greensburg, represented the Legal Profession; Rev. J. S. Hutson, '66, of Allegheny City spoke for the Clerical Profession; W. W. Woodman, M. D., '88, of McKeesport, for the Medical; Rev. J. W. Moody for the Journalistic; Mr. James B. Stevenson for the Mercantile; Rev. L. C. Barnes, D. D., for Sister Colleges. President Harris spoke in recognition of the valuable service rendered to Bucknell by graduates of other colleges residing in the state. He also referred to the change in the personnel of the College; formerly three-fifths of the collegiates were candidates for the ministry, now only one-fourth, tho' the number of such students is greater than in former years. There is need of increased accommodation for the students, and he is now seeking for one thousand persons who will furnish the funds—Rev. J. S. Hutson was elected President of the Club; W. M. Woodward, M. D., Secretary and Mr. James B. Stevenson, Treasurer.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Miller, '96, spent his vacation in Philadelphia.

Bunnell, '97, was at Watsontown, socially inclined, on March 27.

Professor Rockwood and wife visited in Milton on Wednesday, April 1.

Miss Goddard, '97, has taken the place of Ezra Allen, '95, as chapel organist.

Doctor Groff has an article in the Lewisburg Journal for April 3, on "The Water Supply for Farms."

Professor Hulley was at the University of Chicago paying a visit to President Harper during vacation.

The Sigma Alpha Epsilon's are hard at work on the lot connected with their chapter house. Whether the result will be a corn-patch or the much-desired tennis court remains to be seen.

The Seniors will be especially interested in Mrs. Hulley's article on Dr. Robinson; having studied his book on Ethics last term.

Miss Mary Bartol, of Michigan and Mr. John B. Cressinger, of U. of P. have promised letters on University Life in the near future.

Messrs. Barner, '97, Flint, '98, Thomas, '98, and Meserve, '99, held a week's revival services in Dauphin, and were very successful in their work.

Warren, '99, and Rawlinson, '99, have been assisting Rev. Frank H. Farley, pastor of the Baptist Church at Milton, in a series of very successful evangelical meetings.

Miss Mary B. Harris, who has been pursuing graduate courses at Bucknell during this year, left for the University of Chicago on Monday morning, March 30, where she will study in the department of Comparative Philology.

Professor Martin is giving an honor course in Inductive Logic this term. The course consists in a comparative study of Ballentine's, Davis', Mills', and Minto's treatises on Inductive Logic, and a thesis giving the result of the study.

Mr. Dillon, the local editor of the MIRROR, spent vacation at Erie and has not yet returned. In his default the present column was scratched up at the eleventh hour by the Editor-in-Chief and the Devil. Mr. Sherman kindly furnished Academy Notes in lieu of Mr. Rowe.

Prof. Perrine delivered a lecture at Wyoming, Saturday, "On What Constitutes an English Classic." Other lectures in this course will be delivered on Pope and on Wordsworth. This is the third course Dr. Perrine has given at that place. His audiences have been larger and more enthusiastic with each lecture.

Doctor Enoch Perrine had charge of the last meeting of the Shikellimo Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution which will be held at the home of Mrs. William C. Walls. He lead a discussion of the life and times of Col. James Potter, who was prominent in this section during the Revolution.

Mr. Harvey B. Marsh, a former member of the class of '97 in this University, is visiting at his uncle's, Pres. Harris. Mr. Marsh is studying in the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania and holds a prominent place in track athletics there. While at Bucknell he was a member of the Varsity Baseball and Football teams.

The College Girls' Glee Club, assisted by Doctor Aviragnet and musical talent from the Seminary, held its first annual concert in Bucknell Hall on Monday evening, March 23. This is the first organization of the kind made up entirely of ladies which has existed at Bucknell, and they outdid themselves and all the Glee Clubs in the program which was presented.

On Friday evening, March 20, the members of the School of Music under the Direction of Doctor Aviragnet, gave a concert in Bucknell Hall. The instrumental music by Misses McClure, Jones, Aikin, Silvers, and Mr. J. Brown Martin, and the vocal music by Miss Riah Heinen, and Mr. Graham Marr, to say nothing of the excellent violin solo by Master William Bartol, all reflected great credit on the able Director of the musical department.

The residents of Franklin, Pa., have recently been enjoying, in sermon and lecture, the discourses of our popular professor, Dr. Lincoln Hulley. For the past six weeks he has been supplying for Dr. Brown who went there April 1, the pulpit of the Baptist Church, of which the Hon. Chas. Miller, a trustee of our University, is a prominent member. His excellent lecture readings on Riley and Burns were delivered before appreciative audiences on two successive Saturday evenings, March 21 and 28.

The Euepia Literary Society held its first meeting for this term on Friday evening, April 3. The following officers were elected: President, John V. Lesher, '97; Vice President, D. S. Grim, '97; Critic, E. C. Kunkle, '97; Secretary, G. M. Davis, '98; Treasurer, A. A. Smith, '98; Librarian, H. Harris Bower, '96. The following question was decided upon for the preliminary debate on April 10: Resolved that the presidential term should be lengthened to six years, and the President made ineligible to re-election.

On Sunday afternoon, April 5, the Baptist chapel at Pine Grove was dedicated with appropriate exercises. The choir rendered several appropriate selections, and Rev. J. T. Judd preached the dedication sermon. Dr. Harris offered the prayer of dedication. Among the others from the University who took part were Prof. A. B. Stewart, S. R. Wood, G. M. Davis, and J. C. Hazen. The building and grounds cost about $1,275 and has all been paid for except about $250. It was erected under the supervision of the Lewisburg Baptist Church.

Arrangements have been almost completed by the joint committee from Euepia and Theta Alpha for a debate against Dickinson. The debate will be held on May 29, in Lewisburg, each college being represented by three men. The Bucknell debaters will decide on the question and the Dickinson men will choose the side. Dickinson has already chosen her representatives and Bucknell will choose hers by a preliminary contest on Friday evening, April 17, which will probably be held in Bucknell Hall. The President Judges of the courts of Lancaster, Union and Northumberland counties will decide the contest. Every society man at Bucknell should work with a will during the next two weeks so we will be represented by the best debaters in the school.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Blanche Campbell, of Williamsport, has been visiting Miss Emma Kunkle.

The Institute has, thus far, welcomed four new students: Misses Taggart, McCaslin, Getz, and Sidler.

The two recitation rooms, A and B, have been greatly improved by changing the arrangement of the seats and treating them to fresh paint.

Mrs. Larison spent the vacation in Washington, D. C. The amount of sight-seeing she did in one week was remarkable, an account of which may appear in a later edition.

The attraction of Easter Sunday at home has proved too much for the faithfulness of some of our students, for they have at this date, April 4, not put in an appearance.

The Essay Contest, to which the Seniors and Fourth-years have been looking forward with much interest and anxiety, took place Friday morning, April 2, the subject of the Seniors being taken from "The Essay of Elia," and that of the Fourth-years being "The Vision of Sir Launfal." And now all members of both classes are waiting, with mingled hope and dread, for June when they will know the result of this contest.

A most delightful innovation in our social life is promised this term. The faculty and young ladies who live at the Institute intend to give on the thirteenth and twenty-seventh of April, and the eleventh and twenty-fifth of May "At Homes" in the parlors, from 4 until 6 p. m. All their friends and the friends and patrons of the school are most cordially invited. Please remember this invitation, the first date being April thirteenth from 4 until 6 p. m.

ACADEMY NEWS.

Sherman spent Sunday and Monday with Wenck, at Northumberland.

Shorty took care of the Gym. fires (that they did not get too hot) during vacation.

Dickinson says he will take no more contracts to furnish the Sem. girls with cats—at night.

August Shuhart, who completed his course in the Academy last term, has returned home but will be back to enter college next September.

We rejoice with Principal and Mrs. Edwards that Rodger is improving rapidly from his recent, severe attack of inflammatory rheumatism.

We regret that Reed of the Fourth Form and Anthony of the Third have left school for the rest of the year. The former has accepted a position as teacher in the Muncy Normal School.

The Williamsport High School has invited the Academy to join in a series of athletic contests. The other contestants are to be: High School, Dickinson Seminary, and Bellefonte Academy. The invitation will doubtless be accepted.

During the last snow, Wenck brought to town a sleighing party of girls, from Northumberland. The College and Academy furnished the boys. All enjoyed themselves. It was given in honor of the Fourth Form.

The Adelphia Literary Society elected officers on Friday, April 3, as follows: Pres., E. Johnson; Vice Pres., Alexander; Sec., Shields; Treasurer, R. Harris; First Critic, Skinner; Critic at Large, E. Bell; Chaplin, Wolfe; Curator, Edwards; Sargent-at-arms, Groff.

The Hermenians have elected the following as their officers for this term: Pres., Pearse; V. Pres., Ayers; Sec., Marcus; First Critic, Sherman, Second Critic, B. Bower; Treas., Wager; Censor, H. B. C.' Riemer; Chaplain, Ayers; Librarian, Culp; Sargent-at-arms, Fleming Bower.

ADDRESSES WANTED.

The Registrar of the University will be grateful for the present addresses of the following Alumni and Former Students of the College:

(In case of death kindly give the year.)

APRIL 25, 1896.

ALL of the articles appearing in the MIRROR within the last too months were written by special request and it is necessary that such a policy in general be carried out. The editor must arrange for most of the material several numbers ahead. But that does not relieve the students from the obligation of contributing to their college paper. Poems, stories, articles on features of school-life are at present deemed most desirable and for such your humble servant will be very much obliged. Ed-in-Ch.

THE new departure in the social life at Bucknell, introduced in the form of the recent "At Home" given by the College Girls to all the students of the University, is most commendable. That this thoroughly enjoyable event is to be followed by others of like nature is a matter of congratulation to the young men at "The Hill." No one of the students can afford to disregard these opportunities for self-culture. It will not always be our lot to live in a world of books; we shall soon find ourselves in a world of living men and women, all of whom will have claims upon us, and a neglect of present opportunities to develop our social faculties means that we shall fail to meet and properly discharge our obligations to them. "None of us liveth to himself," is a truth universal. Books and recitations cannot furnish all the equipments necessary to a complete education; social intercourse is an essential element in such an equipment, and no student is just to himself who fails to take advantage of these opportunities for social culture. Mrs. Larison and the College Girls are to be congratulated upon their eminently successful reception of the thirteenth inst.

WE feel that any discussion of base ball interests will seem trite to many students, especially to those who are now in their third or fourth year at Bucknell, and yet there are some things connected with this branch of our athletics which deserve comment. We have reasons to congratulate ourselves upon having more and better material than we have had for at least five years. Under such circumstances to experience a losing season will be the greater disgrace. The abundance of material is not of itself sufficient to insure a winning team. Wise management, careful planning and an intelligent distribution and disposition of the men, supplemented by an entire absence of favoritism are essential to a successful and satisfactory season in base ball. When, after careful consideration, the Advisory Board has planned a course of procedure for the game, it is both unwise and illegitimate for an individual to disregard these plans. If the game is won, it is in all probability not because of this disregard for plans, but in spite of it, and such a victory is too hazardous. With this little admonition the editorial-writer extends best wishes to the Baseball team of '96 for a winning season.

MY TIME.

It aint no use to talk to me
'Bout kentry joys in Summer time;
Nor 'bout the Fall, with bush and tree
Rigged out in colors so sublime.

Of course some folks may think it nice,
With snow a kiverin' all the groun',
To slide, an' skeet upon the ice,
An hear the sleigh bells jinglin' roun'.

But I'll jest tell you, boys, right here.
You're welcome to what fun there be
In any other time o' year,
But Spring's the time that just strikes me.

No zero wind a howlin' roun',
Nor snow a blowin' in yer face;
No boilin' sun a peltin' down,
With skeeters buzzin' every place.

But jest the softest, mildest breeze,
A kind o' sight that nature heaves
On wakin', blowin' through the trees.
An' sort o' coaxin' out the leaves.

You don't feel now like goin' south
To hunt a warmer atmosphere,
But jest like openin' up yer mouth
An' drinkin' down what we have here.

Uv course you'r liable to git
The "fever," Ha, the very thing
To make you willin' jest to sit
An' take in all there be of Spring.

E. R. Powell, '96.

LARRY.

Larry arose tired and unrefreshed; he sat upon the edge of his bed in the "doss house" and moralized while awaiting his turn at the tin basin on a soap-box in the corner; if he had been five cents richer the night before, he could have secured a fifteen cent bed and a decent rest, now he was wretched in body and mind with nothing in the world but two bananas which were to be his breakfast. And all this came from trying to be good. Some kind people at a Mission had taught him that it was wrong to sleep upon a grocer's coal box where he could have cool, fresh air and be in nobody's way. As he drew on his shoes and walked across the room, he wondered whether "being good" paid.

He took a wash, and getting his bananas from the one legged keeper, he went out of the house and across the street into Franklin Square—one of the City's prettiest little local Parks—he walked under the trees to the fountain playing in the centre of the square and sat down there upon a bench. As the sunlight showed up his features one could easily see that the boy was no gamin by birth, and, rather than one by profession, he was a victim of circumstances. His head was well formed, his eyes were bright, his ears and hands were well shaped; all went to show that he and his clothes were misfits.

Larry ate his bananas without apparent relish or disrelish, sharing one of them with a group of dirty, old-faced children who had left off play around the fountain and gathered in front of him. The bananas were finished, the children went back to their play, and Larry's breakfast was over. Now he draws a necktie from his pocket and arranges it with a skill which might have been born from an inherited refinement of taste. He is now ready to work—to work a certain down town Doctor who had become interested in him the day before at St. M—'s Hospital, where he was visiting a sick friend. The Doctor had been in a hurry, and, and asking Larry a few strange questions about his mother and his early life, had given him an address, requesting him to call the next morning.

As the boy walked along the street, he tried to think of all he knew about his mother; she had died when he was about five years old, leaving him in the care of a man supposed to be his father, yet whom he called "Jake" just as his mother had done. Jake was harmless, but his harmlessness coupled with a spree of drunkenness got him six months in jail almost before the funeral of his wife was over. The day after Jake's arrest, Larry went to the same little park in which he had eaten his breakfast this morning, and there he had played with the children; he remembered how an old lady going by had laid her hand upon his head and said to a young man with her:—"This child may some day become President of the United States." And the young man replied:—"It is possible, yet I would wager that he will ruin his chances by being sent to jail." His words were prophetic, for on the next day Larry was arrested for stealing something to eat and sent to the House of Correction for two years. "Oh yes! it would be dead easy to tell the Doctor all about it."

Around the Bulletin in front of the Times office had gathered the usual morning crowd, and

Larry had to go out into the street to get around it, a trolley car was just passing and for some reason the crowd surged from the pavement at that moment, a cry was heard, a body was seen between the car wheels. it was drawn out by tender hands, and the boy as he was carried to the pavement whispered:—"Take me to St. M—'s Hospital."

In his down town office the Doctor anxiously awaited the arrival of the lad in whom he had become so deeply interested.

The Doctor had hardly come into the prime of life yet he had already made his reputation as a specialist and was looked up to as an authority in his profession. He had also made his practice pay, and he occupied his modest mansion with what his friends called a "royal batchelor style." The time had now come when he must make his visit to the Hospital where he was one of the head physicians; he left a note with his housekeeper for a boy who might come, and departed quite dissatisfied.

As soon as he had entered the Hospital, a Sister from the Accident ward came and asked him to come in haste to a dying man who in his moments of consciousness had repeatedly called for him. The Doctor lost no time in making his way to the Accident ward, but he was too late; the patient was living his last moments; in his hand was clutched the string of a locket which had been hanging from his neck. The Doctor opened the locket, a glance was sufficient, and as Larry gasped out his last breath the Doctor kissed his cheek and murmured:—"This for your mother."

STUDENT LIFE AT THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr Editor:—Student life at the University of Pennsylvania as a result of environment, is, of necessity, quite different from that within the halls of Bucknell. The large number of students and absence of dormitories are two factors which in the past have made our life here a unique one.

Each man, be he athlete or book-worm, or be he that ideal combination of athlete and scholar, has his own coterie of friends, and moves in a circle whose limits are often more constricted than they would be at a much smaller institution. Here also one comes much less closely in contact with his teacher and must be more independent, more self-reliant than at good old Bucknell, where every professor was a personal friend, ready to counsel and advise as well as instruct.

The advent of the dormitory system will bring a closer relationship of student to student; but from the large student body and the lecture system of instruction, personal contact with professors is to a great extent impracticable.

Of societies, we have a large number, covering a large field. Of social import, we have the college fraternity and in addition medical, legal and dental fraternities. A pleasant feature of the professional courses is the society for work and research in especial lines. In the medical school, some ten such societies exist and do a great work in maintaining a lively interest in medical progress. One of the most prominent organizations in the University is the "Mask and Wig" club whose annual performance during the week following Easter is always an event of the season.

In athletics, we are represented in every branch of college sport save basket-ball, which for some unexplained reason is left to the schools and athletic associations of the Y. M. C. A. All sports at the University are controlled by graduate committees, and the sound judgment of maturer years has undoubtedly a beneficial influence on the selection and management of our teams. Ability and stick-to-it-iveness will invariably win a place for the athlete on any of Penn's teams or crews. Our success in athletics for the past few years has unmistakably demonstrated that merit, pluck, perseverance and a oneness of purpose are the essentials of true sportsmanship and winning teams, the prime requisites for success.

As to amusements, our opportunities are unlimited; likewise our temptations. The theatre is generally well patronized by our students, and be it said to their credit, none but the best receive their approval. The opera and concert, lecture and recital, exhibits of paintings and sculpture are all available to cultivate and entertain. Many are the wild rumors that float about as to the wild midnight orgies of the student, and particularly the medical student. Let me say to the prospective "Med," do not expect to find us so bad as we are pictured. We do go to church; we do take off our hats at meals; we do retain at least a trace of civilization.

But amid all these attractions one's mind will wander back betimes to the old brick building on the hill, and many a sigh of regret escapes one, thinking of "old Bucknell" and the days there that passed, and passed but too swiftly by.

John B. Cressinger, '93.

BUCKNELL STUDENTS AT CHICAGO.

How are the boys doing at Chicago? That question has been asked me many times this week. They are all doing well, and all seem to think the opportunities of study at Chicago are unsurpassed anywhere in the United States.

Dr. Clarence Castle. The first I saw of Dr. Castle was on the platform of the auditorium where the "Convocation" exercises were held. It is well known that during this past year he has been advanced to the rank of Associate Professor at a salary of $2500.00. The Professor's recent trip to Greece was a great pleasure to him.

J. W. A. Young. He is the same man of "massive eye, and eagle brain" that he was here at Bucknell. His daily food is logarithms, and n dimensions of space. He has done distinguished work in his department, has had a promotion, and is scheduled for a new and valuable course next summer quarter in the pedagogy of Mathematics.

Mr. Ralph Catterall. At the opening of the Spring quarter the members of Catterall's class spent a good portion of their time in a vain search for the teacher. An apparently new man had his chair. It was Catterall himself but what a change! He too has had a promotion to "Tutor." His advancement has been very marked, having gone in three steps from Fellow, Assistant, Reader, Docent, to Tutor. The members of the University have all heard of the fame of Catterall's work, and speak of him as a very able man.

Mr. A. R. E. Wyant. I met Wyant at the Auditorium. He is now the pastor of the church at Morgan Park. Within six months, under his care, the membership of the church has been increased by 73 new members. A recent action of the Y. M. C. A. has placed Wyant on the "Supervisory Committee of the Y. M. C. A. athletic league of the U. S. for the Central States. The Ministers Association of Chicago has made him its treasurer, and he has been asked also to assume charge of athletics at Pine Lake Assembly, a Baptist resort in Indiana.

E. M. Heim. Heim is regarded in high favor. Dr. VonHolst who recently went to Germany for six months, turned his house over to Heim, and as a mark of special confidence, the latter is the inmate of the great historian's study. Heim expects now to begin his Doctor's thesis, and to do the bulk of his work in Prof. VonHolsts' library. Heim and Catterall are members of a select club which meets to discuss history subjects. Professor Judson and friend speak warmly of Heim's work in Political Science, and History and the boys talk of Heim's German research powers.

R. B. Davidson. Davidson has achieved a gratifying popularity as a singer. During the Winter at the great concert, in the Auditorium, given by the University glee club, Davidson sang no less than seven solos. He was repeatedly encored. He is Assistant Superintendent of the Hyde Park Baptist S. S. and will be the Precentor of the new choir, organized in the new University. He has been doing special work in Hebrew and Arabic under Pres. Harper. His other Professors have been Dr. Galusha Anderson, Dr. Breasted, Dr. Hulbert, Dr. Northrup, Dr. Johnson, and Dr. Burton.

Ralph Snow. Snow is working hard, and making a fine reord. Dr. Hewitt told me he was one of the best men in the Divinity School, and gives promise of a great preacher. Others spoke of him as one of the most acceptable preachers out there. He is out every Sunday, and goes to some of the best pulpits of Illinois, and Indiana.

Miss Mary B. Harris. I saw Miss Harris on the day of her arrival. The next day I found her in the classical library, deep in the pages of Lucretius. On the table lay her copy of Roman Tragedy. Its fierce looking cover suggested its difficult contents, but, mirabile dictu, the climax was reached when she informed me that her third course was to be Latin Epigraphy. She likes her work, surroundings, professors, and House. Profs. Miller, Abbot and Chandler teach these subjects and have great reputations, but it is the writer's humble opinion that our own Professor Frank E. Rockwood is equal, if not superior, to any of these men both in his knowledge of Latin, and his teaching ability.

David Philips. Mr. Philips likes Chicago. He speaks warmly of the opportunities there. He rooms in middle dormitory, and the students there speak of Philips' midnight oil, and his great faithfulness to duty.

The spirit of Allen still haunts the place, though he is not there any longer. Mr. Calvin and his wife are there, and like the place very much. Unfortunately I did not see enough of them to inquire particularly into their welfare. They all said "remember me to the boys at Bucknell." President Harper spoke enthusiastically of the good work our boys are doing there and have done, and spoke with pleasure of his visit to Bucknell in June. Lincoln Hulley.

THE RELAY RACE.

When about the middle of last term, Bucknell received an invitation from the University of Pennsylvania to send a team to the annual intercollegiate relay races, it did not take athletic director Cober and Captain Slifer and a few other interested parties long to decide that we could enter a pretty strong quartette of sprinters and at least make a favorable showing in the contests which take place on Franklin Field, Philadelphia this afternoon, April 25. Fourteen young men who take interest in track sports, immediately volunteered their services and started individual training until the beginning of this term since which time they have all been carefully working under trainer Cober. But the question of finances came up and the Executive Committee on Athletics refused to sanction the race until this matter was straightened which was easily done by the Finance Committee authorizing captain Slifer to receive subscriptions. He found the students almost unanimously in favor of the team and soon the necessary funds were raised.

Outdoor training began as soon as the snow was off of the ground and then the team met its only hindrance—because we have no track near at hand to practice upon and this is one of the most striking necessities in our college athletics. Still the candidates worked with vigor and an interclass relay race was arranged for April 11, at Brook Park track. The condition of the track did not permit of the quarter-mile relays being run so a 280 yards dash was held on the back stretch. The candidates were divided into groups and Prof. Bartol who takes especial interest in these sprinting contests, held the official time while Mr. Bunnell acted as starter. Considering the poor track, the time made was very good and the finish was as follows:

First group—Pearse, Slifer, Young, and Barrett; time 34 seconds.

Second group—Conover, Dillon, Riemer, and Fithian; time 34 seconds.

Third group—Meeker, Smith, Pierson, Mulkie, and Rowe; time 34¾ seconds.

From the nine best candidates in this race, the Bucknell team was chosen on the following Saturday.

In Philadelphia, F. B. Ellis, Esq., manager for Pennsylvania, did every thing possible to insure a successful intercollegiate meeting. All the leading colleges in the United States and Canada were invited to send teams and these were divided into groups as nearly equal in ability as possible. Any college that felt strong enough to enter the contest for the championship of America was permitted to do so. The race was designated as being for one mile divided into quarter mile relays withfour colleges in each contest for trophy prizes. Bucknell is classed with State College, Dickinson, and Franklin and Marshall. Later an invitation was extended to Bucknell to enter a five mile race of one mile relays on the same day but was not accepted. To get the public interested, the picture of the captain and other information concerning each team was published in the Philadelphia papers. Then the best seats were reserved for the college men and arranged so that the supporters of each team might sit together. And lastly, to make the visit to Philadelphia more pleasant, committees of students from the University of Pennsylvania were appointed to meet each team and show them any points of interest they might wish to see. Through the kind efforts of W. Norman Morris, Esq., one of our successful graduates, good rates and a comfortable location was secured for the Bucknell boys at the Hotel Hanover in the heart of the city.

Throughout the trial contests, the spirit shown has been everybody for the success of the college and those who failed to be one of the five successful candidates to wear the orange and blue at the races to-day, feel that they were given a fair chance to prove their ability as sprinters. The team has been given a neat, regulation outfit suitable for track contests. Frank W. Dillon.

THE UNIVERSITY'S SEMI-CENTENNIAL.

The next commencement, which takes place June 19–24, is the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the institution. In order that the occasion may be appropriately celebrated and that the semi-centennial may become a prominent part in the history of the university, large efforts have been put forth to make the occasion one of great interest to all the friends of the university.

On Sunday morning of commencement week President Harris will deliver the historical address in the Baptist church. Rev. E. H. Johnson, D. D., of Crozer Theological Seminary, will preach the sermon before the Pennsylvania Baptist Education Society, in the evening, The oration before the literary societies will be pronounced by President William R. Harper, LL. D., of the University of Chicago. The address to the Alumni will be delivered by Professor Milton Evans, D. D., of Crozer Theological Seminary: The Alumni poem will be read by Mr. Charles J. Wolfe, of Lewisburg. Kerr B. Tupper, D. D., of Philadelphia, will deliver the address to the College graduating class, and H. L. Wayland, D. D., of the New York Examiner, will be the principal speaker at the corporation dinner. Miss Lucia Meade Priest, of Boston, will be the speaker before the Alumnae of the Institute, on Monday afternoon.

A history of the University will be published in honor of the occasion. This work is now rapidly going forward under the direction of the President of the university. Among other features it will contain excellent engravings and half-tones of the following who were prominent in the founding of the university or who at one time taught here:

William Bucknell, John P. Crozer, Benjamin Griffith, David Jayne, Eugenio Kincaid, George M. Spratt, Henry G. Weston, Thomas Watson, S. W. Taylor, Howard Malcom, Justin R. Loomis, G. R. Bliss, C. S. James, and Francis W. Tustin.

The history will also contain the historical address of President Harris, extracts from the charter, list of trustees and other officers, professors, instructors, alumni, matriculates, alumnae and other matter of historical importance, besides principal events year by year including the attendance, etc.

The history will be gotten up in substantial style and will be printed on heavy plate paper. It will make a souvenir worthy of the occasion and every friend of the university should be provided with a copy. Copies of the history may be subscribed for in advance by addressing the Registrar of the university.

The music will be in charge of Dr. Aviragnet whose success in bringing together musicians of great ability insures all commencement visitors that the music at the coming anniversary will be of a high order.

Special railroad rates will be secured and arrangement will be made with the hotels and boarding houses for the accommodation of the many visitors expected.

The college graduating class this year numbers 35 members. The graduates from the Institute School of Music number twenty. Large classes usually mean a large commencement. The large classes graduating this year and the commencement being the half-way mark in the university's century will attract a large crowd here next June.

ATHLETICS.

Following is the schedule of games as arranged by the Business Manager of the baseball team:

April 18, Watsontown at Lewisburg.
April 25, Bloomsburg at Lewisburg.
April 27, Watsontown at Watsontown.
May 2, Indians at Lewisburg.
May 9, Lock Haven Normal at Lock Haven.
May 16, Dickinson at Lewisburg.
May 23, Bloomsburg at Bloomsburg.
May 30, Gettysburg at Lewisburg.
June 6, Dickinson at Carlisle.
June 13, Gettysburg at Gettysburg.
June 20, Lock Haven at Lewisburg.
June 24, Open at Lewisburg.

On April 11th, the baseball team played its opening game with the Milton team on the Bucknell campus. As this was the first appearance of the team everybody was anxious to "get a line" on the work. Considering the weakness of the Milton team it would be unfair to judge the team by its performance on Saturday. However, several of the men showed considerable form and improvement. Brady caught and batted much better than ever before, while among the new men, Conover showed up the best. The Peddie man fielded well and batted hard—hitting safely every time he came up. All the pitchers were tried and all showed up well, Page especially doing good work. Team play seemed to be the greatest weakness. Following is the score:

Y. M. C. A.

The annual sermon before the Christian Associations of the University was delivered on Sunday morning, April 12, by Rev. Wayland Hoyt, D.D. In the evening Dr. Hoyt gave one of his characteristic, and instructive addresses before the Christian Endeavor Society.

On Tuesday evening, April 28, Dr. Hoyt will deliver his lecture entitled: "Lessons From a Noble Life," based on the life of Arnold of Rugby. It is very gratifying that we can announce to the public that Dr. Hoyt will so soon again appear before the students and patrons of the University. The lecture will be given in Bucknell Hall under the auspices of the college Y. M. C. A. for the benefit of the Northfield Fund. Admission 25 cents. Tickets on sale at the usual places.

During the Easter Vacation the Y. M. C. A. Band, composed of Messrs. Barner, Flint, Thomas and Meserve held a series of very successful evangelistic services at Dauphin, Pa. About 25 conversions are reported.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Trailing arbutus parties have been in season during the month.

The baseball crank, the bicycle freak, and the tennis girls are on the turf again.

Mr. Josephs reciting in Theism: "Science is the observation of scientific scientists."

Already the work of clearing up the campus for commencement is being pushed forward.

The Juniors have decided to wear the regulation cap and gown at their commencement exercises in June, 1897.

This warm weather makes us long for that pure, filtered ice water again. Call up the ice man, please, Mr. Registrar.

A local paper says that Lewisburg ladies have formed a class for the pursuit of literary study under the direction of Prof. Perrine.

Messrs. Fisk, Hall, Hunt, and Martin assisted in the production of "Little Women" by the Institute Y. W. C. A. a short time ago.

Co. A. of the N. G. P. located in Lewisburg was inspected recently. Macnab, Collins, Cober and several others are our college "sojer" boys.

Field Day will be some Saturday next month at Brook Park track. All the classes should enter teams in these contests for the "Mirror" Cup.

The College Girls' Glee Club has disbanded for the year but will reorganize in the Fall. The MIRROR congratulates them on their very successful season.

H. C. Fithian, '98, was confined to his room several days as a result of exposure and overexertion at the preliminary contests in sprinting on the 18th ult.

All who attended the Y. P. S. C. E. free social at the Baptist Church, Saturday evening, April 11, report a delightful time and the formation of many acquaintanceships.

"College Prizes" was the subject of President Harris' lecture at the opening of the term on Monday, April 6. He said that the greatest prize was found in the formation of a true, strong character.

Robert B. McCay was chosen floor manager of the annual "stag" dance at the gymnasium, April 24. The "professor" takes great pleasure in this style of pedal exercise.

We are pleased to welcome Mr. Hile who has come to take a course at Bucknell. He has a good record in athletics and will be found on the 'Varsity baseball team this term.

The next important event in our social existence is the pleasant literary exercises of the Institute, otherwise called the "Soiree" which will be held next Saturday evening, May 2.

The tennis courts have been put into good shape by the admirers of the game and interesting contests are of daily occurrence. As usual the annual tournament will begin in May.

Last Saturday evening, the Freshman contest in declamation for the young men was held in Bucknell Hall. The contestants were Bayard, Cober, Deibler, Devall, Hanna, Jenkinson, Keen, Meeker, and Morris.

W. M. Bunnell, '97, has organized a choir of our best male voices to lead chapel singing hereafter. This is a most agreeable improvement and may be the means of getting a college glee club in shape for next year.

Friday evening, May 22, is the date of the Junior "Ex." Those chosen to be the orators on this occasion are: Misses Goddard, Hartley, Hanna, and Taylor, and Messrs. Barner, Fisk, Rivenburg, Sinton, and Summerbell.

The Juniors are having their turn at star gazing this term. When one young man learns where to look for the moon and another finds out that the surrounding stars are not Jupiter's moons, then we will further record their observations.

Prof. Lincoln Hulley gave his lecture on "Burns" in Bucknell Hall, Friday evening, April 17. The fact that our popular young orator gave the readings was an assurance of a pleased audience and considerable proceeds for the baseball team.

In the last issue, the MIRROR unintentionally omitted mention of Theta Alpha's reception to its friends and the members of Zeta Society in the society hall, Friday evening, March 20. The literary program and refreshments were enjoyed by all.

The Seniors have decided to invite the ex-members of ninety-six to the annual class banquet which will be held sometime during the week before commencement at the Hotel Updegraff in Williamsport.

These warm evenings, the Bucknell band has been giving a few outdoor concerts and at the same time getting some needed practice in drilling and marching on the campus in anticipation of attending a big parade of the Odd Fellows reunion at Watsontown, on April 27.

Theta Alpha Literary Society recently elected the following officers for this term. President, J. W. Davis,'96; Vice President, R. T. Wiltbank, Jr., '95; Critic, F. Hollinshead, '97; Secretary, A. L. Hanna, '99; Treasurer, D. K. Laudenslager, '98; Censor, M. R. Collins, '97; and Curator, J. R. L. Diggs, '98.

At the Grand Arch Council of the Phi Kappa Psi college fraternity held at Cleveland, Ohio this month. Bucknell was represented by Charles Koonce, E. M. Green, W. C. Gretzinger, and L. C. Walkinshaw. Mr. Gretzinger responded to the toast on "Pan Hellenism" and was elected editor of the fraternity's official organ, the Shield.

At the preliminary debates on April 10, the following were chosen to represent their literary organizations in the inter-society debate. The contest was held Friday evening, April 24, when the affirmative side was handled by Harris, Grim, Bower, Hering, and Wiltbank of Euepia, and the negative by Johnson, Kunkle, Fithian, Diggs, and Carringer of Theta Alpha.

The Zeta Literary Lociety elected the following officers for the ensuing year:—President, Miss Mary Rohrer; Vice President, Miss Kate Goddard; Recording Secretary, Miss Mary Wilson; Treasurer, Miss Mary Stephens; Critics, Miss Nellie Taylor, Miss Anna Rodgers; Program Committee, Miss Wolfe, Miss Hanna, Miss Chambers, and Miss Thomas; Executive Committee, Miss DeWolfe, and Miss H. Allen.

A rather queer accident that luckily did not result fatally occurred on the athletic field one afternoon recently. Devall was playing centre field and Grim second-base when a fly ball was sent between them. Both rushed for it at full speed and as neither coacher nor captain yelled in time, a collision resulted. It was hard enough to throw both players to the ground and prevent them from farther practice that day.

Will some one please tell us why it is that several young men have the habit of sprinting at break-neck speed for over half a square to beat a few fast freight of six or seven cars past the crossing?

An increased number of students is taking the honor course in Sociology this year. The work consists of

I. Study and written review of Maccun's "Ethics of Citizenship."

II. Thesis of not less than two thousand words on

1. Compulsory Arbitration,
2. The Old Charity and the New, or
3. Wages.

Mr. Christian Van Gundy who lives near the Institute, Prof. Owens, Rev. Judd, and Judge McClure were visited by one or more burglars, Saturday night, April 18. The financial losses amount to something less than $100. The boro authorities have offered a reward of $300 for the apprehension of the parties. Some of our braver friends on the hill are telling how they would handle the burglar if he should come into the college.

We are informed that very few of the college boys took advantage of the kind invitation to attend the first "At Home" at the Institute, Monday afternoon, April 13. The fact that this is something new at Bucknell ought not to keep away those who would otherwise attend. If the young men would only show their appreciation of the social gatherings now arranged, we are sure that the number of these would be carrespondingly increased. Boys, don't be backward but let us all attend the next "At Home."

The article by John B. Cressinger, B. U. '93, U. of P., '96, is the first of a series. Next edition will contain a delightful description of Yale Life by Jas. M. Kendall, '94. He describes the spirit of the place and doings of the students in a way that will be of interest and should be of profit to every Bucknell student. In the edition of May 15. Alfred Hayes, Jr., Ex-'95, will write of Princeton Life with a special reference to the intercollegiate debates in which he was a representative of Princeton. Miss Mary Bartol '94, will follow with "Student Life at the University of Michigan."

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Hibbard a graduate of Pratt Institute is the guest of our principal.

During part of Dr. Hoyt's stay in Lewisburg he was entertained at the Institute.

We regret that only four of the five Seniors in the music department will be able to graduate this year, Miss Gertrude Morgan being unable to return on account of ill health.

Friday evening, April 10, in the school-room, the Fourth Year class in Elocution gave a delightful entertainment, consisting of the reading of choice selections from "Little Women" illustrated by tableau. Messers. Fisk, Hunt, Martin and LeRoy Hall kindly assisted in representing the masculine characters of the story. A gift of five cents was made by each one present for the benefit of the Y. W. C. A.

The first of the series of "At Homes" at the Institute was most successfully inaugurated on Monday afternoon, April 13. We had the pleasure of seeing a great many of our friends, both from the town and the University. Music contributed to the enjoyment of the occasion and light refreshments were served. The next receiving day will be Monday, afternoon April 27, from four to six when we hope to meet many more of our friends.

On Saturday afternoon April 11, Mr. J. Brown Martin gave a recital in the music store of J. R. Smith & Co., at Milton. He was assisted by Miss Aikin, and Mr. Graham Marr of Shamokin, who is a vocal pupil of Dr. Aviragnet's. Mr. Martin played solos upon the violin, violincello, and mandolin. The people of Milton were highly pleased with the recital and extended a hearty invitation to the participants to repeat the performance.

A proverbial precaution for the saving of property resorted to in the case of a burning house is carrying the feather bed carefully down stairs and throwing the china out of the window. After the recent burglaries in the neighborhood, two girls were known to shut and lock hall windows, the approach to which, would present serious difficulties, but to leave wide open certain other windows, access to which was easy had the burglars been inclined to enter.

On April 9, Mrs. Larison gave a reception to the Institute class of '96 and the resident members of the class of '95. A large number of guests were entertained, including a number of prominent people of the town, members of the faculty and students of the college. The amusement of the evening, consisted in matching different parts of quotations which were printed on slips of paper and pinned in various parts of the rooms. The contest was entered into with a great deal of zest, prizes being awarded to the one who succeeded in matching the largest number of parts of quotations and also to the one who, out of the parts in his possession, produced the best mis-matched quotation. All present agreed that this reception was one of the pleasantest social events of this year.

ACADEMY NEWS.

We notice the victim of supposed LaGrippe again in our midst.

Kress has found a new term for the grammar namely direct incourse.

Sweet music swells the breeze since the Third Form has begun to scan Virgil.

The fine span of horses belonging to Mr. Peck became frightened at a passing train along the river road, and ran away however doing little damage. The horses after having freed themselves ran into a farm yard near by.

Apparently some of the students are preparing for a fast, for it is said that during vacation last, several of them dieted on cheese, crackers and bologna purchased by them, and some apples kindly distributed by Mr. Reese Harris.

The social which was given at the Baptist Church proved an enjoyable affair, but not a success, we regret that an innocent amusement cannot be indulged in by some persons without introducing unfairness, on account of which the full program could not be carried out successfully.

MAY 11, 1896.

THE Editor is pleased to announce six notable articles to appear in the last two numbers of this volume. One on "Student Travels Abroad" by Professor Hamblin, dwelling on the possibilities of such travels for other students. An article by Dr. Perrine, subject to be announced later. Mrs Larison will write of "Sight-seeing at the Capitol." Dr. Lincoln Hulley has consented to describe Student Life at Harvard, completing the series in which will appear, as announced, articles on "Life at Princeton" by Alfred Hayes, Jr., Ex.'95, and "Life at Michigan" by Miss Mary Bartol, A. M., '95.

BUCKNELL is not absolutely free from that class of individuals who have a remarkable facility and readiness for contracting monetary obligations, but who show a marked disinclination to meet their obligations with a settlement. The man, who, by adverse circumstances, disappointment, and such causes, is prevented temporarily from meeting his obligations, is not a member of this class. Would it not be advisable to gather these men (the first-mentioned) into a class for recitation, and make economics a required study for them? True, such a procedure would necessitate considerable change in the course from the method now followed, but what a vast fund of information would be secured by Dr. Perrine, which might prove invaluable to future classes, with reference to methods employed and ethical principles justifying such practice. The man who chances to buy these people at fifty cents, seventy-five cents, or a dollar per head purchases experience at a low rate, and yet he is "stuck" for just the amount of the purchase.

WITHIN a short period we have had twice presented to us—first, by Dr. Robinson, and again by Dr. Hulley—Burn's famous poem, "a man's a man for a' that," in such form as to force its truth and significance upon us with greater power. If a man has never learned that truth before coming to college, his college course can scarcely be said to have been very effective if he completes it with that lesson still unlearned. Yet there are some in college who would maintain with warmth the principle in Burn's lines, who act directly contrary to it in their treatment of one of the employes of the University. To serve in the capacity of janitor, or even "man-of-all-work," does not lessen one's manhood. Even though one is not qualified to occupy a superior position, this does not of necessity prevent his being "a man for a' that." To select as the object of sport one who is at a disadvantage, bebecause of position or otherwise, and to take unfair advantage of positions in which he is placed in the discharge of his duty, by "ducking" and deluging, and by other methods equally prep-like, would establish the opposition of the principle, viz., "a man's" not "a man for [because of] a' that." Some of our students have yet to learn—and ought to learn at once—that Joe Shultz has a right to his clothes, and a right to himself. Don't forget to be, above all things, a man.

STUDENT LIFE AT YALE.

To the Editor of THE MIRROR:

In reply to your request for a brief article upon the athletics, amusements and societies of Yale, I may say it is with reluctance I enter upon the task; for, having been connected with the University but two years, and that too, in the capacity of an observer rather than a participant in the many phases of college activity here represented, naturally my picture of Yalensian life will lack, in some degree, the true blue tint; and my words fail to ring with a genuinely patriotic sound.

However, even a passive observer must become aroused more or less with a spirit of enthusiasm, caught from the echo of victories on many fields. Indeed, these are so well known to the general college world, that it seems unnecessary to linger on the status of athletics at Yale. But yet, the long process of training preparatory to the successful issues on the arena, while carried on in the background, is no less interesting as being means to the end. As one enters the gymnasium gates on a March afternoon at four o'clock, he will be forced to stand aside to allow a troop of twenty or thirty men rush by, clad only in linen trunks and jerseys, setting out on their daily run through the streets of the city. It is the track athletic team. Advancing into the extreme end of the gymnasium yard, one finds himself at the baseball cage, where several scores of men await their turn before the bat, to receive, as gracefully as possible, the observations of the coachers--complimentary and otherwise.

Entering the gymnasium from the rear, and threading one's way through the dressing rooms of the football team, where the stained and gory armors of many a bloody conflict hang, one hastens to reach the rowing tanks, where the Freshmen and 'Varsity crews bend beneath the lash of the coachers. Ascending to the second floor, masters of fencing, wrestling, boxing, etc., are putting their pupils through lessons of self-defense; while on the third floor, the celebrated Mike Murphy is timing the runners around the track or giving points in hurdling, pole-vaulting, sprinting, etc.

It is an invigorating scene, and one that contrasts well with that to be witnessed at the same time across the street in "The Chamber of Horrors," where scores of unfortunates are bending over their examination papers, with throbbing heads and haggard eyes, that cast occasional sidelong glances toward the glowering faces of supervisors.

But there are moments of relaxation from physical strain and mental terrors. And while all classmen may participate therein, it is the Senior, who, with over-stocked brain and weight of dignity, is alone privileged to indulge in such games as marbles, spinning tops, rolling hoops and "nigger baby." To be sure, one is apt at first to look with contempt and disdain upon such innocent pastimes, but let no one be too summary in passing his disapproval upon them, until he himself has enjoyed the delight of a premature return to childishness, without fear of being scoffed at.

But it is in the twilight hours of spring time, when the day's recitations are over, and when the heralds of summer vacation begin to greet the weary plodder, and when the air itself seems burdened with a soft refrain of sentimentality and romance—it is then that the Yale men gather around "The Fence," and burst forth in rich melodies of praise to "Alma Mater"—a most fitting type of the steadfast unity and democratic kinship so characteristic of the Yale spirit. It is this that is transcendent; and to this all society connections and fraternity zeal are subservient. Indeed, fraternity spirit at Yale is not characterized by the enthusiasm prevalent among them in smaller colleges. It is true the Dekes sing their song, and the Psi U's answer in quite as fervent strains, but that there should be discord or anything but friendly rivalry would be discountenanced as a menace to the revered customs of "Yale Democracy." All things are means to a single end—the preservation of Yale's prestige. Undoubtedly, the strongest social advocates of this end are the Senior societies. These —"Skull and Bones," "Scroll and Key" and "Wolf's Head"—ranking superior to fraternities, and powerful in the prestige of the past form an oligarchy, which keeps in check, by its very existence, factional strife among societies of a lower order and influence.

The first and final observation to be made upon life at Yale may find expression in the homely adage—"in union there is strength."

SECTIONAL OBSERVANCES OF A HOLIDAY.

The greatest day of celebration is not one and the same through out this land of enthusiasts.

Thanksgiving and Easter are observed more in the East than in the West. Fourth of July is of secondary importance to the Texan whose liberty was won rather at the Alamo than at Yorktown—. In fact the Glorious Fourth is scarcely noticed unless it be by a tiny flag in front of the P. O. But Christmas, that is the time when their exuberance bursts forth. If you spend that day in some small Texas town the sights you see will not soon be forgotten. Owing probably to the large number of English in this state, many English ideas as regards the observance of X'mas have been transplanted. So the urban X'mas is almost identical with the Northern, though not quite the same, especially with the children, for although they may have their X'mas tree, no stockings are hung by the chimney. They do not know Santa Claus the rolicking, jovial dispenser of gifts, whom we always look for, never see, but who seldom fails to leave some evidence, however slight, of his having visited us on that eventful evening. There is no snow for his sledge. Texas weather, even at X'mas, does not admit of the wearing of fur overcoats.

But the characteristic X'mas the X'mas of the cow-boy, negro, and poor planter, does not catalogue even the X'mas tree, yule log nor plum-pudding; but rather fire works, drinking; and the observances which we associate with the Fourth of July. Torpedoes are exploded beneath your door in the morning to arouse you, while your greeting, from all, is "Christmas Gifts," instead of our time-honored Merry Christmas!

The more well-to-do Texan goes to town, which is excitement in itself, and when aided by the requsite "Christmas drunk" his happiness is complete.

The negro takes a week off. In past no work can be done duriug this time, for men will not labor. In the grand hubbub of fire works and pistols, the Texans chase the negroes out of town, nor dare they return until all the festivities are passed.

With what gaudy colors do the cow boys bedeck themselves. Whole troops of them come galloping, racing, tearing into town. Their heavy buckskin leggings and high heeled boots, to which are attached clanking spurs, are more picturesque than comfortable. Their brown faces, shaddowed by dark sombreros, are relieved by bright scarlet or green neck ties with gloves to match.

A contest in lassoing wild steers is always gone through with. It is marvelous with what speed these men ride down the beast, larriet and tie him. And it takes no little skill. The little broncho tugs at the rope, after the steer is thrown, to keep him down while his master does the tieing. All betting is done on these matches rather than on the horse racing, which is a clumsy affair. But the noise! Oh! the shooting, the yelling and the fire works are maddening. So they keep it up all day, and night too—"celebrating."

The trained bands of militia find this a convenient time to show off their skill at arms. They drill in the public square and add their share of noise to the general confusion.

Early in the evening flocks of children, barefooted many of them, troop to the churches and hold the entertainments common to all sunday-schools. But this is soon over and the children find much greater delight in the minstrels that promenade the streets.

The poor plodding planters, their wives and being unable to attend the festivities in town, meet at the country "church-houses," and hold exercises. Debating is a prominent feature on these occasions, at a certain one the question to be decided was—"Who was the greater man, Columbus or Washington?"

Columbus defendant declared with vehemence that his hero "had crossed the trackless ocean, where there never had been no track." But he was worsted in the debate. His opponent capped the climax by shouting "Why Washington is the greatest man that ever lived. He is greater than Napoleon or Ceasar or Columbus—Yes he was the greatest man that ever lived save one!" And from the posture assumed he left his hearers very much in doubt as to whether or not he meant himself.

Outside the "church-house" the varied conveyances and conveyors are lined up:—great blue carts, hauled by long horned oxen; bronchos with heavy leadded saddles on their backs and rawboned horses attached to ram-shackled carryalls.

Some of the trees near the "church house" have been bored into, the holes filled with dynamite ready to be fired.

The audience streams out and amid the yells of victory from Washingtons admirors, the fuses are ignited. Thus ending the day with a fierce cannonading—more terrible than all that has gone before.

And what is all this commotion about? Why, they are celebrating Christ's birthday, the day when the Prince of Peace was born.

Ann M. Gilchrist, '98.

THE DENTIST.

(A MONAGRAM.)

An old-fashioned house it is, with front window made up of those small panes we now so seldom see, they attract our attention, we count them, twenty-five in all. On either side of the window is folded back an ancient heavy shutter. Standing stiffly out from the doorway is a rusted old sign with its inscription as plain as that on a visiting card. Above the heavy door is a transom made by narrow panes of glass radiating from the house numeral like the rays of a setting sun. Painful necessity says we must enter here: the antique iron knocker is raised, and then dropped with a bang that causes our heart to pound in anticipation of the pounding our teeth are to suffer later on. A voice bids us enter; we obey. Our strength seems to diffuse itself through thin air, we sink upon a horse hair sofa whose length seems to invite us to lie down and die—we wish we were home. This sofa is a large one, and we feel that we are sitting with the miserable ghosts of many erstwhile anxieties. A screen prevents our seeing the "chair of torture," and in hopeless dispair we allow our gaze to wander around the room; the paper on the walls is plain and hidden by but few pictures; in one corner a desk is heaped high with piles of papers, an old iron strong-box glares at a new, brightly varnished safe which has usurped its predecessor's office. On the mantel, and partly hidden by the stove pipe, is the statute of a defiant cavalier whose broken sword bespeaks a disastrous combat with the huge black monster before him. Inside the window is a Venetian blind, which may have been swayed in bygone time by breezes from another clime.

The doctor is back in his workshop, and while in suspense we await him, a boy with frightened face comes in and falling by our side, nestles up to us like a babe to its mother. We quickly look at his cheeks, but the swelling we wanted to see is not there; with hypocritical tenderness, while we really hope the child has come to have four teeth extracted, we ask whether he is going to have anything done; with charming simplicity he tells us he has just come to see whether mamma's teeth are mended yet—we are disappointed almost enough to curse him.

The doctor comes in now and invites us into the "chair." It takes a mighty effort to rise and stagger over; we mount the steps of the foot rest—they seem like steps of a sacrificial altar—and drop back, our body stops when it reaches the chair, but our stomach seems to continue its downward motion into subterranean depths. Our head falls back on the head rest. Ah! her head has been there, we are ready to die now if the worst should come. But his head has been there, now our head is uneasy. The doctor begins to explore for cavities, and we wonder what kind of soap it was with which he so carefully washed his hands. There is a scale of plaster hanging loosely from the ceiling and directly over face, we wonder whether it would fall into our mouth of its suspending filament should break. A butcher's boy goes whistling merrily by, we would like to exchange places; we heard his step approaching, we look out to catch a glimpse of him, but he has passed and all we see is: "Terms cash" scratched upon the little pane of glass through which we looked. The inside blinds of a window in the house opposite open and for a moment a fair face is seen, we present a ludicrous appearance to be sure, but we wish she had lingered. We gaze into the doctor's eyes so near ours, and try to read our fate, they seem cold, cruel, and we anticipate a struggle with that supreme instrument of torture—the dental engine, but we are mistaken; the doctor straightens up with a long breath and says: "No, I can't find any cavities this time."

WHEN WILL L'AGENDA BE OUT.

"When will L'Agenda be out?" This question is becoming very popular as we gradually near the time when L'Agenda is looked for. The editorial answer to this question is, usually, "Next week," i. e., it is not definitely known.

In order that the Editor-in-Chief and Business Manager may not be bored to death with this foolish question, we would say that L'Agenda can be expected about the 20th of May. There are many factors which enter into the publishing of a book, and some of these being unknown, it is impossible to state definitely the exact date when L'Agenda will be ready for delivery.

And then there are many other idle questions which come to our ears concerning L'Agenda: "What will it be like?" "Will it be as good as last year's?" These questions and others like them must await answering until the questioners can answer them themselves.

"But how about the price?" says one. Well, the price is $1.00. "That means," says some one, "a corresponding advance over previous volumes in the make-up of the book." Yes, that is what it means. And we feel no hesitancy in assuring all beforehand that the advance in price will be fully compensated by various features which are a mark of the forth-coming volume. Of course there will be errors in the book, and no doubt many features will be subject to just criticism. But, what of that? All the class of '97 asks is recognition of the merits of its book as well as adverse criticism.

Several days ago a certain individual sauntered into the editorial sanctum and asked the following question: "Of what good is the L'Agenda, anyway?" This same question has often come into the mind of the editor as he has plodded away at his manuscripts, vexed because his assistants did not "come to time." Many a time he "to himself hath said," "of what use is all this toil and 'vexation of spirit?' How many will appreciate my labors when completed?" But then, all this does not necessarily prove that L'Agenda is useless. But of what good is it?

Well, some think its only mission is to bring glory (!) upon the class publishing it. Others think its only good lies in the experience and honor which accrue to the Board of Editors. But there is a wider sphere of usefulness which may be attributed to L'Agenda: In a measure, it is an index of the University, whose life and doings it expresses in brief. As such, it serves as an advertising medium. It therefore is deserving of the hearty support of every student. It may be asked right here, Do not the University authorities owe their hearty support also? We say, Yes! In many universities and colleges the authorities use as high as 100 copies of their college annual as an advertising medium, thus greatly assisting the publishers.

Well, as has been said, L'Agenda will make its bow sometime in May. Meanwhile, let each subscriber prepare to meet his obligation to the business manager when he shall appear with much-looked-for L'Agenda. E. C. Kunkle, Editor.

THE RELAY RACES.

Bucknell's Relay racing team consisting of Captain R. N. Brady, C. J. Pearse, E. C. Conover, F. W. Dillon, and C. P. Meeker left Lewisburg on Friday morning. At Philadelphia, they put up at the Hanover Hotel with the Lafayette and State teams and here several ex-Bucknell men called among whom were W. Norman Morris, Esq.; I. N. Portser and F. S. Rodgers of U. of P.; and G. O. Barclay of Lafayette.

Franklin Field held over five thousand people Saturday afternoon, April 25, at the relay carnival. The fifth college race was called at three o'clock when the sprinters from State, Dickinson, Bucknell, and Franklin and Marshall took their positions. The day was too chilly for fast sprinting and there was a stiff breeze blowing in the faces of the runners as they finished the last handred yards. State had a big advantage in having the pole position.

In the first quarter mile, Pearse, gained the pole and led until the stretch when he was running shoulder to shoulder with Kaiser of State. Realizing that by trying to cross the track in front of Kaiser to the second Bucknell man's position, he would foul his opponent and be ruled out of the race, he hesitated so as to allow the State sprinter to take the pole. This momentary stop gave McKibben a lead of ten yards for State. Brandenburgh, for F. &. M., came in third, twenty yards behind Kaiser, and Holliger (Dickinson) was last. McKibben led in the second quarter but Dillon gained several yards on State and gave Conover second place. Burgh (F. & M.) was several yards back and Keeler. Dickinson) fifty yards in the rear. Conover had been sick the day before and was unable to run in his usual form, so, at the finish of the third quarter, Price had increased State's lead to thirty yards, Rich (F. & M.) second, Conover third, and Wingert (Dickinson) last. Espenshade held State's good lead and won easily in 3m. 43 4–5s., the fastest time of the meeting outside of the championship race. Brady sprinted hard and ran a long distance beside Bean (F. & M.) but when they met the strong breeze at the finish, he played out and gave up the race, permitting the Dickinson Indian Ralson who was then fifty yards behind to finish third.

After the races, the boys enjoyed a lunch in company with four or five hundred visiting college men in Houston Hall, a lecture on foot-ball by Walter Camp of Yale; and later, refreshments and social pleasures at the Mask and Wig club house. Former Bucknell men now at Pennsylvania who helped to make our visit a pleasant one were H. B. Marsh and J. B. Cressinger who participated in the local events of the U. P. A. A., R. F. Trainer, I. N. Portser, and F. S. Rodgers. Sunday the team was entertained at the homes of friends—Pearse and Dillon at Mr. Pierson's, Conover and Meeker at the latter's home, while Brady went with Firth and Douglass who arrived on Saturday, to Chester.

All were sorry that the team was defeated because several good authorities said the men showed the ability of winners had they been in proper condition and well trained. With no training table and no place to get steady practice it is no wonder that the men showed such a lack of training. They might have walked about three miles each day to use a track where no greater distance than 300 yards could be found fit to run upon, but this would be worse than the poorest training. The defeat is certainly due to not having a campus track on which to get experience in relay racing and endurance for the full distance. If the same team or a better one is given a good quarter-mile cinder track and just a little favor from the base-ball committee, it will win the race next year. The result of this race is the best argument which can be found for a cinder track and a training table for all athletes.

F. W. Dillom.

FIELD DAY.

Field Day with the annual inter-class contests for the "Mirror" cup will be held at Brook Park track on Saturday afternoon, May 23, although by poor management the Executive Board proposes to send several of the best men away with the baseball team. This will be the only contest in field and track sports this year and every effort will be to make it record breaking in each event. Besides the eleven events designated by the constitution for the class contests and in only two of which a contestant may participate, there will be special events as the mile walk, bicycle races, 220 yard hurdles, 50 yards dash, hop, step and jump, a one-half mile inter-class relay race of four 220 yard relays and other events. In order to establish a much needed standard at Bucknell only those qualifying according to the constitution will be considered as members of the '96 Field and Track team. Every class should put a team in these events and permit their men to wear the class colors. Entries will close on Saturday, May 16 and positions on the track designated at a drawing that evening. Hacks will run to the grounds. Admission price will be—gentlemen 25 cents, ladies 15 cents; no extra charge for the grand stand. All new contestants for these events should enter, report to Captain Slifer, and immediately go into training under director Cober. Judging from present appearances, Pearse will break the record in the 190 yards dash and high jumping, Cober in shot putting and hammer throwing, Smith in 220 yards dash, Conover in the 440 yards dash, Meeker in the mile and Slifer in the half-mile runs, Bunnell in the hurdles and Elliot in the broad jump. The co-operation of the students will make this meeting a big success. Entries and information can be obtained of the manager.

Frank W. Dillon.

ATHLETICS.

Dr. Lincoln Hulley has offered a prize, in the shape of a watch charm, to the member of the team who makes the greatest number of sacrifice hits during the season of '96. The handsome little souvenir will be suitably engraved and will be a fitting testimonial of having served the team in a manner much needed at present.

Saturday May 9, the team plays Lock Haven Normal at Lock Haven. The following Saturday the strong Dickinson team will be on the College Campus and on May 23, the boys go to State College.

Bucknell won its second victory of the season Saturday, April 18, the victim this time being the Watsontown team. The game was played on the college campus before a small crowd. The game was devoid of any special interest, Bucknell taking the lead and keeping it throughout the entire nine innings. Weidenhammer started in to pitch for Watsontown but soon retired in favor of Roup. Hering's home-run hit to the cinder path was the feature of the game.

Saturday afternoon, April 25, Bucknell crossed bats with the Bloomsburg Normal team, the game being played on the college campus. The game was very unsatisfactory from every point of view. The visitors telegraphed Manager Rex in the morning that they would come for seven innings, after which they would have to leave in order to catch the train. At the end of the sixth inning the Bloomsburg boys were one run in the lead, thereupon they left the field claiming that they must catch the train, while, as a matter of fact, they had twenty-eight minutes to finish the game. However, Bucknell played a very listless game. Unless the team gets more life and "snap" into it, we can never hope to win games. Jenkinson played a consistently good game while Devall did some very clever fielding. The diamond was slippery and muddy owing to the recent rains, making fast infield work impossible. The return game was played at Watsontown on Monday, April 27, and resulted in a victory for the Bucknell team. It being Odd Fellows Day a large crowd was present to witness the game, many of the college "rooters" being along with the team. Bucknell's fielding was very ragged in the first and fourth innings. With the exception of these two innings our boys put up a very steady game and won by superior stick work. Page pitched exceedingly well, striking out nine men in four innings. Geary also did well in the box and put up a good game while he was in right garden which happened to be an apple orchard in this instance. The features of the game were Hering and Wagner's hard batting and a neat double play in the eighth inning from Hering to Reynolds. Following is the score:

Our first important game of the season was played Saturday, May 2, on the college campus and a better game of baseball is seldom seen on the college grounds. The college team knew they had no snap so started in right in to play ball. It was soon evident that the white men had their batting garments on, and at the ending of the third inning the score was Bucknell 10, Indians 1. From this time on the Indians were never in the race except their half of the ninth, when Bucknell nearly lost the game. "Honey" Geary had been pitching a great game until the eighth inning when he weakened and the "redskins" began to find the ball. When the Indians came to the bat in the last half of the ninth the score was twelve five against them. By a remarkably brilliant batting streak they succeeded in knocking out five runs before their three men were retired, thus making the score Bucknell 12, Indians 10.

The game was the most interesting one seen on the college campus for many years, being replete with brilliant plays in the field and enough batting on both sides to make it exceedingly exciting. Devall, Brady, Hering and Geary batted well for the collegians, while Archiquette carried of the honors for the Indians. Hile again appeared in a Bucknell uniform and covered first base in a very creditable manner.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Prof. Lincoln Hulley was in Philadelphia Friday, the first of May.

E. R. Powell, '96, has been acting as assistant librarian during the absence of F. B. Hunt.

Dr. Wayland Hoyt of Philadelphia led the chapel services on Wednesday morning, April 29.

Mrs. Fowler of Olean, N. Y. spent a week with her daughter Miss Clarissa Fowler of the Freshman class.

Since his collision with Devall, second baseman Grim has been unable to play on the nine on account of the injury to his arm.

Mr. Jackson who played right field for the Indians gave an excellent Sunday afternoon talk before the Milton Y. M. C. A. before returning to Carlisle.

W. M. Bunnell has been making daily trips to Milton where he practiced a part in a dramatic production rendered by the ladies of Christ Episcopal Church of that city.

James Demorest Macnab has been exceedingly happy for some time. He is now a full fledged corporal of company A, twelfth regiment, N. G. P. as indicated by the stripes on his coat sleeves.

Miss Alice Lillibridge, '99, the local editor of the Mirror was called home suddenly a few days ago on account of the illness of her mother. All extend regrets and hope that she will soon be able to return to her studies.

The semi-centennial year will be properly closed in athletics by commencing the new quarter mile cinder track on the campus. A lack of funds should not delay the work when the use and necessity of a track is so plainly evident.

The Soiree proved a bigger social event than the Junior ball in point of attendance and in the chances afforded to college boys to meet their seminary friends. Our illustrated account has been handed to the '98 L'Agenda board for publication.

The college girls' Glee Club, at the very earnest solicitation of Dr. Aviragnet has consented to render a sacred cantata, "The Galilean" before long. Ten or a dozen singers from the hill will assist the young ladies in this concert which will be given early in June.

Dr. Wayland Hoyt of Philadelphia delivered a lecture on "Lessons from the life of Dr. Arnold of Rugby" for the benefit of the Y. M. C. A. The audience made up of the most cultured people from town and college went away highly pleased with the address.

Founders' Day was celebrated by the Pi Beta Phi fraternity girls on Monday, April 27. A delightful evening was spent at Mrs. Huth's parlors on Market street where the banquet was served. Many young ladies in the college belong to this local chapter.

A local paper has the following: "What next! Sunbury has been converted. They yelled for Bucknell at Watsontown on Monday. Will wonders never cease?" It appears to us that Sunbury sports will always cheer for the team which is a sure winner or when in doubt, where they stake their cash.

The preliminary debate was held in Bucknell Hall, Friday evening, April 24. From the ten contestants, A. W. Johnson and J. R. L. Diggs of Theta Alpha and F. E. Hering of Euepia were chosen to meet Dickinson College men in the big intercollegiate debate here on May 29. M. A. Carringer of Euepia was chosen alternate.

While playing in an exciting practice game recently, first baseman Reynolds severely wrenched his knee. He started to run from first to second base and turned suddenly to get back to first. The knee had been injured before so this new accident may lay him up for some time. We hope that he will be able to defend the tennis championship in the approaching tournament.

All our students will unite with the MIRROR board in extending congratulations to William Young, Esq., of Williamsport who was recently elected Chairman of the Republican County Committee in Lycoming county. Will Young is a Cornell graduate and is the man who has coached Bucknell's football teams to their high standing. His presence on the athletic field meant victory for the orange and blue, as his management of so important a position will doubtless bring success to the Republican party.

Whereunto will the 4th Form heads grow? Instance the following: In accordance with the time honored custom, the Third Formers recently invited the Fourth Form to furnish ushers for their declamation contest. In response the Fourth Form, after grave deliberation, sent a carefully executed document stating, with skill enough to startle a philologist, that an "invitation" would not be considered but that a "request" would be promptly acted upon. No doubt the great schools of philology will gobble up these brilliant, imperious scholars soon. Did they receive a "request"? No!

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Emma Kunkle spent Sunday, April 19 at her home in Newberry.

The Class of '96 has contributed to the library a number of choice books.

A number of the girls are having "flash-light" pictures of their sitting-rooms taken.

Miss Maude Goddard fell on the stairs Friday, April 24 and slightly injured her knee.

We were sorry to hear on Friday May 1, of the sudden death of a sister of Miss Mary Koonce, of the class of '92.

Miss Mabel Wells after a two weeks' illness left with her father for her home in Wilcox, Pa. April 22. She will return next term.

There can be no doubt that the Third Form boys appreciate the thorough and devoted work of our popular teacher of elocution. This is just as it should be (!).

On April twentieth Miss Wheeler was called to her home in Erie on account of the sudden death of her sister. We extend to her our heartfelt sympathy in this bereavement.

The botany class enjoyed its first botanical excursion, Wednesday April 29, to Slifer's meadow.

Miss Marion Hibbard, of Rondout, N. Y. a graduate of Pratt Institute Brooklyn has been with us as Mrs. Larison's guest, and having made many friends, left for her home Friday May 1.

Mrs. Larison, Miss Wood, Miss Wales, Miss Hibbard, Miss Davenport, and the Senior girls went on a picnic excursion for arbutus and violets to Turtle Creek, on the afternoon of Thursday, April 23.

Mrs. Emma Deane Anderson, class of '65, died at the home of her father in Scranton, April 24. Her Lewisburg friends will remember that she was present at our last commencement, and greatly enjoyed seeing her old friends.

We regret that more of the girls did not attend Dr. Hoyt's lecture, on Tuesday evening, April 28. Good lectures and concerts are an importent part of a liberal education and every student ought to so arrange her work and save her spending money as to be able to attend.

The Kalomathia Literary Society elected the following officers for this term: President, Miss Ella Bender; Vice President, Miss Mary Youngman; Secretary, Miss Miriam Hanna; Treasurer, Miss Ruth Bower; Critics, Misses Gertrude Kase and Mabel Batten; Chaplain, Miss Mary Williamson.

The reception given by Mrs. Harris the evening of April 30 to the senior classes of the College and Institute was in every respect a success. A delightful informality added much to the enjoyment of the evening. The College Seniors appeared for the first time in caps and gowns, the sombre appearance of which, however, did not cast a shade upon the mirthful spirit of the company.

On Monday afternoon, April 22, the second of the series of "At Home," for which Mrs. Larison has so kindly arranged, took place under the charge of the college girls living in the Institute. A large number of friends of the young ladies were present and all seemed to enjoy themselves very much. On May 11, the Institute Seniors will receive and will be glad to see a goodly number of their acquaintances on that occasion which they will earnestly strive to make a pleasant one for all. Don't forget this, readers of the MIRROR, but come and bring your friends with you. Remember, May 11, 4 to 6 p. m.

ADDRESSES WANTED.

ON the twenty-ninth, the debaters from Dickinson will arrive for the contest in Bucknell Hall. The subject, "Resolved that despotism is the best form of government for Russia," is not a trite one, and the audience will go away with certain new ideas of Russia and of government in general. The victory will be awarded by a set of judges impartial as mortals run but of course not infallible. If this new departure prove successful, along with the Junior Debate Prize, it ought to create a much needed stimulation.

AN audible sigh of relief passed over hall and campus as a result of the victory in baseball over the Dickinson team. Those transcendental sportsmen who would impose on the credulous reader their theory that sport should be enjoyed for its own sake regardless of victory may think Bucknell a despicable college for it, but the plain truth is that we did enjoy the first college victory with a relish possible only to an appetite sharpened by nearly a decade of dissappointments.

Never before this year has our team made so good a use of their batting. Perhaps part of the success is due to the special encouragement lately given to sacrifice hitting. Coach Hering deserves a great deal of credit for the spirit with which the men ran bases, and the whole team deserves the hearty congratulations of the student body.

"I DON'T have a ticket, and I'm not going to buy any," was the statement of one student, at the recent game with Dickinson, to a member of the committee who approached him with reference to purchasing a ticket. The remark has at least the element of clearness and frankness, qualities usually commendable, but which in this instance may be questioned. To be sure every student has a right to refuse to purchase a ticket, but when he exercises this right he ought at least to remain off the grounds. To take a favorable position on the Hill for viewing the game, and then to treat with contempt the ticket-seller, and through him the student body which he represents, can scarcely be called honorable, no matter what may be said in defence of such a course. We are not discussing the legal right to view the games from the Hill without paying for the privilege; but we do affirm that no man has a moral right to do so. The aforementioned student is not alone in this practice. There are several others who habitually "joke" their way into the games. Little respect as we have for the "dead-heads" who line the railroad, it is even greater than that which we entertain for the deader-heads upon the Hill. Perhaps such an experience is worth twenty-five cents, and yet one would almost call a man extravagant who pays even that amount for the privilege of feeling mean. Doubtless an investigation would reveal a large number of sardonic grins in the coat sleeves of these gentlemen of honor, for it is most probable that they "laugh up their sleeve" at their keenness.

A MUSICAL FAMILY.

My brother has a banjo,
My sister owns a harp,
My father plays a violin
Of tone exceeding sharp.

My ma has a piano,—
And all the world agree
That when our baby cries his best
His limit is high C.

So when my dauntless brother strums,
And sis the harp strings strokes,
And father tunes his violin,
Unheeding other folks,

And ma on the piano bangs,
Then baby cries with fear,—
And a more astounding orchestra
You'd travel far to hear!

STUDENT LIFE AT PRINCETON.

Princeton is a little town, somewhat smaller than Lewisburg, lying about midway between New York and Philadelphia. Without entering on a discussion of the question debated by every literary society, as to the relative advantages of city and country college, it is almost indisputable that, other things being equal, the college located in a small town will be more democratic, will have a stronger college spirit, and will have a more distinctive college life. Princetonians are so convinced of the truth of this position, that the student body was almost unanimous in opposing the building of a trolley line, lest the change in the quiet college town should in any way alter Princeton's time-honored customs.

Princeton is an extremely conservative college. Conservatism permeates trustees, faculty, alumni, and undergraduates. Three-fourths of the students pursue a rigid Greek-Latin course, which, considering the fact that only twenty-five of the one hundred and fifty-one Academic (i. e. Classical) members of the class of '95 expected to be ministers, is rather remarkable. The faculty rules with a rod of iron, as though the college were a preparatory school. Permission must be obtained to leave town, chapel is compulsory, on Sunday twice; the object of any proposed class-meeting must be stated to the Dean and his permission to hold it must be obtained, in at least one instance such permission was refused to the class of '95; any boys out late at night are apt to be sent home by the proctors. There is no thought of co-education. In the answers to questions sent to the class of '95 for the annual Nassau Herald, one man out of two hundred and fourteen was in favor of co-education. It is fortunate that there was one, for the fair friends of each member of the class will imagine him the chivalrous knight.

Scholarship is little sought or admired. While the high rank men of the class work very hard, the average amount of work done is far below the average of Bucknell. The First Group "pollers" are regarded as freaks by the college in general, and the honors of college life do not come to them.

There is more interest in the work of the Halls than in purely scholastic effort. Clio, established in 1765, and Whig, established in 1769, have had a continuous existence. So proud are their alumni that they have erected magnificent marble Halls for them costing $60,000 each, and hither a large number of the students go every Wednesday afternoon to the business meetings, which are conducted in a strictly parliamentary manner. Fraternities are not allowed at Princeton but the growth of the social clubs, which are practically fraternities without the intercollegiate feature, has been injurious to the Halls. Nevertheless sufficient interest is taken to necessitate three literary meetings each week in each Hall. In debate at Princeton but little attention is paid to form or delivery, and every effort is directed to the logical presentation of points in a pile-driving style. Each debater has a second speech of six minutes, and while in a single set speech the Princeton method is not particularly advantageous, in the second speech, which must be largely extemporaneous, the Princeton training counts powerfully, as has been seen in the Intercollegiate Debates. The question of this second speech was the bone of contention for two years of diplomatic wrangling, before a compromise was effected and the existing arrangement between Harvard, Yale, and Princeton made. The intercollegiate debates have been most helpful in arousing interest in debate, as the hope of winning honor for the college stirs many into activity.

Princeton is genuinely democratic. Every man stands on his merits. The Editors of the Nassau Literary Magazine, of the Princetonian, and of the Tiger, and the members of the Dramatic Association, Glee, Mandolin, and Banjo Clubs are selected by means of competitive tests. For weeks before the trials nothing, not even the Trenton Fair, can allure the aspirants from the path of duty.

The college is intensely interested in athletics. The teams Princeton sends out, year after year, from a body of one thousand undergraduates, the footballs and baseballs and the six championship football banners displayed in the trophy room tell the story of college loyalty, and of the practice of the teams attended day after day by a large part of the college, who by the "Tiger and Siss Boom Ah" tell their representatives to strain every nerve for all Nassau is looking on.

The lines between the classes are sharply drawn and the class spirit is very strong, as is witnessed by the interest in the Interclass games, the Rush, the Cane spree, Hazing, which was never brutal at Princeton save in the newspapers, the Washington's birthday "horse-play," the snow-balling, the compelling of the Freshmen to take off their hats to Sophomores, and to refrain from smoking pipes, going to the pool room, and wearing college colors.

The horse-play, which goes on at Princeton, does not demonstrate that the average age of the class of '95 was less than twenty-one years and two months, as was the official report. It merely indicates an exuberant spirit, which displays itself on all occasions. The Seniors diligently spin tops, the Juniors shoot marbles, a crowd fly a kite, another crowd in gorgeous apparel parade with a drum, bonfires are built to distress the proctors, everyone's peculiarities are mercilessly and unsparingly ridiculed, and the man who gets through Princeton without having his most prominent eccentricities rubbed away, will have learned at least to rule his spirit under the most tantalizing provocation.

With the advent of Spring the Seniors take possession of the steps of Old North, and the undergraduates scattered about beneath the elms listen in the twilight to the singing of the old College songs.

Commencement comes only too soon and the Seniors perform the last sad ceremonies of college life. They have planted their ivy and cheered each of the buildings, class day exercises are over, the diplomas have been received, and on the evening of Commencement day the class sitting in a circle in front of Old North sings to each member as he raises to sip the loving cup, "Here's to you, Christy Payne," etc. When the cup has passed around, the class gathers at the steps of Old North and for the last time sings Old Nassau, and then, surrendering the steps to the new Seniors, with locked arms they dance around the cannon singing Auld Lang Syne. Slowly they march off the campus, and then the oncoming class, to whom the guidance of undergraduate life is intrusted, sing.

> "Where, Oh, where are the stately Seniors?
> Safe now, in the wide wide world."

The next day with a song and a cheer, each man is put on his train through the car window; the tears trickle down the cheek of many a brawny man, who went on the football field without a tremor; and life at Princeton is only a memory.

Alfred Hayes, Jr.

THE NATIONAL CAPITAL.

At the capital of any country, one expects to find the typical representatives of the nation outnumbering the other citizens, but more than half the people seen in Washington are of African descent. This fact must convince the foreign visitor that the United States of America exists not alone for the Anglo-Saxon race.

The most magnificent building in the city is the National Library. The work of carving, frescoing and otherwise decorating the interior is still in progress and is lively beyond comparison. The symbolic designs of Discovery, Enterprise, Courage, Liberty, as well as the notable events in our national history are appropriately and artistically represented. The eyes are delighted with the beautiful varieties of onyx, agate, marble and granite which are used in the fluted pillars, panels, and in the mosaic and tessellated floors. With consummate skill the architect has succeeded in admitting the sunlight to all parts of the building, and in making the structure absolutely fire-proof.

The dome of the National Capitol may be seen from all points of the city,—somewhat as the wooded height of "Montour" looms up to the gaze from every part of Lewisburg. But, should you fancy from the apparent distance that a brisk walk would soon bring you to the foot of Montour, you would be mistaken; neither should you trust to appearances in the City of "magnificent distances," but take a "trolley," when you go to the Capitol.

Having entered the Capitol, if you have plenty of time and are curious, you will test the singular acoustic properties of the Whispering Gallery, and give your guide a quarter for the delight he has had in astonishing you with the strange effects. If you are interested in one of the chief objects for which the Capitol exists, you will secure a seat in the Assembly Hall of the Supreme Court, and will witness, at high noon, the entrance of the Chief Justice and his Associates in sable robes and with measured pace. Precisely at twelve o'clock on March 26, as the solemn tones of the crier broke the stillness, Chief Justice Fuller entered the court; though long past his prime, his step was firm and his bearing stately. All honor to Illinois, whose son fills this highest judicial position! We remember also, that more than thirty years ago, she gave to the nation the grandest man of the age. The Associate Justices followed in order, grave of countenance and dignified of mien. There was Justice Shires of Pennsylvania, prepossessing in appearance, with a face betokening decision and uprightness. Justice Peckham of New York, younger perhaps than his colleagues, with the indescribable savoir-faire of the typical New Yorker. Justice White, of Louisiana with an ample double chin, and ecclesiastical port, suggested Chancer's Friar Huberd. Justice Brown of Michigan, if divested of his official robe, would have looked, Cincinnatus like, as ready to guide the plow as to interpret the law. Justice Gray of Massachussetts resembled rather a New York alderman than a descendant of the puritans. Justices Brewer of Kansas and Harlan of Kentucky were both absent. Justice Field of California, hoary-headed and sedate, seemed well fitted to give "sage counsel in cumber."

Passing on you enter the gallery of the House of Representatives. An unwonted din salutes your ears, and you look down upon three or four hundred people, moving about or lounging in a free and easy manner. Various clerks at the central desk announce in stentorian tones the question before the house, and the resounding blows of the gavel make frequent demands for order. You take it for granted that these statesmen know what they are doing and, that, in spite of the confusion, they do make new laws and mend old ones. So you leave them in this peaceable (!) occupation and go into the Senate Chamber, just in time to hear a lively tilt between Senators Chandler and Hill, concerning the appointment of a successor to General Casey, whose death left vacant the position of Superintendent of Construction. The Senator from New Hampshire, with the scholar's clear cut logic and the orator's pithy sentences, finds a foeman worthy of his steel in the impetuous, determined, ready witted Senator from New York. Senator Chandler looks not unlike that bluest blooded Bostonian, Oliver Wendell Holmes, while Senator Hill might be first cousin to "Douglass the Shoeman," so much does he resemble him.

But we have lingered too long in legislative halls. That cosmopolitan vehicle, the trolley, will take you out to quaint old Georgetown. Near the Potomac bridge, you will see a large shabby house, once the home of Francis Scott Key, but now used as a third-rate restaurant. As the distance from Plymouth Rock increases, the spirit of reverence decreases. 'Tis strange that the citizens of the District of Columbia should care so little for the home of the author of the "Star Spangled Banner." Georgetown College with its fine Observatory crowns the heights above the river.

Having crossed the bridge into Virginia, a short ride brings you to the foot of a declivity up which you pass by winding stairs. On the summit, you find newly-erected buildings and barracks and grounds laid out with a view to military evolutions. This is Fort Myers, the head-quarters of the cavalry of the United States. You soon reach the building in which today the last cavalry drill of the season is to take place. Visitors with cards signed by the proper officers are permitted to enter. You find yourself in an enclosure large enough to allow thirty horsemen to ride abreast. The ground is covered deep with tan bark, the sides are studded about six feet high with plank sloping upward, abundance of light comes from the numerous windows placed above the plank sides. At either end are a few tiers of seats rising one above the other admitting a limited number of visitors. A finely-uniformed brass band enters playing a most inspiriting march; the large doors are rolled back and, greeted with enthusiastic cheering, thirty cavalrymen, riding bareback, dash at full speed into the enclosure. It is impossible to express in words the effect produced by the skillful and wonderful evolutions of these perfectly trained soldiers. Five different detachments were drilled in turn, each one going through more difficult feats than the one preceding. The horses entered into the spirit of the performance and showed as much pride in a particularly successful leap as their riders. At one time fifteen of the men, with their horses, lay flat upon the ground and a number of cavalrymen rode over them at full speed, yet so carefully that not even a hair of their recumbent comrades was ruffled. A man must have nerve and courage to belong to the cavalry. Mrs. Katharine B. Larison.

HER ONLY CHILD.

It was Memorial Day, and as the afternoon train stopped at the little village station two passengers alighted, a man and a woman; they both might have been about the same age, but the woman appeared the older by several years; sorrow had borne heavily upon both but the woman's brow was more deeply wrinkled than the man's, the man was well dressed and had the general appearance of opulence; in his hand he carried an expensive boquet of beautiful roses; the woman was plainly dressed and in places her gown was worn almost threadbare, on her hands were faded silken mitts and she carried a simple bunch of wild flowers, which she often raised to scent their fragrance. The man and the woman looked at each other and that was all,—no word, not even another glance. They stepped down from the station platform together and then the man took the lead, as though he were acting a part he had played many times before.

The road along which they walked was a solitary one leading to the village burying-ground. On this road they met no one, but they would not have been recognized if they had, although this was their birth place. Yes, here they had both been born, and here they had played together as children, but that was many years ago.

At the cemetery gate the man did not wait for the woman to pass but continued right through; it had been this way each year and the woman expected nothing else. On in the narrow aisles between the crowded graves the man and the woman went until they came to a little mound in a far corner. At the head of this mound was a little graven image of an angel upon a plain block of marble, its hands were clasped in prayer and its eyes were heavenward as though it were awaiting the coming of the Lord. Up to this little grave the man went and placed upon it his costly flowers, saying as he laid them gently down:—"My child." He bowed his head in meditation, or perhaps prayer, then arose from his knees and stepped aside. Now the woman came up with her tribute and as she placed her simple flowers beside the costley ones already there, she cried out between her sobs:—"My child." She arose and kissed the cold, pure cheek of the guardian angel. The man had now started away, but the woman before departing pulled aside the long grass, which had grown up in front of the tomb-stone, and read, as she had often done before, the plain inscription:—"Laura L. the only child of Sarah Long. Died May 30, 1874. Aged 11 years."

With bowed heads the man and the woman walked back to the station, the train soon came and they departed.

That night as the lonely woman sat by her kitchen window she looked out upon the rich man's mansion not far away and though of her village girlhood days. That night did the rich man think of his village boyhood days, as he sat in his drawing room with a child on either knee and his wife at his side. Noli Spe.

LIBRARY NOTES.

Recent Helpers, deserving the thanks of all interested in the Library, are Mr. Wm. J. Coxey for 212 vols. just received bringing up his gifts in nine months to 920 vols; State Librarian W. H. Egle, for 26 vols. State Reports; Hon. Thad. M. Mahon, 145 vols. Gov't Doc's; Hon. S. P. Wolverton, 85 vols. do.; Jay G. Weiser, Esq., a Commissioner's set of the Frontier Forts of Pennsylvania; Rev. W. H. Schuyler and Rev. W. F. Gibbons, back numbers of Magazines; Miss M. M. Crotzer, 20 vols. Eclectic Mag. well bound.

Noteworthy Additions include the American Whig Review, 16 vols., Annals of Amer. Academy of Social and Political Science 5, Christian Examiner 65, Congregational Rev. 5., Education 4, Hartford Seminary Record 6, Journal of Political Economy 4, Magazine of American History 1878-1884, Nation 9 vols., New Englander 59., Old and New 11, Old Testament Student 6, Presbyterian Review 1880–1889, Putnam's Magazine 16, and many separate volumes of important books.

We Need; History,—Local, State and National; Civil, Military, Political, Relgions, Industrial, and Social. State Archives and Reports: Minutes and proceedings of all organizations,—churches, Associations, Conventions, &c. County Histories, War books, Narratives of early American life and early Pennsylvania life in particuliar. State Reports on Education, Labor, and all Historical data. We wish to provide material for the student of the growth of the American people. Do not destroy, or permit to be destroyed, any publication by the Government, until you have learned that it is not needed by some new or growing library somewhere.

Catalogues Needed to complete files for binding and preservation.

College: Nos. 1, 3, 5, 6, 7. 9, 10, 17.

Institute: Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 9, 11.

While we cannot claim a fire-proof building, we offer our services to preserve, to the best of our ability, the History of the Baptist Denomination in Pennsylvania and adjacent States; and invite Associations and organizations to deposit complete files of their Minutes and Catalogues on our shelves. They will be always accessible to many interested persons.

Of Books our need is urgent and varied. The Departments of Ancient Classic Languages Modern Languages, English and American Literature, Law, Art, History, Economics, and Sciences all need the books required to bring them up to date and to keep them there.

Periodical Literature is the Mirror of its time, preserved in permanent photography to after times. We need a complete set of every worthy publication indexed in "Poole." The list herewith is not complete, but will suggest our needs, and your opportunities.

Why should we not receive 1000 vols. of these by Commencement Jubilee, June 24, 1896?

Academy, London; Academy, Syracuse; All the Year Round; American; American Geologist; American Journal of Archaeology; American Journal of Politics; American Journal of Science; American Law Review; American Magazine of Civics; American Naturalist; Appleton's Journal, First Series; Athenaeum; Barnard's Journal of Education; Belgravia; Blackwood's Edinb. Publications; Spectator; Temple Bar; Thinker; University Magazine 1–4.

In a little over a year we have added more than one thousand vols. of bound Magazines and Reviews. Yet we need another thousand vols. An old custom in an old country is suggestive of a new application. The friends of a dead man of mark would each carry a stone to throw upon the heap that formed his cairn. Let each alumnus and friend of Bucknell coming to the Jubilee Commencement bring a book to add to Alma Mater's resources for making better living men and women; and let everyone who would like to come and is prevented, send the book token of his or her good will.

We need nothing so much as books, or the money to buy them. We hope you may find the furnishing of them a pleasant reminder of old school days and a bond of union with the new generations of students.

Address all inquiries or packages to the Librarian Bucknell University, Lewisburg, Pa.

ATHLETICS.

By June, 6, the annual field and track meet will have taken place and one of the four college classes be the proud possessor of the "Mirror Trophy Cup." Perhaps before another year has passed away Bucknell campus will have laid upon it a fine cinder track. It is to be hoped that the Athletic Association will take steps in this direction. Track and field sports have become a great factor in inter-collegiate athletics, but without a suitable track we can never hope to cope with other colleges of our class. As it is now track athletics are poorly arranged, conflicting with baseball and causing general dissatisfaction. However, the material is in the college and in the next issue we hope to reach several new records made at Brook Park on Saturday, May 22. In a few days the preliminary games of the annual tennis match will begin. The choice of the two —tournaments scratch or handicap—has been left to the contestants. In case of a handicap tournament a committee will likely be appointed to arrange the men into classes and give each class its proper handicap. No doubt this is the kind of a tournament which gives to all an equal showing in the games and would do very well for the preliminary match. However, in the finals it would hardly be considered the fair thing to handicap men who in all probability would be very evenly matched.

The class doubles have always been the event of the tournament. Therefore let every class enter its strongest team and help to make the match on commencement morning the best and most closely contested that we have ever had.

For the first time in many years the Bucknell team played horse with the Dickinson aggregation and won handily the annual baseball game by the score of sixteen to ten. Saturday, May 16, was an ideal day for baseball and it is to be regretted that a larger crowd did not take advantage of the opportunity to witness a fine game of ball. Dickinson arrived on the 9 a. m. train from State where she was defeated on Friday. Dickinson's long string of victories over us made her slightly the favorite although it was known that Bucknell was considerably stronger than in previous years. The game was called promptly at 2:45 with Bucknell at the bat. Devall was hit by a pitched ball, Geary reached first on an error, Hering drew a base on balls and the bases were filled with no one out. Conover hit to pitcher and Devall was nicely retired at the plate but the bases were still full and with Hile at the bat it looked very much as though we would score. But luck was against us. Hile made a sharp line hit to short, who made a very pretty catch and threw to third doubling Geary and thus retiring the side. Dickinson was playing fast ball in the field and came to the bat with a great determination to get some runs. Determination is certainly a great factor in baseball and before three Dickinson men had been retired five had crossed the home plate and Bucknell was in the receivers' hands. But there is such a thing as playing an up-hill game and this Bucknell started to do, having imbibed from the Dickinson warriors some of that determination which has made her so mighty on the diamond. At the opening of the fourth inning the score was six to one in favor of Dickinson but the fourth was destined to be our "lucky one." The first man up hit safely and that started the batting and before three men had been declared out, seven Bucknell men had trotted across the plate and the fans were once more happy and hopeful. In this inning, in which Bucknell practically won the game, the hitting was hard, timely and the base-running fast and daring. Dickinson began to lose heart and from this time up to the ninth played a listless fielding game but batted hard—especially in the ninth when two home runs were cut off her score by the brilliant fielding of Conover in center. Dickinson scored two in the fifth and two in the eighth. Bucknell scored two in the fifth, four in the seventh, and two in the eighth. Final score, 16 to 10.

For Dickinson Owings batted in fine form while Gilroy, West and Kramer played their positions in good style. It would be hard to make a fair criticism of our team's work, as every man did his duty, but a single error being made. However, much of the credit is due to the steady battery work of Devall and Brady, the brilliant work of the outfield, and the magnificent way in which Hering held the men together and inspired them with that enthusiasm which wins. Following is the score:

BUCKNELL.	R.	H.	O.	A.	E.

Totals	10	13	*26	15	5

Earned runs, 5 and 7. Home runs, Devall, Gilroy. Two-base hit, Conover, West. Sacrificed, Cutler, Runkle. Double play, McNeal to Kramer. Struck out, by Williams 2, Devall 5. Base on balls, off Williams 6, off Devall 1. Hit by Williams, 3, by Devall, 2. Passed balls, Owings 3, Brady 1. Umpire, Professor Lincoln Hulley.

NOTES ON THE GAME.

Brady's catching was not fully appreciated. He was not making any brilliant plays but his stops of Devall's wild throws were fine.

"All things come to those that wait," Verily, it came at last. Professor Rockwood says he has been waiting ten years for Bucknell to beat Dickinson.

Professor Hulley umpired a fine game and the Dickinson men were high in their praises of his fairness to both sides.

"Jack" Cutler and "Honey" Geary did excellent work in left and right. Jack's running catch was one of the features.

"Mitch" Carter says the Baltimore outfield is not "in it" with ours. And Mitch knows.

Devall and Gilroy each made home runs when there was one man on base.

The Dickinson team left on the 7:40 train and as he stepped aboard Captain West said: "When you people come to play in our yard we will endeavor to give you all we have."

COLLEGE NOTES.

The Relay team had its photo taken at Pross' gallery on May 12.

Summerbell and Barner have turned the agency of the Danville Steam Laundry over to John Sherman of the Academy.

Mrs. Chambers of West Chester was visiting her daughter Miss Mary Chambers of the Sophomore class for a few days recently.

The Academy boarders club would like to play any other boarding club to a finish. Our players are: Bunnell, p; Cober, c; Reynolds, 1b; Eichholtz, 2b; Hering, ss; Bayard, cf; Brown, 3b; Davis, lf; Hunt, rf.

Dr. Perrine has an elaborately illustrated discription of Bucknell University in the University Magazine for May. More on the subject is to follow.

Instructor Stewart has been surveying a course on the Campus for the new quarter mile cinder track which we hope to see laid down during the summer vacation.

The historical sketch of Bucknell, finely illustrated, can be ordered only through Registrar W. C. Gretzinger. Two styles of binding, cloth and paper, are being issued.

The college boarding club at the Academy have made a departure in the way of finger bowls. From the looks of their envious companions we judge there will be others.

Many contemplated improvements in the campus are being pushed forward daily. New paths, new terraces and a general cleaning up indicate that Commencement is approaching.

Ninety-seven's L'Agenda is now in press and will be out in a few days. The proofs have all been corrected and returned. Everyone should order a copy of Manager Myers before it is too late.

Euepia gave a return reception to the Zeta girls at Pontius' ice cream parlors on Market street, Friday evening, May 8. Several pleasant hours were spent in amusement, intellectual and otherwise.

At last, the college Seniors have decided on commencement music. The best orchestra in Williamsport will play for the graduation exercises of the several departments and for the Senior Assembly.

The Sigma Alpha Epsilon chapter house is being remodeled, painted and newly furnished inside. Outdoors the grounds have been improved until their home is one of the most pleasant places in town.

A local production of the opera "Pinafore" was given in Milton recently. W. M. Bunnell took the part of Ralph and B. M. Wagenseller, '95, was in the cast. J. Brown Martin led the orchestra and Dr. Aviragnet played first violin.

A band of Italian street musicians discoursed sweet music on the green-sward in front of the college building recently. This was the last and surest sign of spring. They were engaged by several young men to play for a select dance in the evening.

Prohibition orators held their preliminary contest in Bucknell Hall on April 27. George Morgan Davis, Atlantic Highlands, N. J. of the Sophomore class was chosen to represent Bucknell in Philadelphia, May 5. Mr. Davis received third place.

One of the pleasantest events of the season was a boating party given March 15, by the Pi Beta Phi Fraternity. After a delightful moonlight row, the ladies with their gentleman friends repaired to Mrs. Huth's Ice Cream parlors where refreshments were served.

The Junior exhibition in oratory was held in Bucknell Hall last Friday evening, May 22. Misses Hanna, Hartley, Goddard, and Taylor and Messers. Barner, Fisk, Summerbell, Sinton and Rivenburg were the contestants. Music was furnished by the Bucknell band.

The Reserve baseball nine coached and captained by Prof. Hulley surprised the people by defeating the 'Varsity team. Second team men were: Garner, p; McQuistion, c; Gilchrist, 1b; Hulley, 2b; Purdy, ss; Griffith, 3b; Cutler, lf; Jeremiah, cf; Eichholtz, rf. Score 9–8.

The annual tennis tournament will begin as soon as the lists of contestants and dates can be arranged. All those wishing to enter singles or doubles should immediately notify the manager of general athletics, F. W. Dillon. Let all take a hand and make the tournament a big success.

Saturday morning, May 16, the annual boarding club baseball season for the championship of Bucknell and vicinity opened with a hot contest between the Angstadt and Summers clubs. The Cyclone and Metropolitan clubs have a game scheduled for some evening when it is cool.

The band presented a neat appearance in their new duck suits at the I. O. O. F. parade in Watsontown, April 27. They played well, marched in good order, and were pleasantly entertained by the ladies. On Wednesday, the 29th, the band played at a reception to the Hon. Benjamin K. Focht given at the Pennsylvania station.

Fred W. Brown of the Senior Class recently interested a select audience which attended the last lecture of the Pottsgrove Academy course on Saturday evening. His old chum, Professor Sheddan introduced the speaker. He spoke on the "History of an Oil Barrel" giving all a knowledge of the mysteries of the greasy liquid as it is shot from the earth and refined for the use of man.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Daisy Noyes has been visiting her sister Virginia Noyes.

Mrs. Larison attended the convention at Williamsport on May 6 and 7.

Miss Jeanette Ashton, of Bloomsburg, spent Sunday, May 9, with Miss Edith Phillips.

The new tar walks are certainly a great improvement, and add much to the beauty of the Campus.

Mrs. F. W. Tustin of Phila. and Mrs. M. N. Waterbury of Newton Center, Mass. were recently entertained at the Institute.

Tuesday evening, May 5, Mrs. Waterbury gave a most inspiring talk, addressed especially to the Volunteer girls, taking as her subject "Co-workers with God."

The elocutionary contest Saturday evening, May 9, was well attended, and the eight contestants rendered their declamations in a manner which showed talent, as well as careful training.

The program meeting of the Y. W. C. A. held in the Institute parlors, Sunday afternoon, May 10, was a very helpful one. The subject was, "God in Nature." Readings on this topic, classic authors and appropriate music formed the program.

The reception given in honor of the Fourth Form, by Mrs. Edwards was very much enjoyed by all the young ladies who were so fortunate as to be present. Mrs. Edwards is a most entertaining hostess, and her delightful receptions are not soon forgotten.

The Literary Exhibition of the Class of '97, of Bucknell Institute, took place May 2. The platform, which was furnished like a room, was beautifully decorated with potted plants and cut flowers. The program, which consisted of the reading of Colonial letters and patriotic music was very much enjoyed, as was shown by the interest manifested by the audience.

On Monday afternoon, May 11, the Institute Seniors acted as the hostesses of their numerous friends who came to the third "At Home" which are now proving such a popular part of life at Bucknell. The young ladies received over a hundred and fifty guests. Time flew merrily, until the ringing of the bell announced the supper hour of the Institute. Let all remember that there is still another of these social afternoons to look forward to and be sure to give the Fourth Year girls a chance to make them welcome on May 25, from 4 to 6 o'clock.

IF ever we have been glad to welcome our friends to Bucknell, we should be at this time. An atmosphere of prosperity and of progress is all about us. There is so much to call forth rejoicing that we need our friends here to rejoice with us. Since June 19, 1895, we have passed through what doubtless has been the most prosperous year in the history of Bucknell. This prosperity is marked by increased numbers and facilities; by improved curricula; by an advanced spirit; and by a steady, constant growth, indicative of healthy vigorous life. Bucknell is in no need of a doctor's care; but she does need an abundance of healthful, nourishing food to sustain and increase her vitality. To her many friends the MIRROR, as the representative of the entire student body extends a most cordial invitation, and insures a most hearty welcome to the celebration of her semi-centennial.

As a Board of Editors, we, who now represent the Publishing Association in that capacity, have no desire to depart from that time honored custom of making a retiring bow. If you will search your file for the "concluding remarks" of other retiring Boards, you will find our work summarized, for we have been much like them. To be sure we have tried to improve—both ourselves and THE MIRROR—to you we leave judgment upon our efforts. Have we not pleased all? We scarcely expected to accomplish the proverbial impossible. In the line of editorials we have endeavored to treat fairly, honestly, and plainly questions of school sociology, regarding this as the proper function of this department. If we have been severe, it has been always the severity of kindness. We hope, at least, that you are not glad to have us retire.

THIS, our fiftieth anniversary, is fraught with great significance. We stand within the ever-fleeting, never-constant present and glance back over a half-century of life and growth in the history of our institution. The retrospect is very gratifying, but only so because the present unites with the past in the promise of a still more satisfying future. We should in all probability rejoice but little in the past history if we thought this to be the end; the bright prospect of still more rapid strides forward is the spice for our feast. The life and growth, the expansion and development, of the past fifty years impose great responsibility with reference to the immediate future. This responsibility very properly rests upon the children of our Alma Mater. The future of our University is almost entirely in the hands of her graduates. What Bucknell shall become must be determined by her alumni. To be connected with an institution which is advancing so rapidly and so surely, and to hold in one's hand the power to place her in the very front rank of our colleges, is a privilege and a duty which may not be lightly disregarded. This fiftieth anniversary should awaken the determination that the advance in the past shall be but a foreshadowing of the rapid progress of the years just before us. "Bucknell to the front!" Nothing less than this can be our watch-cry.

A VACATION TRIP FOR STUDENTS.

The question is sometimes asked; "Can a student take a vacation trip in Europe?" "Of course he can, if he has enough money." If he wishes to travel first class he may do so for eight or ten dollars a day. If this is beyond his means, he can take a trip of six weeks with some excursion agency for about $400, or a trip of three months for about $700, seeing a good deal of interest in Western and Central Europe. "But," I am told, "in the colleges very few students can afford $400 for a vacation trip." "Cannot a student take the trip with less expenditure of money?" "Yes: providing he is willing to rough it."

Lee Merriweather some years ago made an extended trip through Southern Europe at a cost of about fifty cents a day. But probably few men could travel so cheaply, or would be disposed to do so if they could. Having had a little experience in tramp trips on the continent I shall state what I believe to be about the lowest cost of a three month's trip in Europe, a part of which is to be taken on foot.

Let us suppose that a party of three or four wish to take the trip, and that number is probbly best for a party. They can procure round trip tickets from New York to the continent for about $60 second-class, or $110 first-class. But if possible they should avoid second-class travel on board the steamer, they had better travel fourth-class on the continent than second-class on the ship. Furthermore; one cannot see the British Isles and the Continent on one trip except at a rather high cost: besides, it will be more satisfactory, probably, to take the continent leisurely. Before returning home one can run over to London and see in that city what is most interesting on the Island at little expense. Undoubtedly, there is much pretty rural scenery in England. So, too, there are a great many thousand cow-pastures in America that one can see for nothing.

For a comfortable passage at moderate rates, the Netherlands-American line may be commended, or one can go over by the Red Star line to Antwerp, and in returning ship from Southampton by the American line; the first-class rate being about $110. It would be much better to land on the continent first, and visit London last, because one could purchase his free trade clothing in London and then come directly home.

The party, then, will land in Holland or Belgium. They should by all means spend about a week in Holland. It is one of the most quaint, interesting countries in Europe. Distances are short and railroad rates low. One should also have a copy of Baedeker's Guide Book for each country visited. With this book an intelligent American can travel anywhere in Central Europe, walking over even footpaths in the mountains, without a guide, even if he does not know a word of any language but English. A guide is worse than a mangy cur, he brands the party at once and forever.

Baedeker gives a list of hotels, their class and prices. This information can, perhaps, always be relied on. One can go to the hotels marked second or third-class, and be sure of finding clean, respectable houses. In most cities, at such hotels one can find comfortable, little rooms with breakfast of rolls and coffee (the continental breakfast) for fifty or sixty cents a day, while if he stops a week or longer in the city he can secure the same accommodations for about thirty or forty cents a day. At such a restaurant as the Y. M. C. A's at Exeter Hall, London, one can get a good substantial dinner or supper for from thirty to forty cents. Besides there are other clean restaurants which give meals at even lower prices. I believe that one can live much more economically in most European cities. For a stay of a week or more, then, one can live in a city, provided he does not want too much pastry, for from $1.00 to $1.50 a day. When tramping through rural districts one can stop at the best hotel in the village for about $1.25 a day. In Switzerland the cost may be a little more, but $1.50 ought to cover the average daily expense, except when one goes to solitary hotels on the summit of mountains; then he must expect to find bills as high as the mountain. When one is continually moving, stopping at one hotel for only a meal or two, not having time to look up the more moderate inns, he must expect his expenses to run somewhat above $2.00 a day.

"What would be a good trip for three months?" Every one who has been abroad would suggest a different route. Therefore I suggest the following with much diffidence, keeping in mind the fact that the party wish to practice rigid economy. Five or six days in Holland and two days in Belgium, then by rail to Cologne for two days. Then take deck passage on a Rhine boat, up the river, stopping off over night at some interesting town. Then after spending three or four days at Wiesbaden and Frankfort go direct to Nürnberg, said to be the finest specimen of a walled Mediaeval city in Europe. Thence to Munich. From Munich go to the Tyrol and commence the tramp trip. During these tramps one will often go through the less interesting portions by boat or rail, riding, perhaps, only ten or fifteen miles at a time. Thus by riding and walking at intervals he can skirt entire Switzerland in twenty or thirty days. It is most interesting to walk up or down the valleys, and go by conveyance from valley to valley. For instance after one passes through the Tyrol he will walk over the Splugen pass to Lake Como, Italy, thence by boat over the lake to Como, from Como by rail to the lower part of lake Maggiore, then by boat the length of the lake, then walk over the St. Gothard Pass to Lake Lucerne; and thus he may proceed till he reaches Geneva. From there one may go to the Rhine at Basel, then down the Rhine stopping at Freiburg, Baden, and Strassburg, thence to Paris. Regarding length of time at various places, I should suppose, Holland and Belgium a week, the Rhine a week, on the road to the Tyrol a week, about Switzerland thirty days, on the road to Paris a week, Paris a week, London a week or ten days. This allows ten weeks actual travel. A party of young men by practicing rigid economy, and stopping at the moderate inns can do so easily at an average of $1.50 a day, or even less. The railroad fare, third-class, for such a trip would amount to about $30. Thus a three months trip might be taken from New York for $250 or less. A college friend took just about the trip indicated, and was absent the entire summer, at a cost of about $225. H.

STUDENT LIFE AT HARVARD.

"Is this the way? Ay marry is it"—Shakspeare.

A student entering Harvard for the first time is made a hero worshipper on the spot. He feels that the men who planted those elms of over a hundred years, who gave those beautiful buildings, who directed the work of so great an institution, must certainly have been made of different clay from most of us.

To think that one is studying in the oldest college in America, in the most largely attended and the wealthiest, and in the very heart of historic ancient Cambridge brings with it almost an excess of joy. To dine with several hundreds of students in beautiful Memorial Hall, to sit at the feet of such distinguished professors, is a great uplift.

Part of the student's life at Harvard is the surrounding country. He feels that Harvard is part of Lexington, Concord, Boston, Charlestown, and Dorchester Heights. It was beneath an old elm under the shadow of Harvard that Washington took command of the Colonial Army. It was on these streets his ragged unpayed soldiers showed such patriotism. Going out from Boston to Concord the British soldiers passed by Harvard college, and selected two of its buildings, old "Harvard" and "Massachusetts" as a barracks on their return. They came back, however, in too big a hurry to stop. Not three miles away are the Old South Church, the old State House, Faneuil Hall, Bunker Hill Monument, Boston Common, Boston Harbor, and many other places of national interest. One walks or rides to Boston over the "River Charles" on the "Bridge" and thinks of "Paul Revere's Ride" all so beautifully told by Longfellow. Auburn Cemetery, the first in beauty in the United States, is less than a mile from Harvard. Here Longfellow, Agassiz, Choate, Sumner, Everett, Channing, Willis, Charlotte Cushman, Margaret Fuller, Edwin Booth, Phillips Brooks are buried, and the spot is dear to every college man.

Near Harvard are many other fine institutions of learning, Tufts College three miles away, Boston University three miles away, Newton Theological Institute and Wellesley College less than twelve miles away.

I mention these things in order to suggest simply a few of the historic and other associations that cluster about Harvard and have a large share in forming the heart and mind of the student. No picture of student life there should leave them out. They are part of the atmosphere of culture in which the student lives, and are a constant inspiration to him.

Within the institution the same influences exist to a still larger degree. No student can pursue more than a few courses of study outlined in the catalogue. But he touches all other departments of work. At the tables and clubs, and other meeting places he interchanges ideas with men in other lines of work. He hears their professors lecture occasionally, or visits their class rooms. While my own line of work was limited to Philosophy under Profssors Bowen, James, Peabody, and Royce, I paid visits to the class rooms of Goodwin and White in Greek, Greenough in Latin, Trancke in German, Sumichrast and Cohn in French, Hill in English, Taussig in political economy, Norton in Art, and many others in various lines of work.

The museums at Harvard are excelled by none in this country. These are all used and prized by the students. The Agassiz Museum of Zoölogy, the Peabody Museum of Ethnology and Archeology, the botanical gardens, and the observatories are famous the world over for the value of their collections and their work; and these are favorite places for sight seeing.

The student community of over three thousand is a world in itself. There are so many diversified interests that it is impossible for any one man to keep pace with every thing going on. The clubs are centres of an active social life; various organizations cultivate music, languages, debate, and have frequent open meetings. Harvard owns a theatre on her own grounds. I saw the Electra of Sophocles performed there by the Dramatic Art Club of New York. The Symphony Orchestra of Boston gives five concerts during each winter in this same building. The greatest preachers of the East are engaged for brief terms of residence to preach here, lead chapel, and hold religious conference with the students. In this way such men as Phillips Brooks, Drs. Gordon, MacKenzie, and Lyman Abbott are brought into close touch with the students. The chapel and vesper services at Harvard were always very impressive to me. There was always a brief helpful word from the preacher, and good singing. The chorister is a salaried officer of the college. Twenty-five boys of about ten years of age sing alto and soprano; and sixteen college men, all receiving pay, sing base and tenor and assist in all chapel and vesper services. This is the regular music; but aside from this every great singer who comes to Boston is secured, if possible, for these services. The glee clubs, mandolin and guitar clubs, and other musical organizations give midwinter entertainments preparatory to their long western trip; and in the spring, out in the quadrangle, many an extemporaneous concert draws hundreds of students together to yell for "Harvard."

So much has been said of late years of Harvard athletics that a word may be expected here. Harvard has declined in her athletic prestige, but she still has much to be proud of. We of Pennsylvania think that Philadelphia has a fine ball team, even though it stands in fifth or sixth place, and has never won the championship. Harvard has been beaten for years by Yale and often by other colleges, and yet Harvard had some great athletes and has done some noble work in late years. Our own Phil Linn led them to victory over Yale in baseball in '90; and other recent victories show that though Harvard is not first she is alive. Student enthusiasm runs high over the contest on "Holmes" and "Jarvis" and "Soldiers" fields.

It is curious to know in what ways many of the students pay their expenses. Harvard gives away in scholarships and other helps about $75,000 each year. But great as that is, many have to work hard to get along. Some of the students tutor during term time or the summer, or coach at the examination periods. More than one bright fellow collects a dollar an hour from each of a dozen or more students for coaching them for two or three weeks toward the end of the term; and some make large profits at it. One student, an Israelite, bought up large quantities of furniture from outgoing classes, and sold it in the fall making enough on one such venture to pay the expense of his whole college course. Another published his own notes on Chas. Eliott Norton's art lectures, and cleared $300 on them. Some with previous hotel experience manage restaurants, some play in theatre orchestras, some pay their expenses lecturing or correcting examination papers, or writing on city papers, or playing on athletic teams, or in advertising schemes, or clerking, or working at trades such as barbering. A few have gambled their way through. In a great many other ways this army of students raise funds to pay their expenses, and lose few of the advantages of the University in doing it.

The Commencement at Harvard is a great event. Its festivities last over a week. The various professional schools have special days, exercises, and visitors; but the college is the centre of attraction. Class Day nearly a week before the close is the great day. Around the old elm, in a large enclosure, the students and their friends assemble. The students cheer one or two favorite professors, one or two favorite athletes, the apple man and the classes, and then begins a scramble for the flowers tacked high up on the old elm. No other event at Commencement brings out more enthusiastic admiration, or packs the benches so full, or is so interesting as Class Day. The evening is spent in dancing at the gymnasium, Sanders Theatre, Memorial Hall and other places. During the evenings of Commencement week, the hotels are busy all over Boston giving dinners and spreads to old classes. It is a week of constant festivity closing with the Commencement of the college and the corporation dinner.

There is not at Harvard the same personal interest in one another among the students as at Yale. The boys at Harvard wait for one another to make the advance in getting acquainted. But the enthusiasm for the college is akin to worship. It seems as though their love for Harvard should make the students feel an intenser personal interest in one another; the clubs, however, take the place of that. But it brings tears to one's eyes to hear Harvard sing

" Fair Harvard, thy sons to thy jubilee throng."

Lincoln Hulley.

"THEY ARE SOULLESS."

At my friend's invitation I had gone with him to his medical School to see some vivisection. The demonstration was to be in the operation theatre, so thither we made our way. Seated on tiers of benches were a hundred or more students, some smoking an after dinner cigar and some reading the daily paper. In the arena several assistants were preparing the operating table and getting out the instruments. I observed that there was much less care taken now than when the regular surgical clinics were to be held.

While we waited for the demonstrator to come on my friend gave expression to his views on vivisection by saying that the suffering saved to man by it was not really worth that which was inflicted physically upon animals and morally upon a large proportion of the public. I was ready to believe this; for I remembered that Magendie, that prince of vivisectionists, sacrificed 4000 dogs to prove the correctness of Sir Charles Bell's views with regard to the destruction of the sensitive and motor nerves; then sacrificed 4000 more to prove these views erroneous. Our conversation was broken into here by the applause which greeted the demonstrator as he entered the arena; a crusty looking old fellow he was, who had to empty his mouth of tobacco juice before addressing the students. He briefly explained the nature of the operation to be performed, then called for the dog to be brought in. While the subject was being dragged in my friend turned to me and said:—"Remember while you view this operation that Sir William Ferguson, one of England's most eminent surgeons said when before the Royal Commission:—'I may speak more confidently regarding surgery than any other department of my profession, and in surgery I am not aware of any experiment on the lower animals having led to the mitigation of pain or to any improvement as regards surgical detail.' "

The dog was now being strapped to the table and its howls of fear and anguish were almost distracting, until its tongue was caught with a pair of tongue forceps and extended from its mouth; but still there were the agonizing cries of a beast thoroughly terrorized. The Doctor had his scalpel in hand ready to cut when he looked up to command silence and said:—"You may wonder, gentlemen, that I do not anaesthetize the animal before operating, but if you will look in your textbook by Flint you will see that he says there: 'It is much more satisfactory to divide the nerve without etherizing the animal as the evidence of pain is an important guide.' " He began the operation by making an incision over the skull at the base of the brain. While he marked, one of the Seniors on the first tier of benches asked whether the knowledge of the pain he was inflicting did not effect him; he worked on and said with a laugh that it used to but did not now, "for you know," he added, "they are soulless."

The animal's pitiful cries, now much intensified, had become most distressing, and I had seen about enough, I enjoy a good surgical clinic but this was worse than butchery. The Doctor upon coming to the skull had laid back the flaps of the incision preparatory to crushing the skull at this point with a pair of bone forceps. I could stand it no longer, so I arose and left the amphitheatre. When once outside I turned and looked back at the College, and remembered that in this one New York School during the previous year there had been more vivisection than in the whole of Great Britian and my heart was about to misgive me, but then I remembered that "animals are soulless" and I was reassured.

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN.

It is with considerable diffidence that I accede to your request, Mr. Editor, to "contribute a letter concerning the societies, athletics, amusements, etc., at the U. of M.," for my acquaintance with Michigan and Michigan life is limited to the past year. I will attempt, however, to speak of what seem to me to be the most salient features.

Broadly speaking there are some general characteristics of the U. of M. which to me are striking. Briefly they are these: The size of the University. A school containing 3014 students and having a Faculty numbering 166 men necessarily impresses a student with a sense of the University's immensity and his own insignificance. Again there is an entire absence of rules and restrictions. A student is free to come and go as he pleases, attendance at recitations and lectures alone being compulsory. Indeed there is a tradition to the effect that there are only two rules at Michigan. First, no student shall set fire to the University buildings; and second, no student shall shoot a professor. But, seriously, to an eastern girl this freedom at Ann Arbor seems almost incredible. A girl can go up to the Library or the Seminary rooms to study in the evening at seven o'clock and return to her rooms at ten without exciting any unfavorable criticism whatever,—but she can't wear bloomers on the street. And again the students literally own the town. There is no dormitory system connected with the University; every other house in town contains "roomers." This of course gives rise to a social life peculiarly favorable to the student.

Fraternites.

According to the Palladium, the annual published by the various fraternities represented at the U. of M., there are at present twenty-two men's fraternities at Michigan. All of the seven literary women's fraternities have chapters here; here also is the only collegiate chapter of Sorosis, and the Alpha chapter of a local Greek letter organization established by some "heno-medics" of Ann Arbor. About one-half of the men's and about two-thirds of the women's fraternities live in chapter houses, which are either owned or rented by the various chapters. But if the University of Michigan is a paradise for fraternities, it is far from paradise to the fraternity pledgelings. In the fall when the annual initiations of the various fraternities take place, many laughable incidents occur. On the roof of a fraternity house a poor pledged man sat in the sun, protected however by a huge blue umbrella, equipped with tackle, and fishing over the edge of that porch roof. At the boarding houses one sees girls who have suddenly developed the habit of eating with their left hands, etc. At night walking along the street you meet a girl who is blindfolded, whose head is enveloped in an immense bag, who, led by her unmasked companions, is compelled to perform all sorts of ridiculous feats; three or four fraternity men pass you at the corner, carrying a suspiciously heavy and lively coffin. But initiation doesn't last all year. This spring two fraternities—Alpha Delta Phi and Psi Upsilon have held their national conventions with the local chapters at Ann Arbor.

The Women's League.

Within the last few years an institution purely social in its nature has grown up among the women of the University. The purpose of the Women's League is two-fold: to cultivate friendly intercourse between the college women irrespective of departments, and to afford opportunities for social pleasures. The League is especially active at the beginning of the fall semester. The Welcome committee helps the new girls in room-hunting and leads them through the labyrinthine mazes of registration, matriculation, etc. Then there is the Chum Committee which some one has well said, "despite the sagacity of Solomon and the patience of Job which it must exercise in judging of compatibility of tastes, it must nevertheless bear the blame of some ill-advised matches." There is need of and work for the Chum Committee too. For as the University abolished the dormitory system many years ago, all the students room in Ann Arbor town and—what is strange—all the houses in the town seem built on the suite plan, so that a chum is an indispensable evil. During the year different Faculty ladies entertain the Woman's League girls in groups of twenty-five. The crowning event of the social side of the Woman's League is the lawn fête in June by Mrs. Angell, to which all eagerly looked forward with anticipations of pleasure.

Athletics.

As to Athletics, in football as you know, Michigan ranks first in the West; you remember too her score with Harvard last fall. In baseball the season has just begun. The first game with Chicago resulted in a defeat for Michigan. I wish you could have seen the campus the other night. The telegram had come: "Chicago shut out. Michigan 9." The campus was alight with bonfires and re-echoing with the U. of M.! Rah, Rah! Rah, Rah!

U. of M.! Rah, Rah! Rah, Rah!
Rah, Roo! Rah, Roo!
Michigan, Michigan! Rah, Rah, Rah!

all in celebration and exultation of Michigan's victory over Chicago. On the campus are the tennis courts where the annual spring and fall tournaments are held. As the winner in the singles is henceforth to be allowed to wear the sweater with the Varsity M on it, the interest in tennis will doubtless be redoubled.

Music.

University organizations making for culture are the Choral Union and the University Musical Society, under whose auspices each year a series of ten fine concerts is arranged. This year the concerts have included the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, M. Archilla Riveande violinist, and Handel's Elijah. The grande finale is the May Festival. For three days the whole University gives itself up to music. The program this year includes a Wagner night, a Symphony concert, and Samson and Delilah; among the artists are Frau Kathrina Lohse-Klafsky and Max Heinrich, who will be assisted by the Choral Union of 300 voices and the Boston Festival Orchestra of 50 men. But this music is not so sweet to the ear of the loyal Michigan man as

"Sing to the colors that float in the light;
Hurrah for the Yellow and Blue!
Yellow the stars as they ride through the night,
And reel in a rollicking crew:
Yellow the fields where ripens the grain,
And yellow the moon on the harvest wain;—
Hail!
Hail to the colors that float in the light;
Hurrah for the Yellow and Blue!"

Report of President for year ending March 27, 1896.

It is not always pleasant to look back; a retrospective view is not always agreeable. It is a matter of congratulation, however, that in looking back over the past year in the history of the Association we find so much to please, and so much that is agreeable. The past year has been one of both material and spiritual prosperity.

Before proceeding further with details of this prosperity, it is my desire to place a large portion of the credit where I feel it rightly belongs. During all the progress of the work throughout the year I feel that we were building upon a foundation that was laid by the preceding President, and were building a structure that was only possible because of the patient, generous, and exceedingly wise efforts of Mr. Ezra Allen, who so efficiently served as President of this Association during the year 94–95. I desire here to officially acknowledge my indebtedness to him and to all who served with him.

You are all familiar, through repeated association, with the improvements in our rooms which add very materially to their attractiveness and to our own convenience and comfort. For the ragged and unsightly window shades, which formerly hung in but never adorned the windows, we have substituted the curtains which give to the rooms a more homelike appearance. Through the purchase of twenty-five new singing books, we have been enabled to supply all with at least this one requisite of this department of our meetings. Perhaps the improvement most appreciated, and appreciated by the most, is the new table and lamp, which were so kindly presented to the Association by the College Faculty.

But we rejoice most in the evidences of spiritual growth. We are fundamentally a Christian Association, and as such must necessarily feel that we have failed, if, at the close of the year's work, we have nothing over which to rejoice but the things we have received. We rejoice most because we may confidently feel that the Association has been a strong factor in effecting a fuller and higher development in the lives of many students. The special meetings and the real spiritual awakening of last January are still fresh in our minds. We have additional cause to rejoice in this connection because the outpouring at that time was not entirely the result of outside influences, but because the Association was internally prepared for it by means of earnest prayer and by thorough self-surrender on the part of many. We have reason to feel deeply grateful to the Rev. J. W. Weddell, of Philadelphia, for his timely and intelligent aid. As President of the Association I feel it to be most fitting in this official report to pay this slight tribute to our honored President, Dr. J. H. Harris, by here acknowledging our obligation to him for his wise leadership in the meetings then held and for his hearty coöperation with all our own efforts. As a result of this special effort, about twelve in the college publicly accepted Christ. Above all we owe our deepest gratitude to Him who so wonderfully and abundantly manifested His saving power.

The Association has successfully conducted through the year four Bible Classes, which have been a source of great helpfulness to many. I wish here to give as my opinion, formed after spending four years in College Association work, that the Bible classes are one of the most potent factors in all the successes that have attended our Association work.

We have contributed to both the State and international work. We were represented at the State Convention in Erie, last October, by Mr. E. H. Dutton, '98. At the District Convention, held at Milton in February, our delegates composed about one-third of the Convention. Last month we sent our president to the Presidents' Conference, entertained by the Dickinson Association. I mention these various features as additional evidence of the life pervading our Association.

I wish to conclude this report with two suggestions. The first has reference to your President. You have chosen him to an important and responsible work. He will have many duties in the pursuance of his work of which you will see or know little. If he performs those duties properly he must not be cumbered with great additional weights. Don't shower all your honors upon him, for most of the honors entail work, and some department must necessarily suffer. Especially in the Fall, when the Fall campaign, and all the work attending the opening of the school year, and the necessary adjustment of his forces, demand his entire attention, do not cripple him, and sacrifice the interests of the Association, by placing upon him burdens in other departments of the school work.

The second suggestion I wish to make is concerning our representation at Northfield in July. If we have had efficient leaders during past years in the various departments of the Association work, the source of the efficiency can largely be traced to Northfield. If the Bible classes are an important element in the spiritual life and growth of the Association, Northfield is an essential factor in the successful conduct of the Bible classes. We cannot afford to slight Northfield. Northfield has very much that we cannot afford to be without. Our leaders and workers must be trained. and Northfield trains them. After the fruit of the past year's work are we willing to neglect anything that will better fit us to do His work and will?

"Now unto him who is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think according to the power that worketh in us," "to the only wise God our Savior, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever."

B. B. Ware, President.

WHY McFADDEN WAS KEPT ON THE FORCE.

The nervous little man with the black cigar liked to talk. He blew a cone of thick, sluggish smoke into the air as he made the remark that nobody can tell what is in a man until he is put to the test, and then, without giving any one else a chance to agree or disagree, went on: "I had that brought home to me several years ago."

You know I am from North Carolina—western part—lots of illicit distilling going on in the mountains all the time, and occasionally we are visited by the moon-shiners, great, shaggy fellows who like to get full and raise a rumpus. We are obliged to have a strong police force to control those gentlemen and other wild elements and one of my hobbies always has been a thoroughly trained force of large, well developed policemen. One man on our force was indeed an eyesore to me. He was a typical little red-headed Irishman with an impudent turned-up nose and a saucy smirk that roused my ire every time I saw him. He was narrow-chested, stoop-shoudered, and so thin that from behind, his uniform had the appearance of being hung on a nail. I often wondered why they kept a scarecrow like McFadden on the force. Well, one day I found out.

In the center of the town stood an old, two-story frame building. It was said to have been the head-quarters of Cornwallis at one time during the Revolution. For a long time it had been used as a tobacco ware-house, but when I was admitted to the bar it had just received a coat of bright yellow paint, the four rooms above were to let, and below it had blossomed out as a bar room.

It was in one of those top rooms that I was sitting one morning busily engaged in wishing some one would require my services when I heard a lumbering tread on the rickety old stairway. Humph, I said to myself, the old story—some one for the dentist across the hall—and I settled back in my thoughts. But this was such an unusually heavy step, it lumbered down the hall, stopped dubitatively, and suddenly, without the preliminary ceremony of a knock, my own door was pushed open about a foot and a huge weather-beaten face, almost covered with a stubby, grizzly beard and surmounted by a broad-rimmed, slouch hat was thrust through the opening—not where a head ought to come, but right up at the very top of the door. Then the door opened wide and the most enormous man I have ever seen entered—or rather squeezed himself into the room. I knew who it was, only one man could answer that description. The rakish set to the broad-brimmed hat—the shaggy, unkempt beard and hair—the pantaloons, thrust into great raw-hide boots covered with red mud, and supported by a broad leather belt above which projected the butts of a brace of a murderous looking revolvers—all told me at once that it was the notorious "Big Pete" Lincoln, who had served more than one term for "moon-shining."

For a moment the great follow stood looking down at me with the inner corners of his eyes raised quizzically—much as a St. Bernard views a snuffing pug—and then said in a gruff, nasal voice:

"Be you the young man what yanks tushes?" "Tushes!" That was a new one on me, but I caught his meaning right away.

"No," I answered, pitying the poor dentist, "door opposite." Then I pretended to be busy.

"Wal, if I don't hit the koreck place this yere time, you all had better look out—er my name haint Peter Lincoln."

My neighbor must have been on the lookout, for, after about five minutes of fruitless pounding and kicking, "Big Pete" stamped down the stairs in a cloud of oaths.

It must have been an hour or two later—perhaps I had gone to sleep—when suddenly there was shooting and scuffling in the bar room below. I jumped to the window just in time to see "Big Pete," waving a smoking revolver in either hand, stagger across the side walk, strike the awning post with a crash, straighten himself up against it and glare fiercely around.. He didn't seem to be hurt, and was evidently merely "letting off steam."

A crowd of blacks and whites swarmed around, but at a respectful distance, "Big Pete" gave a yell of defiance, and fired a shot into the air. At this demonstration there was an indiscriminate scramble on the part of those in front to get behind someone. This seemed to tickle the big fellow, and so, with another ear-splitting yell he started towards the crowd that surged back in a concave line.

I looked around for a policeman. Not one in sight! Yes, there was little McFadden dodging behind the crowd as tho he had no desire to be seen. Just as he slunk down an alley, three strapping big fellows in blue uniforms pushed through the retreating crowd, charged out into the opening and—stopped. "Big Pete" gave a derisive shriek and spattered a pellet of lead on the pavement at his feet.

How was he to be taken? It would not do to shoot him; he had done nothing to warrant that without an attempt at arrest. But no one seemed to want to approach him. He sauntered along unconcernedly without deigning a second look at the police, who were hesitatingly backing across the street as tho to surround him.

The crowd, which was itself now fully out of danger was beginning to yell tauntingly at the officers. "Big Pete" evidently enjoyed the joke immensely, and evinced his appreciation by another outlandish war-whoop and a couple of random shots.

By this time he was about where McFadden had sneaked out of sight. Just as he reached the alley something that looked like a dark bundle of old clothes, shot out from behind the corner, wrapped itself around the "moon-shiner's" neck and shoulders, and resolved itself into the shape of a man. "Big Pete" let out a cry of rage and sprang into the air, clutching wildly at the clinging form. As he struck the ground he was overpowered by the sturdy police who rushed in the moment the attack was made. And the yelling, cheering crowd closed in and hid them from view. In a moment a man was hoisted up on to the shoulders of the crowd now wild with excitement. No need of the cries of McFadden! McFadden! to tell me who it was.

Yes,—it was little, red-headed McFadden, and his impudent, turned-up nose had an extra jaunty tilt, caused by the broad grin that had deluged his usual saucy smirk."

COMMENCEMENT ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Miss Mary Bartol has written the words of a Bucknell Jubilee Song and Miss Aiken has been successful in composing the music which is dedicated to President Harris. All the pupils of the School of Music have subscribed for its publication. The printing, done in Philadelphia, will be of high order. During Commencement Week the piece will be sung by a choir of mixed voices from the Music, Department Mr. Bunnell singing the tenor solo. Copies can be purchased during that week.

The Commencement News published under the auspices of the Mirror Association will be edited by Mr. Hervey Harris Bower of the Senior Class. He has secured plates of many of the eminent speakers to take part on that occasion. A full record of Commencement doings will be published: the personal column will give notice of all visitors. Many new features have been arranged, and the spectator, famous or contrariwise for the last seven years, has at last consented to pay his annual visit.

Class Day Exercises have been decided upon by the College Seniors to take place Tuesday morning.

Arrangements have been made for special rates on the railroads for the semi-centennial anniversary of the Universary. Tickets will be good from June 17 to 27 inclusive, and will be sold by the following roads:

The Pennsylvania Railroad System, Philadelphia and Erie, Northern Central, Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore; The Philadelphia and Reading Railroad, including the Main line and Williamsport Division and the Beech Creek Railroad, Central Railroad of New Jersey and the Lehigh Valley Railroad. By special arrangement, good board can be had at private boarding houses from $1.00 to $1.50 per day. Hotel rates, $2.00 per day. Special information concerning accommodations will be furnished on application. All Commencement visitors are cordially invited to register in Room No. 2, College Building. Writing, mailing and messenger facilities can also be found at the same place. Polite attendants will be furnished, free of charge, to escort visitors over the grounds and through the various buildings. Mail sent in care of the Registrar, will be promptly delivered.

ATHLETICS.

The day at State College was an ideal day for baseball and the rivalry between the colleges together with the enthusiasm of the spectators were sufficient to spur each player to put forth his best efforts. The courtesy extended by State men particularly deserves commendation. Efforts were made by Trainer Hoskins and Captain Walker to prohibit any appearance of hostility to the visitors. The spectators were very impartial in their applause and no trace of bitter feeling showed itself. The students of State deserve our heartiest goodwill for their true. sportsmanlike behavior.

Bucknell began her run getting in the first inning. After Devall and Mulkie were retired, Hering planted a line hit out to the dormitory and reached third before it was returned, Conover reached first on an error which scored Hering. State scored two in the second on a single, an error and two long flies.

Bucknell scored two more in the fifth. Hering reached first, and a moment afterwards was declared out by Umpire Attix, although many in the audience protested at the decision. Grim followed with a corking three bagger and was thrown out at the plate on Cutler's attempted sacrifice. Hile bunted reaching first and advancing Cutler to second. Catterall followed most opportunely with a beautiful line drive scoring Cutler and Hile. Bucknell secured her last running in the eighth. Hering was hit, advanced to third on Geary's single and scored on a passed ball.

Then came the ninth, an error, a base on balls and Walker's home run, netted State three runs and the game, by a score of 5 to 4.

☞ The Manager of the MIRROR dislikes very much to make any reference in the reading columns, concerning the financial embarrassment under which we are now laboring; but as this is the last issue for this school year, and a large number of subscriptions are still unpaid, we feel justified in giving to our friends a gentle reminder, that we would be greatly obliged if all subscriptions were paid in before June 20. Please do not delay.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Senior class outing and picnic is booked for Saturday, June 13.

Over two thousand volumes were added to the library during the year.

Hollinshead and Flint conducted mission meetings at Milton, on May 24.

Our friend, J. D. Macnab, took a short vacation recently and visited relatives at Patterson, N. J.

We hear that Prof. Lincoln Hulley will address the State Teachers' Association this year.

Bailey, Portser, and Burns Smith formerly students here were back on a Decoration Day visit.

Several picnics and excursions up the Susquehanna have been enjoyed by the young people recently.

After several postponements the Seniors were gathered at Pross' studio and a group photo secured on May 26.

After the momentary excitement of a new L'Agenda, we have all settled down again to talk about Commencement.

L'Agenda came out on June 1. The usual number of adverse criticisms are being made by those who have been cut (!).

Doctor Enoch Perrine will preach the sermon before the Y. M. C. A. at Pennsylvania College at Gettysburg, at their annual Commencement.

Several young men who went from here to the Univ. of Pa. established a local chapter of their fraternity, Sigma Chi, at the University a couple of weeks ago.

As the blue-bird is a harbinger of Spring time, we are reminded of the end of the term by Saul acting in the same capacity soliciting the transfer of our trunks.

Messers. Ware, Wood and Hollinshead were assisted by the quartette in several meetings at the Rush Baptist Church, Rushtown, Pa., over Decoration Day.

Several young men on the hill have seriously considered the advisability of asking for one more "At Home" before Commencement. We all enjoyed the series that were given at the Institute.

Registrar Gretzinger attended the Pennsylvania inter-collegiate meeting on Lafayette Field, Easton, Pa., May 16. He was getting ideas for Bucknell's new cinder track.

The Paresis Society, LeVan's twin organization to the Pernicious people enjoyed an hour's whirl on the merry-go-round down town recently. The boys enjoyed themselves almost as well as at the circus.

Saturday, May 23, the Angstadt and Summers clubs played their annual baseball contest. It was a close contest and ended 40 to 39 in favor of Summers in seven innings. Batteries, Rivenburg and Hollinshead; H. F. Cook and Calvin.

The funeral of Henry Wilson, the colored man who worked at the Laboratory for several weeks, was held from his home on May 25. He had been sick but a short time. The quartette and several college men assisted in the services.

While watching the baseball game Decoration Day, Albert, the little son ot Professor Owens, was painfully injured by being struck in the face by a foul ball straight from Catterall's bat. It was in that exciting ninth inning when the crowd drew very close to the base lines. The cuts were immediately dressed.

John Wilson and Rob Powell went to State College on a tandem engaged of Hoffa, May 23, to see the baseball game, but while there some one stuck a knife into the tires so the fellows had to come back on the railroad via Lock Haven.

There were fifty-three persons entered for the field day contests. If it is not advantageous to put down a cinder track to benefit so many possible athletes, we think the college can do without one but it is hard to say that Bucknell cannot afford a quarter mile track. Our friends must see the necessity of immediate action in this matter.

Saturday evening, May 30, the positions for Field Day contests were drawn at a public meeting of the following representatives of their classes, F. B. Hunt '96, L. B. Sinnette '97, F. W. Dillon '98, C. P. Meeker '99, R. G. Pierson, Acad. A boy from town unknown to the parties interested drew out the numbers as they appeared on the program. This is the first time a systematic allotment of positions has been made at Bucknell.

The Pernicious club numbering about 200 under the lead of Rob McCay attended the evening exhibition of Scribner and Smith's circus, Thursday May 28. After silencing the museum man and viewing the wild animals, the boys went into the circus and had a good natured time with the performers. All members of the company displayed as much orange and blue as possible and received great applause from the Bucknell boys.

The American Institute of Sacred Literature, which is under the direction of the Council of Seventy, has issued announcements for Summer Bible Schools for this year. These schools will be held at fifteen places in the United States, making the work accessible from all parts of the country. Prof. Lincoln Hulley, who is a member of the Council of Seventy, has been engaged as an instructor and lecturer in two of these schools. He will give courses in Hebrew Language, Studies in Job, and Studies in the General Epistles at Lakeside, Ohio, from July 20 till August 8; and between August 9 and 23 will give courses at Monteagle, Tennessee in Hebrew Language, The Book of Psalms, and The Founding of the Church. Doctor Hulley's lectures in these schools met with great success last summer, and he will enter upon his work this year with a well merited reputation.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Jessie Birkbeck enjoyed Decoration Day at her home in Freeland.

Three of our teachers spent Saturday and Sunday, May 30 and 31 in Watsontown.

Miss Emma Kunkle conducted the missionary conference of the B. Y. P. U. Convention held at Williamsport.

The young ladies who attended Mrs. Harris' reception to the Fourth Form boys of the Academy, reported an exceptionally pleasant evening.

Mr. Horace A. Crary, of Sheffield, Pa., an alumnus of the Boston School of Technology has been visiting his sister Miss Marion Crary.

Miss Mary E. Brown, of Manchester, N. H., a former teacher at the Institute is visiting our principal, and will remain for the Commencement exercises.

We feel both pleasure and regret when we realize how nearly the term is ended; glad that we shall so soon be released from study, but sad that another class whose members have been our companions and co-workers, will leave to return no more to the Institute. But as it must be, we wish the class of '96 all possible success in the greater school, they are soon to enter, life.

On Monday afternoon, May 25, the young ladies of the Fourth Year Class received their friends at the "At Home" held in the Institute parlors from 4 to 6 o'clock. This was the last for this year of these pleasant social gatherings, which have been so much enjoyed by all, and have given an additional charm to life at Bucknell this Spring. We hope that we may look forward to many more such events and all unite in thanking Mrs. Larison for her delightful inovation in the social life of the Institute.

On Saturday evening, May 16, the annual exhibition in gymnastics was given by the girls of the College and the Institute in Bucknell Hall. The young ladies who swung the Indian clubs were placed at a serious disadvantage as at the last moment, they were obliged to proceed without an accompaniment upon the piano. They deserve great praise for the creditable manner in which they performed the various difficult evolutions. Those in the scarf and may-pole drills and in the pantomine exercises each appeared at their best. Recitations and vocal music were interspersed throughout the program. The house was well filled and all felt that the exhibition of this year, was if possible a greater success than ever before.

OCTOBER 10. 1896.

GREETING! The MIRROR, as the representative of the student body, extends a most cordial welcome to all new students. The numbers of the incoming classes are indeed favorable to the institution. The way in which they have entered upon their work, and into the life of the college through its organizations portends that their talents and energies will bear glorious fruit both to themselves and to the institution they have made their own. We congratulate them upon their successful entrance into college and university life.

THE new board commences its labors with the present issue. As editors we appreciate the responsibility and feel our own inability to do the work as it should be done. But with your forbearance and your aid we hope not only to hold up the Bucknell journal to its present standard, but to contribute our share to its steady progress. Our first aim shall be to keep the paper in close touch with the student body, and to make it a thoroughly representative paper. To do this we need the hearty co-operation of the students. Let no worthy production or suggestion that may fall under your notice escape us. Information, suggestions and contributions are requested to be left in the MIRROR box, located in the main hall of the college building.

OUR hope that the class of nineteen hundred would infuse their new life and talents into every worthy college organization, met happy fulfilment in the first meetings of the literary societies, which opened with prospects of new vital energy, indicating that these societies may become the first feature in college life. This is as it ought to be. The literary societies should be the synthesis of all other departments. The work done there should give vigor to life, dignity and courtesy to our behavior, order to our ideas, and eloquence and imaginative power to our character. The many problems that confront us in sociological college life should here meet their settlement.

THE disagreeable task falls upon the editor of calling attention to the "dead-heading" of a number of the students into the first foot ball game of the season. These embrace two classes of people. One, though absolutely able, has the habit of living on the labor of others, hanging on the outskirts of society and living upon it as parasites. We find this class everywhere, even in college. The other class is deluded by a flimsy logic: not being able to pay their way into games, they say that they attend to help the success of athletics by their presence and their cheering, and that after all the association loses nothing by their being there. With such flimsy logic one could reason himself into anything. A high sense of honor and duty would compel such an one to remain away. The only feasible measure by which the student body in general can protect itself is the enforcement of the honor system in regard to this feature of athletics. Let no one who glories in the fame of old Bucknell on the gridiron countenance as in any way honorable this most detestable of things among some of her sons. It is a duty you owe to them and to the association.

TO A DEAD BIRD.

Oh, little feathered birdling,
With wings of brightest hue,
With tiny crest upon thine head,
And breast of heaven's blue,

Thou little fairy songster,
Thy notes so pure and sweet
Shall in these woods no more be heard,—
Thy life hath ceased to beat.

Thy little mates will miss thee,
Thy brood will cry in vain,
Thou hast left thy loved companions
Ne'er to return again.

T'is sad, dear little creature,
To see thee cold in death,
To think that life has ceased, when ebbed
Thy last weak, fluttering breath.

But we may still be comforted
For there's a God above,
And not e'en a sparrow falleth
Without the Father's love.

AN EXCEPTION TO THE RULE.

"In the lexicon of youth there is no such word as 'fail.'"

Perry Pullman adored the poets and was inclined to believe whatever they say. As he read these words, however, his faith wavered, and he made a few meaningless ejaculations.

He tossed the book on the centre-table with a slight gesture of contempt and walked to the window. He held his hands against the cold panes and looked out across the street.

"It all depends," he soliloquized, "upon what you mean,—whether you mean making a million, passing the next examinations, or marrying the girl you love."

Then he added in a half-wisper to himself,—"The first two are quite possible."

Pullman walked back to the table, picked the book up and opened it to the lines that had started his train of thought. He searched in his pocket until he found the end of a pencil. Then he underlined the passage heavily and scribbled in the margin, "Jan. ——, 1844."

"We'll see," he said.

So he went whistling out into the night The thermometer was running down at a break-neck speed. The wind from the north was biting, and Pullman turned his collar up and plunged his hands deep into his pockets. There was a thin sheet of ice over the pavement. Though it was more than once the cause of his downfall, he remembered with a grim kind of humor the poet's words and got up.

"Not at home," the maid said, but Perry knew better. He stepped back and gazed through the window until the maid closed the door. The blinds were open and he could see Dora and one of his rivals sitting at arm's length from each other. After that, as Perry walked across the lawn, he took special delight in crushing the frosty grass under his feet.

"In the lexicon,—"but he would not say the words. He did not believe them. They came, however, to have an influence upon his life.

Perry was not very brilliant by nature, but he was putting that line of poetry to the severest test. He made a clean sweep of the class prizes and graduated valedictorian of his class.

"That man Pullman," said more than one who heard him, "is going to have a career. Why he won't have to make his way. The way is made for him. He need just take the world as it comes."

But, strange to say, Perry only sighed as he left the platform. And he sighed again as the applause swelled and died away. He had seen somebody seated far back in the audience, and she was not alone.

The congratulations of his friends, however, cheered him up and he set his face resolutely toward the future. The world lay smiling before him.

* * * * * * * *

Seventy years is a long time to live. Perry Pullman, bent, white-headed, wrinkled, realized it. He was said to be the most learned man in the city. His fortune was written in seven figures. His life had been a success.

In the same block there was someone else with white hair. Pullman used to sit in his great invalid-chair and dream for hours at a time, and all his dreams began with a frosty night in January, 1844, and went on through a "successful" life until they ended in the dismal twilight of his existence.

He used to wheel himself to the window every morning at ten o'clock. Then he would draw aside the curtain and look down the street. He was seldom disappointed. Leaning on the arm of an attendant, she would walk slowly, almost painfully, down to the square.

And Pullman would muse as she passed under his window, and lisp in a helpless sort of way, "Dora !"

"Bulwer was an ignoramus," he said once testily. "Love knows no law. Fail! Why, it is written all over one's youth, in his heart's blood."

ONE SUMMER.

The following is an extract from one of the current dailies of a small town:

STRAYED, LOST, OR STOLEN.

During the recent summer a young man came to our town for the purpose, as he said, of elevating the condition of the inhabitants. Accordingly, he at once began to behave in a most peculiar manner. On every possible occasion, he assured everyone that he was a member of "B. U. '96" and followed this assertion by a dreadful cry which he proudly said was his Class Yell. Certainly all hoped that such a noise did belong only to his class.

Then he persisted in wearing in public a mantle which might have belonged to his wife (had any woman been foolish enough to marry him), and a cap with an enormous tassel falling over his eyes and half blinding him. When spoken to about this custom, he said that these garments were a symbol of his rank and it became one of "B. U. '96" to wear them.

After he had been with us a short time, he began to give lectures on such subjects as "The Condition of Man in the Crustacean Age" and "The Advantages of a College education as shown in Myself." On such topics he would talk for hours, never troubled by his scanty audience.

A short time ago, he disappeared and we publish this account of him, hoping it may reach the eyes of his friends. Our medical men all agree that he was suffering from a mild form of insanity and had strayed, or been coaxed away from those who had him in charge. Any news of him will be gladly received at the office of the Daily Chronicle of this town.

The Lakes—blue, dashing, free—clear skies, fresh breezes. A yacht—full sail—merry party of fifteen, good cook included. A cruise' of the lakes; a stop here and there; a visit to picturesque and historic Macinac. A three week's camp at Cove's Bend; fishing, boating, strolling, chatting, musing. Tempting hammocks swung 'neath shady boughs, in which to conjure up the golden ages of long ago and fancy brighter possibilities for the future.

Then a few weeks at domum dulce domum; there to be admired, beloved, respected, appreciated. A gentle nudging of ones conscious powers just opening to the world. Then to go back to the senior year, eager for greater expansion of mind and soul. Ah! such was the vacation dream of a student just finishing his junior year.

His vacation may be described as follows: "Are you the lady of the house? Just one moment please. I have with me some of Kilburn's ("Don't wa—") famous views. Just take the glass ("I —") please. 'Famous Suspension Bridge, Niagara.' 'Horti—("Here, take your old views.") cul—' Here's something fine."

"I don't want any. Agents are the most deceptive men in the world."

"Good morning! Have you a moment's leisure? 'Mrs. Grover Cleveland'—" "Oh Hetty look! Is'nt she beautiful? How much are the 'scopes and views? You may take my order for a glass and two dozen views."

"Never ordered any views of you. I'm a woman of honor and keep my word, but I never promised no agent to take his pesky stuff, so you can just go on."

Conclusion:

Vacation over; no money made; faith in humanity shaken.

V. F.

Dear Chum:

There seems to be a dominating spirit of procrastination in my make-up, and the concession of the spirit's presence is the only way by which I can account for my delay in replying to your last letter, which, by the way, I received about five weeks ago. It has since been reposing contentedly with numerous other "unanswered" in my case. I won't bore you by recounting how much pleasure I derived from reading it, or how anxiously it was awaited. Supposably you know all that, and if you don't, you are at least aware that I am not prone to shower rhapsodical expressions of delight on such an undemonstrative personage as you are. Therefore, I will get right down to business and try to answer some of your multitudinous queries about how I have been enjoying my vacation, etc., etc. By the way, you did exhibit an astonishing amount of assinine simplicity when you wanted to know how I was enjoying myself, when vacation had just begun. Well, to begin,—I suppose that you remember, with your usual aggravating certainty about everything I want you to forget, my virtuous and highly commendable determination to spend part of my time during the summer in study? I studied just thirty-seven minutes when I detected symptoms of mental and physical collapse; reflecting that by a continuance of the present dissipation I might seriously endanger my health and with it our future national prosperity, (because you know that some day I expect to occupy the presidential chair,) I immediatedly discontinued my labor and the class adjourned sine die. (Wouldn't that apt piece of latin phraseology delight Prof's soul?) Upon consultation with "Absalom," I found that he favorably viewed my action and therefore—but you don't know who "Absalom" is, do you? Well, I'll tell you in short order. "Absalom" is my constant companion and adviser; he is not a very agreeable companion to many persons but to me he is ever faithful and true, in other words. "Absalom" is my old "briar-wood." He and I have a code of signals (adopted in our sophomoric glory) whereby we can understand each other and thus derive mutual pleasure from our frequent discourses. When he emits the smoke in a lazy, curling column, he is expressing agreement. but when he throws it out in short, quick puffs he is undecided. Now you see how we commune with each other—capital scheme, isn't it? Well, enough of "Absalom"! Since my disastrous attempt at study, I have been having a fine time, boating, bathing, fishing, driving, tennis and, "last but not least," flirting. Say, old man, you must come down to see me,—here. I will offer you an inducement: You shall meet just the most interesting little girl in seven states; she has—Oh pshaw! there goes eight and I have a date for eight thirty, so I must ring off writing. Good night Tom. Wire me when you can come down. May the best of fun be yours; ta—ta. P.

Now the much-befuddled Freshman
With his learning quite extensive,
Packs his grip in gladsome silence,
Thinking of the journey homeward.
Beats his heart to sweetest music,
To the joys of Papa's praises,
To the hope of fond caresses.
"At my learning they will wonder,
When they hear me spout pure Latin,
When they read my compositions.
Not in vain have been my trials."

On the morrow, as the train goes,
Snorting, puffing into Greenville,
To the ears of our sage Freshman
Come the strains of martial music.
"Ah," he sighs, "my cunning failed me,
They must know that I am coming."
He had never heard of Bryan,
Had not heard of the mass-meeting,
But the Fates, who would deceive
Both the orator and people,
Had not reckoned on the instinct
Which belongs to every mother.
Thro the crowd there presses forward,
With a welcome smile angelic,
Willy's Mother with his Father.
Each had brought to him a present
As a token of his welcome.
Each some pink and white stick candy
From Si Leuce's at the corner.

Cruel, cruel are the masses,
When they recognize deception.
Bitter, bitter is our anguish
When ourselves we've made a fool of.
And the people round about him
Give expression to their anger,
Some with hisses, some with turnips,
Each in manner most effective.
Not knowing that for another
Freshman was this noise and greeting,
As the train stops, scarcely waiting,
To acknowledge salutation
From the boy who once had thrashed him,
Climbs our hero on the rostrum
Which the people had provided.

Round about him surged the masses.
In his ears he hears the muses,
Prompting him to verse majestic.
"Friends," he cries in voice stentorian—
Then he ceases, and applauses
Rend the air in glad approval.
Strange, you say, they did not know him;
He had changed and like the other
Down his back hung long locks raven.
In his eye a fire was blazing
And his style was quite as pompous.

Now the Freshy is a Sophomore
And he sits and sighs and reasons;
"Had I known how near to honor
Circumstances strange had brought me,
I would not have paid attention
To the greeting of my mother,
I would not have touched the candy.
I would still have fooled the people."
Foolish youth, 'tis truth forever,
In deception one most clever
This sound fact in mind must bear:
Some are fooled perhaps forever,
All are fooled, for all time, never.

NORTHFIELD.

Close on the borderland between Massachusetts and Vermont along the Connecticut river is one of the sweetest spots on earth. "There is no Niagara here with its awful grandeur, no ocean with its mighty waves; but there are the eternal hills with their calm repose of perpetual joy; there is the winding Connecticut gently loitering through the meadows with its song of praise; there are wild ravines so suggestive of the cañons of Colorado; there are near and distant views which cannot be painted on canvass and sunsets in which may be seen a divine glory." And this is East Northfield, the home of Dwight L. Moody.

East Northfield, as the name implies, is east from Northfield proper, which is a small village, but which, with its shady elms and freedom from all the noisy appurtenances of modern civilization and its close proximity to the scene of the East Northfield conferences, makes a magnificent summer retreat.

A few minutes drive takes us into East Northfield. To our rignt, by the road, is the cosy home of Mr. Moody, while not far distant is his birthplace, which was also home of his mother, Betsy Moody, at the time of her death not long since.

It is in this little section of Massachusetts that the renowned Students' Conferences are held annually. No one can estimate the great influences for good which are here exerted and which spread all over the world. It is no wonder that men like Dixon, Torry, Pierson and Major Whittle turn from the more crowded centres for a season and seek this retired spot, where the whole atmosphere is pervaded with "a religion pure and undefiled" and where all Nature is declaring in forceful accents the glory of God.

The attendance at the Conference for College Men in July was above four hundred. Representatives being present from Yale, Harvard, Princeton, Amherst, Brown. Bucknell and different other schools scattered throughout the north eastern section of the United States. Yale, by the way, had the largest delegation, having over sixty men present.

Among the speakers who addressed the conference were C. T. Studd, of London, who was connected with the China Inland Mission, Dr. Arthur T. Pierson, the noted author of religious literature, Dr. Alexander McKenzie of Cambridge, Mass., and R. E. Speer of New York.

We can not go into details with regard to various addresses given and conferences held. Suffice it to say that no one will doubt their excellent character, when it is considered who the leaders and speakers were.

The afternoons were taken up with various sports, trips into the surrounding country or whatever else the delegates might prefer. The evening of the Fourth of July witnessed a most enlivening celebration in the great auditorium. All the delegates had seats under the gallery with the exception of Moody's school, Mt. Hermon, which occupied the chorus seats back of the platform. A number of the delegations vied with each other in having the supremacy in decorations. Bucknell seized upon one of the iron pillars and entwined it with orange and blue, ferns intermingled, along with a large Bucknell banner, reaching down from the rafters overhead to the top of the gallery railings. "She held her own." Robert Ellis Thompson, of Philadelphia, delivered the oration of the evening, but no doubt the collegians' enthusiasm consisting of yells and songs made a deeper impression upon the minds of most of those present than the able words of the scholarly speaker.

We must not omit mention of a little knoll back of Moody's house where, after the supper hour, it was the custom to gather and hear a stirring talk upon some phase of Christian duty or service. The hearts which were sealed, the decisions made, the lives given up in a loving surrender, God alone can see.

To know all of Northfield go and see for yourself, and mark you, if, when another year rolls by, you do not wish once more to walk beneath those dear old shades and drink in of those hallowed inspirations. T. H. S.

VIGNETTES.

I wander down the street to dinner; the town clock begins to strike the noon hour; the blows fall lazily,—one—two—three—Miss Smith passes me and says "good morning;" I reply with "good afternoon;" and then wonder which was right. The town clock is still striking. I again begin to count,—one—two—three—four—five—six.

Through tortuous by-ways of logical development the preacher had at last come to the most impressive part of his sermon; in tones full of intense awe he said: "My friends, this is a solomn moment," an oppressive hush fell upon the audience. The preacher stood trembling with deep emotion. A loud laugh was heard in one corner of the church. The preacher suddenly resumed his remarks. The sleeper aroused himself, turned to his neighbor and said: "Dad! but I had a funny dream."

As I walked along a country road, I heard a most exquisite melody of human voices come floating to me with ravishing sweetness on the air heavily laden with the rich fragrance of summer flowers. My soul was stirred in its depths; my love of music compelled to go to the house whence these angelic strains came. A fine mansion it was and I wandered up the flower-bordered walk as though carried on the air. I was about to ring at the bell, when I saw on the door-plate: "Dr. Tar's private home for the feeble minded."

Surely now all the students were deep in their books. He opened his door and looked down the hall; no one was in sight; he noiselessly closed the door and crept out to Main Hall as fearfully as a haunted criminal; the goal was now in sight; he quickly glanced around him; all was safe; he made a rush for the "Mirror-box," dropped in it his little, two lined, never-to-be-seen-again, local and hastened into outer darkness.

Her face was pure and holy; her lips—ruby red lips—were molded but to speak honied words; her teeth were shining brightness; her cheeks, full in form and tinged with a modest bloom, were fashioned by a master hand; her eyes—oh raptures! I can go no further, I must tell my story. She was alone; I would approach her; what should I say—anything—"Very warm isn't it?" I venture. That face of angelic beauty is turned to me, a ravishing smile greets me, those delicate lips open, am anxious to know how she will take my overture; her reply reassures me; she said: "Pretty much cold—nit!"

FOOT BALL SCHEDULE.

Oct. 17, Johns Hopkins, at Lewisburg.
Oct. 31, State College, at Williamsport.
Nov. 7, Cornell, at Ithaca.
Nov. 14, Open.
Nov. 21, Dickinson, at Sunbury.
Nov. 26. F. & M., at Lancaster.

The schedule to be played this season shows that Bucknell has several contracts, the successful fulfilment of which will require the development of a team fully worthy to follow its predecessors of '94 and '95. It may be said that three conditions are of prime importance to the accomplishment of this end. First, plenty of material from which to develop the team; second, presence of a competent coach; and third, hearty co-operation of the student body.

As to the first point, there can be no doubt. The candidates for positions on the team are largely men who have had experience in this, or preparatory schools and should fill the positions acceptably. Of last year's team Cober, Collins, Bunnell, Elliot, Thomas, Jennings, Lesher Hollinshead, Wilson and Gilchrist are again nearing the canvass while Rowe, Craig, Jenkinson, Smith and Griffith of the substitutes are all making strong bids for positions. Of the incoming class, Huntzberger will in all probability be found at guard. The vacancies to be filled are end, tackle, and quarter back.

Upon the second point, i. e. the necessity of having a good coach, there is little to say since we have him. The work of Mr. Young in past years leaves no room for doubt as to his ability to handle a Bucknell team.

The third requisite was said to be the hearty co-operation of the student body. There can be no doubt that the presence of a large percent of the boys on the field during practice games will convince the players that their efforts to maintain B. U.'s standing are appreciated. Or if you cannot find time to do that, be on the hill with your ticket to take in the games played on the campus. There are about four hundred students in the different departments of B. U., yet it is said that on Saturday, Sept. 26, only about forty tickets were sold to these supporters (?) of the Orange and Blue. Despite this we often hear the query: "Why do we have so few games on the campus?" Why can this not be different?

Summarizing we find that the material is such as to indicate a good team, they will be well coached, and a training table has been established; in fact taken all in all the prospects are good, all that is needed is lots of genuine college spirit and there is no reason why Bucknell should not look on the season of '96 with pride.

The first game of the season was played Saturday, Sept. 26 with Wyoming Seminary and resulted in a victory for the home team by the scare of 10–0. When the visitors came on the field it was evident that they had an unusually strong team. They opened with a nice run aided by good interference and for a time continued to gain ground. But with the ball in Bucknell's possession things were different, the home team slowly but surely asserting their superiority over their opponents. In the second half, after scoring once, Bucknell devoted her attention to practicing the backs in kicking, doing so on the first down nearly every time the ball came into her possession. This gave the visitors every advantage and kept the score low.

Taking into consideration the fact that Wyoming had been practicing four weeks, while the home team had lined up against the scrub but four times, we think that the showing made was all that conld be desired.

The teams lined up as follows:

WYOMING.	POSITIONS.	BUCKNELL.
Robertson	right end	Lesher,(Cober.
Gendall	quarter back	Griffith.
Lamb	right half-back	Thomas,(Smith)
Smith	full-back	Elliot.

Touch downs, Elliot 1, Collins 1. Goals, Elliot 1. Umpire, Fenstemacher. Referee, Young.

NOTES ON THE GAME.

Decker played a fine game for the visitors.

Elliot's fine tackling twice prevented Wyoming from scoring.

Thomas sought a "diversion" after the first half.

Huntzberger made a good showing.

The finance committee added a great improvement when they furnished the seats and enclosed the "gridiron" with the substantial wire sideline.

The need of a high fence along the railroad was again made apparent.

State, Oct. 31. Keep it in mind.

The following criticism of the B. U.–U. P. game is encouraging. Mr. Reynolds does not speak wholly upon his own inference, but his opinions are those expressed at the game by such experts as Brooke, Vail and Wagenhurst:

Well, they did it. We expected it and still we didn't expect it. That is, we expected they would beat us but we didn't expect 40–0. I know how the people felt when the telegram reached Lewisburg—I have been there. But to the eye-witness, the game was anything but disappointing.

The story of the game is simple. The ball was kept in Bucknell's territory most of the time. Bucknell was woefully unfortunate in her kicking, Penn. blocking the first three attempts. On the other hand, U. P. was altogether fortunate in her trick kicks and plays and was ever ready to take advantage of every misplay and every fumble that Bucknell made. Gelbert, Wiley Woodruff, and By Dickson were annoyingly in evidence in nearly every play. Pennsylvania played much harder against "the team that beat the Indians" than she did against either F. & M. or Gettysburg. She never let up in her play and big Wharton kept urging them to the very end. To the Philadelpiha–Bucknell contingent of "rooters," there were three things that seemed to aid the U. P. men in rolling up the score. They were:

1. Bucknell's ends were easily "pocketed." We know Bucknell has good ends,—one of them has been tried and found true. But on Saturday they were weak. To quote from a Pennsylvania substitute, "their style of play will never do anything against our interference."

2. Slowness of the backs in starting. Bucknell's interference formed all right and was good, but it was too slow.

3. Lack of "get up and get off." The U. P. students were continually urging on their men and crying: "Help him, push him, here we go, now everybody together, etc., etc."

But the thing which redeemed the whole affair was Bucknell's line. It held magnificently. And when we think of such men as Woodruff and Wharton being against it, the fact that it held so well means a great deal. Taken altogether I think Bucknell has the strongest line she has had since '91. And I am not forgetting the line of '94 which three times drove State before it to their five yard line only to have Atherton kick the ball out of danger and then made the fourth and last magnificent rush, which scored the touch-down. And I am not forgetting the line of '95 which repelled so successfully the fierce onslaughts of the Carlisle Indians. But we expect to hear of the line of '96 pushing Cornell down the field for more than one touch-down; and State—well, "we won't do a thing to them." As for U. P., —wait till next year.

BARCLAY REYNOLDS, JR., '96.

The line up was as follows:

U. OF P.	POSITIONS.	BUCKNELL.
Stannard, (Overfield)	center	Jennings.
Wharton	right guard	Huntzberger.
Farrer, (Stearns)	right tackle	Cober, (Lesher).
B. Dickson	right end	Jenkinson.
K. Dickson	quarter back	Griffith.
Minds, (Morice)	right half-back	Collins, (Thomas)
Jackson	full-back	Elliot.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Joe Shultz is gone.

Take regular exercise.

Don't forget the MIRROR box.

Come out and help our foot-ball team.

The Freshman class looks very promising.

Some of the new men show up well on the gridiron.

Coach Young is putting the foot-ball team in good shape.

Thomas J. Morris, 1900, has been appointed proctor at the Academy.

Parker has established quite a reputation as a lecturer in history.

The Orange and Blue hats are all the go. Buy one and be in style.

Several new men were elected members of the Y. M. C. A. recently.

Dr. Hulley preached a doctrinal sermon at Montgomery, September 23.

Miss Brown has been appointed as assistant Librarian for the ensuing year.

The recent storm overturned and broke down many trees about the college grounds.

Miss Flora Siegel visited Bucknell friends previous to her departure for Ann Arbor.

The present business manager of the L'Agenda promises to do better than was done last year.

Mr. John Anderson occupied the pulpit of his brother at Washington, D. C., during the vacation.

During the recent gale it is reported that the odor from the pines of South Carolina was very noticeable.

The members of the Junior class are glad to welcome Miss Emma Bolenius, of Lancaster, to their ranks.

Prof. in Physics. "No matter has ever been created or destroyed."
New student: "Yes Professor, but was not Elijah taken to Heaven by a chariot of fire?"
Prof.: "No matter."

Mr. John Lesher of the Senior Class is the Democratic nominee for United States Congressman from this district.

Professor (in Chemistry).—"What is the Law of Definite Proportions?"
Student—"16 to 1."

October 2, was given to the students as a holiday in order that they might attend the Union County fair at this place.

Miss Hawley of Northumberland is registered as a Sophomore, and Miss Emma Seiler, '96, Inst. is taking special college work.

M. B. Christy has been initiated into the Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity, S. C. Bell into Phi Epsilon and E. L. Peck into Phi Gamma Delta.

All contributions for the MIRROR will be gladly received, if given to one of the editors or dropped in the MIRROR box in the Main Hall.

The smiling faces of J. W. Davis, '96, J. R. Wood, '94, and O. E. Bailey, Ex-'96 were seen in our midst at the opening of the term.

The students of the University spent an enjoyable evening at the C. E. social, recently given by the young people of the Baptist Church in town.

At a recent meeting of the Junior class, D. H. Elliot, G. Morgan Davis, Mary Chambers and Grace Slifer were elected members of the L'Agenda board.

Among those taking special studies in our college department is Miss Sallie Van Gundy, who has been for some time a much esteemed instructor at Lutherville, Maryland.

On Sept. 28, Miss Wolfe and Miss Bartol left for Ann Arbor, for the purpose of continuing their studies, the former in the Medical department, the latter in graduate work.

The Misses Goddard have changed their residence from the Institute, to the home of Mrs. Clingan. And the Misses Chambers and Rodgers are now staying at Mrs. Gibson's, on Fifth street.

The Theta Alpha Literary Society elected the following officers for this term: President, Wiltbank; Vice President, Cook; Critic, Purdy; Censor, McCay; Secretary, Hanna; Treasurer, Hollinshead.

The regular meeting of the College Girl's Association, held for the election of officers for the year 1896–97, resulted as follows: President, Miss Hanna; Vice President, Miss Rodgers; Secretary, Miss Gertrude Stephens; Treasurer, Miss Zierden.

At a recent meeting of the Zeta Literary Society the following officers were elected: President, Miss Goddard; Vice President, Miss Rodgers; Secretary, Miss Allen; Treasurer, Miss Wheeler; Program Committee, Miss Owens, Miss Bolenius, Miss Stephens, and Miss Woodard; Executive Committee, Miss Zierden and Miss White.

The annual reception of the College Y. M. C. A. was tendered to the new students in the gymnasium Sept. 20. Interesting speeches pointed out some of the chief things to be gained in college life. These were followed by refreshments in abundance, and songs, class, university and ''prep'' yells added to the enjoyment of the company and gave the new men a taste of what is to follow in their course.

Four weekly Bible classes have been formed. The Freshmen will study the life of Christ. The Sophomores, the life and travels of St Paul. The Juniors and Seniors, thirty studies in Jeremiah. Also a personal workers' class, open to all men, will be lead by its old and experienced leader C. W. Harvey. No one can afford to neglect his Bible. Enter one of these classes and be a man.

The first regular meeting of the Euepia Literary Society was held Friday evening, Sept. 25. The attendance was greater than the society hall could accommodate, and from the spirit manifested there is the brightest prospect for the society. The following officers were elected for this term: President, Grim; Vice President, Sinnette; Secretary, Decker; Treasurer, Rawlinson; Critic, Kunkle; Librarian, Davis; Program Committee, Sinnette, Kunkle, and Decker; Delinquent Committee, Sinnette, Decker, and Rawlinson.

The disciples of Free Silver recently organized a Bi-metallic Club with the following officers: President, Jennings; Vice President, McCay; Secretary, Ritter; Treasurer, Williams. Prof. Enoch Perrine, Litt. D., and Prof. W. C. Bartol, Ph. D. were elected honorary members. We learn that the membership is large and that they have secured several prominent speakers to address them on the issue. A McKinley Club has also been organized with the following officers: President, Gilchrist; Vice President, Collins; Secretary, LeVan; Treasurer, Hollinshead.

The following officers were elected by the various classes of the College for the year 1896–97: The Senior Class—President, Kunkle; Vice President, Wilson; Secretary, Barner; Treasurer, Gilchrist; Historian, Miss Hanna; Poet, Miss Taylor. The Junior Class—President, Purdy; Vice President, Wiltbank; Secretary, Miss Rodgers; Treasurer, Cook; Historian, Lindemann; Poet, Miss Slifer. The Sophomore Class—President; Harvey; Vice President, Ballentine; Secretary, Miss Gertrude Stephens; Treasurer, Keen; Historian, Griffith; Poet, Buckminister. The Freshman Class—President, Morris; Vice President, Pearse; Secretary, Miss Wheeler; Treasurer, Reed.

The following contributions to the Museum were received during the summer: A complete collection of the Marine Shells of New Jersey, with the exception of a few small and uninteresting species, which, however, will be supplied as soon as they can be obtained, was presented by Mr. D. S. Maynard of Wildwood, New Jersey. In many instances the shells were sent just as they appear when taken from the water. This adds to the value of the collection as they may now be seen in a state of nature. The collection is valued at one hundred dollars. Mr. Maynard has also kindly promised to prepare and send to the University a paper on "The Marine Shells of New Jersey," in which a brief description of most of the varieties will be given. Another collection of shells, principally of the genus Unio, was received from Prof. H. M. Kelly, '88, of Cornell College, MtVernon, Iowa. A pair of mounted India pheasants and brood was presented by J. W. Hayne, Esq., '73. Registrar Gretzinger, '89, presented several Indian relics and Instructor N. F. Davis, '95, several starfish and other marine forms.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Viola Pensyl spent Sunday, Oct. 4, at her home.

Miss Isabelle Schweier spent Sunday, Oct. 4, at her home.

Miss Armitage visited Miss Bell for some weeks during vacation.

Mrs. and Miss Aikin enjoyed the delights of Chautauqua during the past summer.

The Misses Rositer and Pennypacker spent the "Fair" vacation with Miss Bastress in Sunbury.

Dr. Aviragnet favored Lewisburg with his presence during a large portion of the heated term.

Miss Jennie Jones has returned, having been absent for some days owing to the illness of her mother.

Mrs. Callendar and infant son have been staying with Mrs. Van Gundy and visiting friends in the Institute and town.

Mrs. Larison spent a portion of her summer in Michigan. Among other places of interest, she visited far-famed Battle Creek.

Once more Bucknell Insitute extends a hearty greeting to its old friends, and gladly welcomes all who have but recently come to enjoy our university life.

We are very glad to welcome Miss Miller of Allentown, a graduate of the Philadelphia School of Design, as principal of our Art Department, and Miss Crawford of Syracuse University as instructor in vocal and instrumental music.

The work of the Y. W. C. A. was happily inaugurated by the customary reception for the benefit of the new students, Saturday evening, Sept. 19. All the young ladies had been requested to impersonate some popular song, and to bring a pencil and blank card, on which those rightly guessing the song intended to be represented were to write their names. The three songs guessed by the greatest number were, "Home Sweet Home," "The Watch on the Rhine," and "Nothing but Leaves." The three young ladies representing them, in recognition of their skillful impersonation, were requested to sing their respective songs. A short literary and musical program filled the latter part of the evening: consisting of a humorous reading by Miss Sharpless; vocal solo, Miss Crawford; recitation, Miss Armitage; reading, Mrs. Larison; The Bucknell Song, "Orange and Blue." An address by Miss Hanna, president of the Association, closed the program. Refreshments were then served.

As we entered the Institute Library at the opening of the term, such a transformation met our gaze that we could almost believe some benevolent magician had been at work. Delicately tinted paper with a beautiful frieze adorned the walls, a Persian rug in rich dark colors covered the floor, and handsome high-backed chairs had taken the place of the old settees. We found also a new Magazine rack, well filled with the choicest periodicals, and a whole alcove of newly bound magazines. The benevolent magician had not, however, expended all his bounty upon the Library, for we found in the parlor lovely lace curtains which relieved the sombreness of that spacious room. We hope some day he will touch with his magic wand the old floors of the parlor and transform them into pretty hard-wood, covered here and there with soft rugs.

Judging from the fine appearance of "West Wing," Sir magician must be a master hand at wainscoating,—his skill in frescoing is evident in the artistic tinting which makes the walls of the Annex prettier than they were when new.

As there is a limit to the space allotted us in that model of college periodicals, the MIRROR, we will mention no more improvements, but will ask its readers to come and see for themselves.

ACADEMY NEWS.

Prof. Fisher was with us to see the defeat of Wyoming Seminary.

R. J. Powell went to see the game between Bucknell and U. of P.

The reception given by the different churches and the several Christian Associations of the University removed all strangers from among us not only at the "hill" but also in the town.

The Academy never opened with such bright prospects. We have Prof. W. L. Kauffman in the place so well filled for several years by Prof. Fisher, who has been called to Susquehanna University; we have made friends of twenty-eight new students, and our buildings, in excellent condition, are cared for by a man and wife who give to the rooms a home-like appearance.

The elections of the various organizations resulted as follows: Fourth Form, Pres., Devitt; Vice Pres., Riemer; Sec., Rowe; Treas., Ayars; Hist., Alexander. Third Form, Pres., Dickinson; Vice Pres., McCracken; Sec., Cunningham. Hermenia, Pres., Riemer; Vice Pres., Sherbondy; 1st Critic, Ayars; 2nd Critic, Whitman; Sec., Burpee; Treas., F. Bower; Librarian, Cunningham; Censor, Dickinson; Chaplain, McCracken; S-at-Arms Treverton; editors of Tattler, Ayars, Burpee and Riemer; Adelphia Pres., Shields; Vice Pres., Rowe; Sec., Pitts; Treas., Young; 1st Critic, Skinner; 2nd Critic, Alexander; Chaplain, Pierson; S-at Arms, W. Groff; Athletic Association, Pres., Pierson; Vice Pres., Powell; Treas., Prof. Kaufman; Sec., Riemer; Foot-ball mgr., Senn.

EXCHANGE.

The Sibyl, a very attractive journal, displays considerable literary ability.

A feature of the Wittenburg (Ohio) is the unique design of its cover; we wonder if it is the work of students or professionals.

The F. & M. Weekly, a fair specimen of college journalism, reports the entrance of D. K. Laudenslauger, B. U. '98 in that school.

The Eagles Mere Chautauqua gives a very full account of the work done there during the Summer under the direction of Gen. James A. Beaver.

From the Susquehanna Journal, we judge that our friends at Selinsgrove are as glad to secure Prof. Fisher as our Academy was sorry to lose him.

The Monthly Bulletin, the official organ of the Y. M. C. A. of Reading, comes to us laden with interesting facts concerning the Y. M. C. A. work in that city.

The Pottsville High School Monthly, makes a fair showing for a school of that grade, yet it lacks that literary touch which characterizes the better kind of school journalism.

THE MIRROR is on file at the editorial rooms of the University Review, 236 Fifth Avenue, New York, where all college men are given a hearty welcome.

OCTOBER 24. 1896.

REMEMBER that Oct. 31 will soon be here. Are you prepared to go to Williamsport? We will all close our doors and journey to the Lumber City on that day and you should be with us. State will in all probability be represented by a large delegation and Bucknell must not be outnumbered. Oct. 31. Keep your calendar where you can see it.

BUCKNELL'S Gala Day is at hand. Bunting and flags, music and the blast of horns, college cries and laughter, the meeting of old friends and a general rejoicing in Alma Mater combine to make the annual football game with State College one of the liveliest events of the year. Then, we are more happy this year than for many years before, because we believe we are going to win and we have facts on which to base our belief. Last year we lamented our broken up team, though we dared to hope in spite of it. This year, with every precaution, with material undoubtedly better than last year, with Young's coaching, with the hard work of the team and their excellent showing, we ought to win, if ever. Let the faint heart be confident. From our last defeat shall come forth victory.

A new department in the sociological college work has been inaugurated by the present Senior class. The Senior Lecture Course, as it is to be styled, is not unknown in our leading colleges, and it is but natural to see Bucknell advancing along the lines of her predecessors. It is intended to have the best speakers obtainable and to exert a great influence both among the students and in the surrounding community. We wish the enterprise success. It is surely deserving of your support and will yield you much benefit in return.

THE greatest event in our nation's history since the war of the Revolution will have transpired before another issue of your paper. It would be hardly right in "Mirroring" school life to allow the event to pass without comment. Because we are students, we are not isolated from the broader world around us, but we feel an interest in our country and the same patriotism that stirred the breasts of our forefathers, stirs us to-day. We have organized political clubs, held weekly meetings, discussed the issues of the campaign and listened to stirring speeches. Hardly a student is there who is not identified with one of these clubs. Many of us in a few days more will go to our homes and there exercise the duty and privilege of our citizenship. Many of us will be compelled to remain and look on, but we breathe forth a wish like that of Longfellow:

> Thou, too, sail on, O Ship of State!
> Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
> Humanity with all its fears,
> With all its hopes of future years,
> Is hanging breathless on thy fate!

THEY WERE JUSTIFIED.

It is a scene in olden times. The ancient city has been fired and the enemy stand without its walls ready to slay those who shall attempt to escape from the devouring flames. Just within the gates there come forth from a house, whose walls tongues of fire have already begun to lick, a maid and a youth. A glance assures them of their doom; upon the face of the youth is pictured despair, veiled with just the faintest shadow of determination; the maid in hopeless terror clings in desperation to the arm of her lover.

They take their way to the inner city where the flames have not yet crept; they sit upon a marble bench to enjoy its refreshing coolness ere it shall have cracked in the fierce heat of the burning city. No more do they try to hide their love; they are embraced in each other's arms, but none see them; all are too busy making ready to meet death.

After a tender kiss, which they know is one of their last, the youth says: "Dearest, oft hast thou wished to know the contents of this little golden flask which I have ever worn about my neck; now will I tell thee—in it is a deadly poison, sure yet mild in its effects; there is enough for two, I will divide with thee. Mine wert thou to be in life, surely mine shouldst thou be in death; come drink with me the potion! Together were we to go in life, but fate has frowned upon us, yet shall we cheat her, for together will we go in death." The maid looked up almost in entreaty and said: "But alas, my love, I can not think it right that thus we should take our lives into our own hands." Answered the youth:—"Argue not thus my precious one; could we not go to the gates and meet death there upon the spears of the barbarian horde instead of roasting here in torment, and consider ourselves justified, if thus we did? Would this not be choosing our death? Would not this be taking our lives into our own hands? If then it is right to choose a wretched death in preference to a worse one, is it not also right to choose a pleasant one in preference to them both? Why! dost thou still hesitate? Child, dear, remember how even the gods have taught us to better ourselves in every circumstance. Haste! the greedy flames approach us, hesitate no longer, let thy soul take peaceful flight with mine, see! I drink." The maid sunk her head upon his shoulder and tight embraced his neck, then looking up with an air of trustful resignation she reached forth her lips for the poisonous draught.

The flames rushed upon them to kiss their placid faces, but their justified souls were already wandering in Elysium. NOLI SPE.

IDEALS OF A CHRISTIAN MINISTER COMPARED WITH "THE POURE PERSOUN" IN CHAUCER'S PROLOGUE TO THE CANTERBURY TALES.

BY CARL SUMMERBELL.

The greatest of all things existing in the world is man. The greatest of all studies, save the contemplation of God, is the study of man. He that is a student of mankind has a greater subject than one who simply studies nature.

Chaucer is a student of mankind. He not only laughs at the outside polish and sham of the world, but he looks into the inner feeling and true life as well. He does not spare dissimulation or hypocrisy, even though it is found in the portals of the church.

Chaucer was able not only to see the dark side of men, but he could also appreciate and see the bright side. He was not a sour pessimist, nor a weak optimist; but he painted men as they are. The world contains much wickedness, but it also contains much good. To appreciate the good, we must discern between good and evil and recognize both.

Chaucer sees the evil in the "Monk," the "Frere," and the "Shipman;" and recognizes the good in the "Prioresse," the "Poure Persoun," and the "Ploughman."

In the character of the "Poure Persoun" we see one of the most charming, enjoyable, and instructive pictures of true manhood that has ever been drawn. In his calling, the "Poure Persoun" seems to be a master.

If education develops a man, if it increases his powers, if it makes him stronger intellectually, if it causes him to be more efficient in whatever he does, then one who holds an important place in the world, and on whom society is to a certain extent dependent, should be educated.

The clergy have especially to do with the eternal welfare of human beings. They, therefore, hold more important positions than those who are simply related to their temporary welfare. Consequently the clergy of all men should be educated. Chaucer says of the "Poure Persoun:"

> "He was also a lerned man, a clerk,
> That Cristes gospel trewely wolde preche."

A minister should preach where he can do the most good to the greatest number of people. If he can do the most good in the city, amidst cultivated people or among the slums, he should labor there. If he can accomplish the most in the missionary field, or in a country district where the houses are few and far between, he should work in that place. No matter how disagreeable the place may be, the minister should go where he is needed.

We find the "lerned man" preached in a country district which Chaucer describes thus:

> "Wyd was his parisshe, and houses fer a-sonder."

When a minister has found his right place, it is not generally necessary that he should leave it on so long a vacation that the lambs will stray away from the fold. He may be sure that the devil does not take a vacation, but is doing business at the same old stand with a hearty welcome to all old customers. If he would spoil the devil's business he must not neglect his own.

> "He sette nat his benefice to hyre,
> And leet his sheep encombred in the myre,
> And ran to London, un-to seynt Poules,
> To seken him a chaunterie for soules,
> Or with a bretherhed to been withholde,
> But dwelte at hoom, and kepte wel his folde."

The minister's work is generally the most important of any in the community. While other men may till the earth, feed sheep, or exchange monies, the minister works with the souls of men. He labors in the vineyard of men's hearts. If he succeeds, happy may he be; if not, "of all men most miserable." Since his work is so important, he should be willing to give his greatest efforts and hardest labors. He should be glad to do all he can.

> "And was a poure Persoun of a town;
> But riche he was of holy thoght and werk."

* * * * *

> "But he ne lafte nat for reyn ne thonder,
> In siknes nor in meschief to visyte
> The ferreste in his parisshe, moche and lyte,
> Up-on his feet, and in his hand a staf."

Every man has the choice between doing good and evil. He is constantly doing either one or the other. But nothing can force him to make his choice fall on the evil and drop the good, or to choose the good and abhor the evil. He himself makes the choice to sin or not to sin. If he is a free moral agent, he can choose between right and wrong. If anything forces him to do good or to do evil, he is not a free moral agent and is therefore not responsible for what he does.

But although a man cannot be forced to do good or to do evil, he may have an influence thrown round him that will tend to cause him to lead a better or worse life.

A minister is a fisher of men. It is his business to influence men to do right. A man can be more easily influenced to do right by the cords of love than by the whips of justice. One who is pitiful and compassionate toward frail humanity will often come near to the heart of a sinner, no matter how vile that sinner may be.

Chaucer sings of the "Poure Persoun:"

> "And though he holy were, and vertuous,
> He was to sinful man nat despitous,
> Ne of his speche daungerous ne digne,
> But in his teching discreet and benigne."

But to have pity is not to accede to wrongdoing. It is not to chant "Benedictio" when a "Maledictio" should be pronounced. Pity is not to say: "Peace! peace! when there is no peace." If it is right to say, "Thou art the man," as did a prophet of old to a great king, the minister should not shrink. Pity will not cause the minister to hide truths from men. His own love of self may. A minister should tell the truth to any man, even if he be the king. People in high places, society people, often hear little truth. These people need the truth, though it cuts them to the quick. And although a minister's popularity may fall, he should stand.

> "To draw eu folk to heven by fairnesse,
> By good ensample, this was his bisynesse:
> But it were any persone obstinat,
> What so he were, of heigh or lowe estat,
> Him wolde he snibben sharply for the nones."

It sometimes seems as if some people, who only look at the outside of things, are beginning to believe that all ministers preach simply for the money that is in it; that they enter their vocation for filthy lucre; that the primary object of their preaching is to get greenbacks. The persons who have such ideas often judge from seeing the work of but a few ministers. Because a minister receives money for his preaching does not prove that he is preaching simply for money. When a man is a little behind train time—arrives at the station just as the train starts he is likely to run to catch the train. In his running he gets heated up and short of breath. He does not run in order to get heated up and short of breath, but he runs to catch the train.

So, because a man receives money for preaching, it does not prove that he preaches for the money. He cannot do his best unless he gives his whole time to the work, and he cannot give his whole time to the work unless he is supported. No true minister preaches simply for money. He preaches because he would lift men up. He would give his whole life to his fellow-men. It is hard for him to do otherwise than to preach. God intends the ministry to be his calling. He preaches for love. He is not a hired servant, but a friend. As Chaucer says of the "Poure Persoun:"

> "He was a shepherde and no mercenarie."

If a man becomes great in any art he must love that art. A musician cannot be a true artist unless he loves music. A sculptor cannot succeed in the true sense of the word unless he loves statuary. A painter cannot be classed among the masters unless his life is absorbed by his art. Neither can a minister succeed in his calling—to win men—unless he loves men. If he loves men he will go to them when he is needed. If they be in trouble, such as death, disease, sin, the minister will especially go to them at those times.

> "Ful looth were him to cursen for his tythes,
> But rather wolde he yeven, out of doute,
> Un-to his poure parisshens aboute
> Of his offringe, and eek of his substaunce
> He coude in litel thing han suffisaunce."

Can pure water flow forth from a foul spring? Can one gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles? Can a man who has a beam in his own eye see to take out a speck from his brother's eye? Can a man be expected to help others to Christ when he himself is not with him?

Chaucer closes the picture of the "Poure Persoun" with these words:

> "But Cristes lore, and his apostles twelve,
> He taughte, but first he folwed it him-selve."

A VISIT TO CONCORD AND LEXINGTON.

One lovely day in October, Professor Coman chaperoned a party of Wellesley College students to Concord and Lexington, and the historic places along the way. After a beautiful drive of two hours and a half, we came to Walden Pond, which lay gleaming thro the trees at the foot of the hill. Here we made our first stop; for here it was that Thoreau lived "as near as possible to Nature" in his hut in the pine woods which border the pond. The hut is gone, but the traces of its walls are yet to be seen. Upon its site admiring visitors are gradually raising a monument of stones and boulders.

Two miles away is Concord, where Louisa Alcott and the Concord sages lived so long. We went first to the Library, where we saw the original manuscript of "Little Women." It was in a glass case, open at the chapter "Heart-ache," where Laurie triumphs on Commencement day in the presence of his grandfather and the Marches. There was also the manuscript of Hawthorne's "Dolliver Romance," Holmes' "Dorothy I," in the most marvelously neat hand-writing, a part of Emerson's "Culture," and a manuscript of Thoreau's. Emerson wrote in a large, bold, legible hand, but Thoreau's writing was impossible to read.

On the other side of the village is the Old Manse. Two old ladies live there now. They are very jealous of their privacy, so we were not allowed to go in. Beyond the Old Manse is the Orchard. Along the road at the side of this, the skirmish at Concord bridge took place, and the first British soldier fell. The road is lined on either side with a double row of pine trees. It is said that after the battle, the citizens of Concord each planted a tree to commemorate the occasion. On this side of the bridge is the monument which the people of Concord erected long ago. Beyond the bridge is the famous statue of "The Minute Man,"—a beautiful figure, full of life and energy. One can fairly feel his eager watchfulness as he stands, musket in hand, ready for the foe. It was designed by the sculptor, French, and its inscription is from Emerson. Some one has said that very few towns can furnish a poet, a sculptor and an occasion. Between two pine trees, beside the stone wall which separates the orchard from the road, is the grave of "Two British Soldiers," as the inscription reads. Professor Coman read to us here Hawthorne's description of the Old Manse, the bridge and the battle ground.

We drove next to Sleepy Hollow where Emerson, Hawthorne, Thoreau and the Alcotts lie buried. Their graves are in the farther side of the cemetery on a high pine-covered bluff. overlooking the river. Emerson's grave is marked by a huge, rose quartz boulder, with no inscription of any kind upon it, not even a name. Not far away is the Hawthorne lot—the most unassuming spot imaginable. It is surrounded by a wire fence and an arbor-vitæ hedge, so high that one must stand on tip-toe to see over. Hawthorne's grave has a plain little head-stone with the name "Hawthorne" in raised letters. The Alcott lot is irregular in outline, and is surrounded by magnificent pines. Here are five graves side by side, each marked by a little head-stone with the initials and the dates of birth and death. When we came to "L. M. A. 1832–1888," not a word was said, but some of the girls stooped down to gather some of the fragrant needles which covered the mound.

We had our luncheon at "Wrights' Tavern," which was built in 1754. We stood at the bar where Major Pitcairn stood on the morning of the famous 19th of April 1775, and said as he stirred his wine,—"Thus will I stir the blood of the rebels before night."

But the crowning part of the day was our visit to the Hawthorne and Alcott houses. These stand a little distance out of the town. We passed Emerson's house on our way. It is a plain, unpretentious, white frame building with a square front and green shutters.

The Hawthorne house was the home of the Alcotts until Louise was twenty. Hawthorne bought it in 1858 and remodeled it somewhat. Part of the house is more than two hundred years old. It is so delightfully old-fashioned both outside and in. The ceilings are very low and unplastered, with beams which Time has stained a rich brown. You remember in "Little Women" that Lauria could touch them with his hand. There are the queerest little corridors, shut in at both ends by gates, and nooks and crannies of all sorts. We climbed the "Hill Difficulty" where Meg, Joe, Beth and Amy played Pilgrim's Progress. It is well named, for a more crooked, winding stair one can scarcely imagine. We visited the room where the "Little Women" slept,—we saw the great fire place in the parlor, and the corner where Beth's piano used to stand, but we were not in the attic where "genius burned." The house, at the time of our visit, was owned and occupied in summer by Mr. D. Lothrop—the publisher of Boston. Mrs. Lothrop, whom every body knows as Margaret Sidney, received and welcomed us very cordially, and showed us all the interesting things about the house. She has a dressing table that was Hawthorns, she uses the study which was his, his book case still stands in the library, and we sat in his big leather chair.

The Alcott house is separated from Hawthorne's home by a pine grove. It is over one hundred and seventy five years old. We were not all allowed to go upstairs at the same time, because the house was considered unsafe. We were much interested in Miss Alcott's and Miss May Alcott's rooms. The doors and window facings of "Amy's" room were covered with her drawings. Over the fire place in Miss Alcott's room was painted an owl. Back and to one side of the house is the little frame building where was held the Concord

School of Philosophy. Its past glories are faded now; it is entirely without paint, and the steps are fast going to decay.

Although we drove over the road which Paul Revere had taken in his ride from Concord to Lexington, we were so filled with thoughts of these beloved writers that battles and Revolutionary heroes had lost all attraction for us. Not until we had reached the lovely old town of Lexington, and had seen its battle fields and monuments, and the house, built in 1698, where John Hancock and Samuel Adams were sleeping when aroused by Paul Revere, was our enthusiasm stirred. The beautiful old elms, with their historic associations, especially aroused admiration.

In the Lexington Library were unnumbered Revolutionary relics;—a pewter plate that Washington ate from, silver shoe buckles, Major Pitcairn's pistols, made in England, cocked hats of various styles, and documents of all kinds, including a fac-simile of the death warrant of Charles I. But most interesting to me was a picture of Paul Revere in his old age. One could hardly associate this pleasant old gentleman, however, with the hero of the gallant midnight ride.

We turned our backs at last upon all these delightful scenes, feeling that this had been a day well spent. ELIZABETH C. EDDELMAN.

A NATIONAL HOLIDAY IN PARIS.

Some days ago Paris received the head of the nation that raised France from an isolated position. How much the French appreciate the sympathy of Russia, which has apparently placed them on a level with other nations of Europe, was undoubtedly shown by the celebration of the holidays decreed for this occasion.

Paris alone knows how to celebrate such a day. One can scarcely imagine what skill is displayed in decorating and in other things that go to make a holiday.

Comparing their national holiday, July 14, the day of the siege and storming of the Bastille, with our Fourth of July, their superiority in celebrating is apparent.

July 14, 1896, was the one hundred seventh anniversary. There were really several holidays among which the fourteenth was the most prominent. For several days before the fête the houses on both sides of the streets were decorated with the flags and colors of the two allied nations. Occasionally one found an American flag which then showed its beauty.

On the great day the streets were alive with well dressed people. Every carriage in Paris and its environs seemed to be on the beautiful streets of the city of the Revolution. During the forenoon most people remained in the city. In the afternoon many went to see the army of Paris pass in review before the President of the Republic. The soldiers, especially the cavalry, seemed very well drilled. After the review the broad street leading from the Bois de Boulogne to l'avenue des Champs Elysees was lined with people who cheered the president, the deputies, and other officers of State, while passing. The air resounded with the cries of "Vive la France! Vive la Republique! Vive Monsieur le President!" It was at this time that a young man was carried away to such an extent that he shot a revolver several times to attract attention to his cries. As a reward he was compelled to spend some time in an asylum.

In the evening Paris held its position as the city of the beautiful and artistic. There was a display of fire works that seemed wonderful to one who had seen only a celebration of Independence Day in America. During this display of fire works and especially afterward, the people danced on every street corner. Bands and orchestras were scattered over the whole city. The excitement sometimes ran so high that many embraced each other for joy. The two or three following days were also holidays and were spent in restoring the tranquillity of mind and body.

How could an American spend so much time celebrating the anniversary of some illustrious deed of his ancestors? Are we not too practical? Is our industry not more honor to our forefathers?

ATHLETICS.

Since the game with the U. of Pa., the team has been very much retarded in practice by the soreness of the men after the hard game at Philadelphia and the inclement weather, but when practice was possible it has been productive of good results.

The work of the individual players shows much improvement. The tackling is harder and surer and more ability is shown in handling the ball. Catterall, who played end last year is now behind the line and Nattress is putting up a fast game at quarter.

What is most imperative now is the development of better team play. In this day of scientific foot-ball a team that does not protect the runner with good interference can not hope to advance the ball toward the enemy's goal line. In this line some improvement has been shown in the past few practices, but it will take a great amount of practice to make the interference and general team play as effective as it should be.

The adoption of the foot ball rules by the Advisory Board,certainly,was a move in the right direction. In the past, lack of physical training has been more harmful to Bucknell teams than any lack of training in the science of the game. To play a fast, snappy game, a player's physical condition must be equal to the demands made upon it. Much will be done to attain this end by observing the new foot ball rules.

Manager Purdy took the second team to Selinsgrove, Saturday, Oct. 10, where they played the Susquehanna University a tie game, the score being 10–10. The Selinsgrove men were very much heavier than the home team, and as they played a much more scientific game than in former years, the second team should be congratulated on holding their heavy opponents down to a tie.

The line up was as follows:

S. U.	POSITIONS.	B. U. RESERVES.
Brumgart	center	Reed.
You	left guard	Christy.
H. Herman	right guard	Sherman.
Erdman	right tackle	Weymouth.
Wingard	left end	Riemer.
Morris	right end	Evans,(Gilpin).
Carpenter	quarter back	Garner.
Hoover	left half-back	Smith.
J. Herman	right half-back	Fetzer.
Hare	full-back	Senn.

The game with Johns Hopkins, which was scheduled for Oct. 17. was canceled, and instead the U. of Pa. Reserves played on the home grounds.

This game was the best contested of the season and was quite a surprise to the Pennsylvania men.

A Philadelphia paper stated that the Reserves would run up a greater score than the first team did at Philadelphia on Oct. 3. The score shows that Bucknell played the superior game, it being 10–0 in favor of the home team.

Captain Cober chose the ball, the visitors defending the western goal.

The kick off was run back past center, where it was stopped by Nattress,next to the last Bucknell man to defend our goal. The home team held Pennsylvania for four downs, after which they showed their strength by advancing the ball by both center and end plays. After changing hands several times,the ball was carried over by Catterall for a touch down and goal. During the remainder of the first half neither side scored.

The second half was largely a repetition of the first, the ball changing hands several times and one touch down being made for Bucknell.

During the entire game the play was mostly in Pennsylvania's territory. Our line held like a stone wall and the interference showed great improvement.

The line up was as follows:

B. U.	POSITIONS.	U. P. RESERVES.
Gilchrist	left end	Rengenberg.
Rowe	left tackle	Zeigler,(Stephenson)
Jennings	center	Carnet.
Lesher	right guard	Dean.
Cober	right tackle	DeSilver.
Jenkinson	right end	Worth.
Nattress	quarter back	Weeks.
Thomas	left half-back	Outland.

COLLEGE NOTES.

State—Oct. 31.

We won't do a thing.

Megargee has appeared in our midst again.

Help athletics by giving a liberal subscription.

We are glad to see Flint, '98, and Catterall,'99, back again.

Arthur Rees has been initiated into the Phi Epsilon Fraternity.

Mr. Nattress,of Sunbury. Pa., has entered College as a special student.

S. C. Bell, 1900, went home a few days ago to attend the wedding of his sister.

Several large trees have been cut down around the college but will not be missed.

Query: Why is every Senior a Cupid?
Answer: Because he loves his Psyche (?).

The Misses Mary and Gertrude Stephens have been initiated into the Pi Beta Phi fraternity.

Miss Laura Allen has changed her residence from the Institute to the home of Mrs. Clingan.

A number of the boys went down to Selinsgrove on the tenth to witness the foot ball game. They all report an excellent time.

Our Professors may often bore us, but that does not excuse our boorishness if we gape so audibly as to be heard all over the class room.

The Executive Committee have made some very stringent rules. One rule requires that a man must retire before 10:30 p. m. This has a desired effect.

Mr. Harvey gave an address at Williamsport, Oct. 11, on the "Need of Work for Young Men in Small Towns." He also repeated the same at Pittston, Oct. 18.

Prof. in Mechanics. "Mr. A—Will you please state to the class why butter possesses more energy than bread or beef?" Mr. A—"Because it is stronger I suppose."

The following men have been chosen for the Junior Debate: Anderson, Cook, Davis, Dutton, Diggs, Forrester, Hill, Stober, Wiltbank, Lindemann, Fithian, and Mulkie.

After the game with Pennsylvania, foot ball enthusiasm has run high and the prospects for a victory over State are very bright.

Miss Rosa L. Hartley has been detained from school by the illness of her father. Mr. Hartley is, however steadily recovering, and we trust Miss Hartly will soon return for her Senior year.

It is amusing to see a Junior, who is called upon to recite in Physics, arise and during his declamation play with his great, thousand paged, twenty-five pound text book. Leave them on the floor.

On Friday evening, Oct. 16, a jolly crowd went to Northumberland on a straw ride. They reported a "large" time, and we have no reason to doubt it, if we are to judge from the time they came home.

The district convention of the Y. M. C. A., held at Williamsport, Oct. 10–12, was attended by thirteen delegates from Bucknell University. The men returned full of enthusiasm for the work and report a very profitable convention.

Dr. Edward Pick, the celebrated authority on Memory Culture, recently delivered an excellent address in Bucknell Hall on "The Memory and How to Improve It." The two rules he gave were: (1) concentrate your attention on a few things at a time and (2) try to find objects of comparison in the subjects themselves. Dr. Pick also gave four additional lectures to a large class of Academy and College students.

During a recent convention in town, many of the students had the privilege of hearing one of Bucknell's old friends and lecturers, Dr. Boardman, of Philadelphia. His subject was the "Grecian Games." After painting a very vivid word picture of the games as he saw them, the lecturer proceeded to show some of the writings of Paul in the light of Grecian athletics. The words were in season and well to the point.

The students and people of Lewisburg were very pleasantly entertained Wednesday evening, Oct. 7, by Eli Perkins, the celebrated humorist, who lectured on the Philosophy of Wit. He drew the following clear distinctions: Humor always deals with truth and finds its materials in the little incidents of real, every day life. Wit does not stick to the truth, but gives free scope to exaggeration and the imagination. Ridicule debases truth by making it appear ludicrous. Satire calls attention to the truth by exaggerating error or evil.

One of the best treats of the season was given Oct. 15, by our honored President, John Howard Harris, LL. D., in the Opera House at Lewisburg, before a large and intelligent audience. Dr. Harris' lecture was on "The Two Sides of a Dollar." The address was handled with great skill, and showed deep thought on the subject. The two sides of a dollar as set forth by the lecturer are, the earning of it, and the use of it. The illustrations were drawn in most part from home and every day life. At times one could hear a pin drop, so well were the hearers under the sway of the orator.

LIBRARY NOTES.

Mr. Craige Lippincott, of the Board of Trustees, contributed sixty-six selected volumes, covering nine departments of instruction, during the summer vacation.

Mr. Wm. J. Coxey's additions to his Alcove since the last report in June, number one hundred and ninety-four volumes. This brings the total to nearly twelve hundred volumes.

These gentlemen are entitled to the thanks of all friends of the institution and to the emulation of many.

Miss Brown is making gratifying progress with the Catalogue. Author and subject cards for all works in the department of Philosophy and allied topics have been written. She is now engaged upon cards for the department of History.

The young women seem to enjoy their room very much. The present space will soon be too limited for the growing demands.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Jennie Jones recently visited at the home of Miss Mary Kline of Winfield.

Miss Armitage and Miss Edna Shires spent October 11 at their respective homes.

The class of '97 has elected the following officers: President, Miss Margaret Wagner; Vice President, Miss Ella Bender; Secretary, Miss Marguerite O'Donnell; Treasurer, Miss Elizabeth Rossiter.

The Missionary Study Class has been organized under the leadership of Miss Sallie VanGundy. The subject of study for the winter will be biographical sketches of some of our most prominent missionaries.

Doctor Harris led the Y. W. C. A. prayer meeting Tuesday afternoon, October 13, taking as his subject "Learning Christ." The Association has planned to have one of the prayer meetings for each month led by some member of the Faculty. Professor Martin will conduct the meeting for November.

Professor Martin gave a talk on Robert Browning to the Literature class on Friday, October 9. A number of ladies in the neighborhood availed themselves of the opportunity of hearing this excellent lecture. One of them pronounced the lecture consummate, as a fair and comprehensive treatment of the writings of that master poet.

A reception was tendered by the Volunteer Bands to our honored graduates Dr. and Mrs. Elton S. Corson, Friday afternoon, October 16, in the Institute parlors. Mrs. Corson, née Miss Margaret Thompson, graduated from the Institute in '92 and was deservedly one of the most popular girls of the Seminary. After teaching near her home in Clearfield county for two years, she took a thorough course in nursing at the Polyclinic Hospital, Philadelphia. She has thus prepared herself to be an efficient helpmeet to her husband in his work as a Medical Missionary in Burmah. Her many friends in Lewisburg bid her and her husband "Godspeed" on their mission of love and mercy.

The October meeting of the Bucknell Alumnae Club was held Tuesday evening, October 13. Mrs. W. C. Gretzinger was elected president; Mrs. Leroy Stephens, Vice-President; Miss Annie Evans, Secretary; Miss Florence VanDyke, Treasurer. Mrs. Matlack was chosen as a delegate to represent the Club at the convention of the Pennsylvania Federation of Women's Clubs, held at Bradford, October 21. The program for the evening consisted of the reading of an original poem on the Club by Mrs. Grant Dreisbach, instrumental music by Miss Aikin, vocal music by Miss Crawford and vacation echoes by Miss Evans, Miss Slifer, and Mrs. Larison. Miss Evans told of camp life, Miss Slifer of vacation on the farm and Mrs. Larison of Battle Creek, Michigan, and its institutions.

ACADEMY NEWS.

The new filter makes us feel that the authorities are sometimes too considerate.

Messrs. Young, Stephens, Earle, Pierson, Rank, and Shields attended the Y. M. C. A convention at Williamsport.

Many of our students attended the lectures given by Dr. Pick on Memory Culture. He showed different ways of remembering or recalling things, yet thought and close attention are still the best assistants.

Music has charms. Never have we had such an opportunity for dispelling the shame of a past "flunk," or opening the way for another. We have not only various instruments accompanied by artists, but also an excellent music box which merely requires a crank.

Mr. Shields recently gave us an excellent report of his work at Northfield, this summer. His experience has made him more suitable for the office to which he was chosen last year. The president of a Y. M. C. A. should be acquainted with methods for teaching the Bible. An Association is then a more important factor in education.

Why do we take so little interest in Athletics? Can we expect to have a winning team when the College draws from our material? Do boys like to have a losing team, or do they take interest in Athletics which bring them no laurels? Under such conditions let us rather strive for interest in the Athletics of the University. Places are open to us. The laurels won are partly ours. Let us watch with interest and admiration the work on our campus. Cheer and urge on the men. Let us act like the followers of a team we love. Let us not cheer its opponents, but applaud good plays, and always keep both sides in good humor, the condition of an ideal athlete.

PERSONALS.

'56. Hon. John A. Gundy, the Democratic nominee of this district for State Senator, recently delivered a forceful and logical address before the Bimetallic Club.

'59. Rev. A. J. Furman has accepted a call to Indiana, Pa.

'62. For the nineteenth consecutive year, Rev. J. G. Walker, D.D., was elected Clerk of the Philadelphia Association of Baptist Churches.

'87. Captain Howard L. Calder an aid-de-camp on the staff of Gen. J. P. S. Gobbin, commander of the Third Brigade, N. G. P., has been appointed on the staff of Major General Snowden as judge advocate, with the rank of lieutenant colonel. Colonel Calder entered the National Guard, during his college course, in Company A, Twelfth Regiment, Lewisburg, and later was a private in the City Grays, Harrisburg.

'88. Dr. Lincoln Hulley recently received a call to the pastorate of the Immanuel Tabernacle, Baltimore, Md.

'89. Rev J. M. Ashton has resigned the pastorate of the First Baptist Church, Cramer Hill, N. J.

'89. E. H. Gine, Esq. of Seattle, Wash., has received the Republican nomination for the legislature.

'91. Chas. Campbell, M. D., has located in Sunbury.

Ex-'91. A little daughter came on Aug. 31, to grace the home of W. C. Scotney, at Moores, Delaware County, Pa.

'92. Mr. Geo. Shorkley has entered Hahneman Medical College, Philadelphia.

'92. On Oct. 15, at Bower, Pa., Dr. Elton S. Corson and Martha M. Thompson were united in marriage by Rev. Llewellyn Phillips, assisted by Rev. N. O. Patterson. Dr. Corson was graduated in the Classical Course in '92; took his M. D. at U. of P. in '95; was an attendant Physician in the Polyclinic Hospital in '96. In his school days Dr. Corson had many friends among the students and faculty. He was a faithful member of Theta Alpha Literary Society, and belonged to the memorable foot ball team that defeated Cornell and State College. In Christian work he was most active. As President of the Y. M. C. A. he introduced the present committee work and Bible classes. The hand of "Deacon" Corson is manifest to day in the Christian organizations of the College. Dr. and Mrs. Corson will sail Oct. 28 for Tongou, Burmah, where, by the appointment of the Baptist Foreign Missionary Society, they will take up the medical work of the famous Karen mission founded by George Dana Boardman, "the Apostle to the Karens."

'93. Prof. Jos. M. Wolfe has severed his connection with Pennsylvania State College to accept a position in the Vermont Academy, Saxton River, Vt.

Ex-'93. Miss Florence Pannebaker, of Lewistown, Pa., spent a few days at the Institute on her way home from the State C. E. convention at Scranton.

'93. Rev. J. H. Haslam preached the introductory sermon at the annual meeting of the North Philadelphia Baptist Association. He was also elected Moderator of the meeting. This is quite an honor for a young man when it is remembered that the above Association has a membership of ten thousand.

'94. L. L. Riggin entered the U. of P. Medical School this fall.

'94. Geo. E. Deppen is reading law with H. S. Knight, in Sunbury.

'94. Prof. James Rowland Hughes, of the Scranton Public Schools, and Miss Harriet May Smith were married on June 24, 1896. Prof. Hughes has charge of one hundred fifteen students in one room alone with the general oversight of fourteen more.

NOVEMBER 10. 1896.

ARRANGEMENTS for an intercollegiate debate with Franklin and Marshall are practically completed. The debate will occur during the winter term. The preliminaries will take place Saturday, and it is hoped that Bucknell may be as successful as last year in getting competent speakers. It is a movement of inestimable value to both schools.

THE great battle with State is over and shouts of victory are in the air. All praise is due to the gallant eleven and especially to their self-sacrificing, devoted captain. Too much cannot be said in commendation of the faithful work of the team. But the efforts of those in the back ground are not to be overlooked. The members of the second team deserve no small amount of credit for their constant presence on the field in spite of the long and hard practice games which resulted in crippling so many of their number. The presence of Smith and Megargee, alumni and former members of the team, during the week preceeding the game, was of the utmost value. We hope that the custom of having graduate players return and help the team before great games has been inaugurated for all time. Without their aid we could hardly have won. We give them a large share of the credit of winning the State game and for instituting a custom which will be of the greatest value to Bucknell athletics.

IT was remarked by one of the coaches the week preceeding the State game: "You fellows are too studious to succeed in foot ball." What greater compliment could be given to our athletes in view of the fact that in many colleges there is a tendency to have foot ball players take a special course and develop professional foot ball, making studies simply a matter of red tape importance? It may be truly said of the present team that they are athletes not only on the gridiron but in the class room. This standard ought to be maintained. The moment professionals are imported and kept on a light broth of study, that moment the game degrades and the school is dishonored. Let Bucknell guard against this evil, protect herself by a strict code of rules and refuse to play any team where she may meet professionals. This should be done because of the risk we run of possible, unexpected defeat and as a matter of principle.

COLLEGE life is not a monastic life spent over books with an occasional foot ball spree to lend it spice. The college is a miniature of the larger world outside. In it we have the Y. M. C. A., which stands as our religious organization, we have our publications, we have our literary societies, which stand for parliamentary bodies, we have other organizations, political and social. These need your support and you need the benefits which accrue from them. More leaders are wanted, more faithful followers. There is a place at the front which is open to each one of you. Things are not as you would have them. The school and the organizations are not in many points as you would wish. But how is it with you, have you done your utmost to uplift things to your ideal? Wanted are men who will shut their lips to idle gossip, who will take courage from defeat and push doggedly on until they attain their desired end. Such men will be needed out of college and will bring the highest premium; a listless man is a detriment to any community. Why not then lend your vigorous aid to the literary society, to athletics, to Y. M. C. A., to some of the numerous deserving organizations which need your aid and whose aid you most need?

AN AUTUMN DAY.

The Autumn day's serenely fair,
Though frosty flakes infuse the air;
The milky clouds in shapes arise
Like spirit sails on desert skies.

The crimson maples fire the shade,
And purple hill and rushy glade;
While Phœbus rides enwrapp'd in shrouds,
Encumber'd by the scudding clouds.

The robins cease their merry chime
And wing their flight to sunnier clime:
The swallows dart about the barn,
Or skim above the reedy tarn.

The fruitful orchards bow and bend;
To sward beneath their bounty send:
And timid hares doze in the sedge,
While sparrows twitter in the hedge.

The cows come home and meekly low
As though they felt the Autumn's glow;
And gentle sheep in silence feed
Where golden rods have cast their seed.

I tread where fallen nuts abound,
On leafy tufts and carpets brown'd,
Which Hunter's moon will stud with gems
As silver spars illume the glens.

When life in silent Autumn stands,
With wither'd cheek and wrinkled hands,
Let works of love and vict'ries won
Be banners bright, for God's "well done."

THE BUCKNELL LIBRARY.

In 1880 and for some years later, the library was open to students for a single hour each week. Each student was permitted to draw one, or perhaps two books, which he must return within one week. The Professors had keys to the Library and made such use of it as they could without the aid of a catalogue. The custom was for each instructor to carry off such works as he needed and to return them to the Library at his own convenience, and thus it came about that important reference volumes such as the British Encyclopædia, Standard Histories, etc., were lost sight of for months, and even years together. In case of the death or removal of a Professor, the Library commonly received a large accession of lost volumes.

For two years in the eighties, Prof. Isaac Hill, brother of President Hill, was Librarian, and the books became accessible to students for some hours of each day. Prof. Hill began a catalogue of the Library, which, however, was not finished, when he left the Institution.

Prof. Freeman Loomis succeeded Prof. Hill, and introduced many improvements. He continued cataloguing the books, employing two students in this work. He secured student assistants and kept the Library open at all times except when his assistants were in classes. He also fitted up the alcoves for government reports, placed over them pictures and plaster casts and greatly enlarged the supplies of current literature. Under Dr. Loomis, Bucknell began to see that a Library was a possibility.

Prof. William E. Martin is the first Librarian who has not been required to do full duty as an Instructor. Under his wise administration the Library has made vast strides. It is now open practically the whole day. The catalogue is being rapidly pushed. The files of current literature have been completed and bound. The files of Government publications have been greatly enlarged, and students have been constantly assisted in their researches by an earnest and enthusiastic Librarian. The writer, who has witnessed the growth of the College since 1876, feels that in no department has greater advance been made than in the Library, and he especially desires to bear witness to the labors of Dr. F. Loomis and Prof. Martin.

It is not known to the student body, nor to the friends of the Institution that since his appointment as Librarian, Prof. Martin has given not only his time during the sessions of the College, but also during the whole of the vacations. During the long summer recess, the Library has been open as regularly as during term time. The same genial and enthusiastic Librarian has always been present to welcome and aid the visitor. Not only has Professor Martin given all his time, but, unable to secure funds for needed expenses, he has used his own means, advancing hundreds of dollars that the Library might grow and be of value to the whole Institution. Probably no man connected with the Baptist Denomination in Pennsylvania is so well fitted as Professor Martin to build up a Library at Bucknell University. May he receive that support which his self-sacrificing labors so richly merit. Can it be that there is no one in Pennsylvania who will help him realize his fondest hopes for the Library? Haverford College is just coming into possession of $600,000. May our Library soon find a friend able to endow it in somewhat the same way.

President Angell, of Michigan University was accustomed to say that "the Library is a greater agent in the civilization of students than any two Professers." With its great value in mind, may it receive our most liberal and hearty support. Let students compare the Library of to-day with that of 1880.

GEO. G. GROFF.

GEORGE MEREDITH,S "EGOIST."

To pass from the novels of Hardy or Caine to those of George Meredith is to experience an infinite relief. Stories of hopeless and unceasing conflict between the natural and the conventional which Hardy gives, us are an intense strain on the emotions. Hardy's characters are at the mercy of a blind force which impels them to act from feeling alone. On the other hand Meredith's characters act from reason as well as from feeling. Meredith believes that man can half control his fate by intelligent struggle against whatever opposes him. This gives his novels a spirit of hopefulness and buoyancy which is refreshing.

"The Egoist" is analytic study of character.

The plot is very simple, merely the working out of a situation. Sir Willoughby Patterne is tested by the ordeal of love and found to be a personified Egoist. The motive of the novel is the conflict between two opposing personalities. The woman's claim is for freedom, self-hood, the right to be herself; the man's, for self.

She struggles, grows, and triumphs; he insists on worshiping himself, loses his bride and marries a woman who "will endeavor to respect him."

> "Through very love of self himself he slew."

Meredith evidently cherishes a very high ideal of womanhood. The helpless, twining, fine ladies, the class that is "fine by defect and beautifully weak," he cannot abide. "This awful baggage," he calls them, "in the van of humanity, these women who have not moved on their own feet since the primal mother." He deplores the lack of brains in women. "More brains, O Lord, more brains" is his cry and he is the champion of women with brains. She is on absolute equality with men. Meredith would "set the gift of strength in woman beyond ornamental whiteness. Are women not of nature warriors, like men—men's mates instead of puppets?" Still it is not the woman of the obnoxious woman's rights type that is his ideal, but the self-contained, clear-headed woman, the woman who thinks.

In "The Egoist" love is presented as a spiritual and yet a rational element. You may love warmly, but you must not offend reason. Here Meredith exercises his keen sense of proportion. Love is our interest in human life but the world with all its demands and activities cannot be shut out.

With all his reason and good sense Meredith can write an ideal love scene. The meeting of Clara and Whitford beneath the wild cherry tree, on account of its imaginative element and its youthful idealism must stand as one of the most striking love scenes in literature.

Meredith is an optimist. He is not blind to evil and the people of his creation are not free from it, but the struggle against evil always deepens the character and ennobles the nature. This philosophic insight as to evil is the secret of Meredith's optimism. The whole atmosphere of "the Egoist" is hopeful and "who can think," says Meredith, "without thinking hopefully." His style is the natural expression of his personality. He delights in condensations and elliptical expressions.

His sentences are always strong and farthest removed from the common place.

"The Egoist" is a piece of realism, that is, realism of subjective life. Facts are of account only as they are vitalized by philosophy. The purpose of "The Egoist" is first of all an art purpose. The writer deals with the concrete and presents no theories. To use his own words: "he has not a thought of persuading you to believe in him. Follow and you shall see." He aims to show the summary of actual life. "Whatever else is to be said, this is certain, that George Meredith is a center of power. Here is a notable figure; consider him." H. C. S.

A DAY IN PARIS.

We have heard and read about the French, especially of Paris. Their food and dress have been described; their marriage, social instinct, and idea of art discussed; their religion and women condemned. The difference between life in France and America is most striking during the first few days; one day gives many new ideas.

Many foreigners, who spend a month or more at Paris, have their rooms in a suburb, whence, after the first repast, consisting of coffee, tea, or chocolate and rolls, they board the train for the city of amusement and instruction. The cost of travel is about the same as in America. The tickets are punched at the gate and when a coach, first, second, or third class, according to the ticket, has been found, a person enters through a side door one of two compartments of a wagon, each seating ten passengers. People sit face to face and the aisle is so narrow that their knees often touch. There is no room for a conductor or brakeman and the tickets are gathered at the gate of one's destination.

As soon as one arrives at the station he feels that he is in Paris. The depot is large and spacious, always clean and full of people. During the forenoon one visits to advantage stores, museums, and other buildings of interest. A large store like the "Magasiu du Louvre" is well provided with clerks, who are very polite and always ready to show their particular class of goods, for each clerk has charge of a certain quantity and quality, which he keeps free from dust and well arranged. When one has seen the store and bought a few articles, it is about ten o'clock, the time for the opening of the largest and best museum of France, "Musées Du Louvre."

From ten to twelve o'clock is the best time, since only a few visit in the morning. During the afternoon, from two to four, a person sees people from almost all nations assembled to study the fine works of art and each other. The structure is so large that one must walk rapidly to merely pass through all the halls in two hours. The first floor is set aside for the sculpture of Antiquity, the Rennaissance, and Modern Times. One can see the condition and character of the age of civilization in the different statues. A person might pass all the other pieces of sculpture without notice, but he must stop before "Venus De Milo," for this statue will be considered by him the most illustrious of all. The smile upon its half open lips, the noble and beautiful expression of its eyes compel one to cast back many a glance while pressing on through this hall full of the statues of antiquity. On the second floor one finds paintings, drawings and engravings. The pictures, arranged according to schools, show the characteristics of the different artists. As poets sing of wars, trees, rocks, or plains, painters express their ideas of the same on canvass. The third floor is set aside for things pertaining to the navy and for antiquities from China, Japan, Egypt, and other countries.

When one has been in this museum from ten to twelve o'clock and has used his time properly, a good meal is very agreeable. The many restaurants offer good opportunities for satisfying hunger at various prices. With a little care five francs, one dollar, pays for a good dinner. The menu is quite extensive and one may be sure that everything is well prepared in the kitchen. The attention of the waiter is especially good, for which one must give him the customary tip. The bread is fine and Americans eat cake that is not such a luxury. Coffee and tea seem wanting, but there is water and the wine is red or white. Their table manners have often been questioned. The Americans and English may criticise them, but the French eat naturally and enjoy themselves at the table more than many of us who constantly guard against a breach of etiquette and watch for it in others.

After dinner, if one has spent some time at Paris, he may have a friend with whom to promenade. Champs Elysées is a pleasant place and many gather here during the afternoon. One walks on an avenue of majestic buildings a mile and a half long and two hundred and thirty feet wide. The Parisian regularity, order, decorum, and beauty seen at this place, give one the conception of a "finished city." No person is in a hurry and all seek the company of others, contrary to the custom in America where we isolate ourselves, developing merely the individual. To a Boston young woman "the Champs Elysées looked like a railroad station and she wished the people would get up from the benches and go home." The people are very civil and are mutually interested. One notices this peculiarity most of all in one of the numerous cafés. Many small tables about two feet in diameter cover half the side walk. Here people sit for two and three hours drinking something besides water yet not sufficient to intoxicate them. Men in such condition are extremely rare. The American gulps six glasses of beer from his bar, while the Frenchman drinks one. The French think that a little stimulant benefits them, the Americans drink to get drunk. At the outer end of this avenue is the place of the stars. About twelve streets meet and in the middle of this place is situated "L'Arc De Triomphe," begun in 1806 by Napoleon I. in memory of the battle of Austerlitz and not completed until 1836. It is the largest monument of its kind. Between four and five o'clock one should take a cab, drive through Champs Elysées to see again the many things that can scarcely be described, and halt at the Garden of the Tuileries to hear the free concert by the best band of France, if not of the world, which plays to the enjoyment of many thousand Parisians. After you have paid a small sum for the cab with pneumatic tires, which brought you safely through so many vehicles to this garden which is almost a mass of flowers, you seem to fit in the gathering and feel perfectly at home.

Often one is invited to supper by his friend. The superiority of the French in cooking is shown especially in the private family. There is not a great quantity or variety of food, but what you do eat is cooked to perfection. The housewife has prepared just enough for the persons present; nothing of this meal remains for two or three days. The cook has used judgment. They drink wine, converse, and eat much longer than Americans.

You can scarcely imagine what opportunities are offered during the evening. Until eight o'clock one can walk on the boulevard des Italiens, or one of the other large streets, when it is time for the opera. At the "L'Opéra" one hears music and sees acting that are superb. The customs, manners, and also the women of France are seen at their best. The faces and forms of the women are not rapturously beautiful, nor are their dresses of the best quality, but what they have is seen to the best advantage. Her appearance immediately gives you the idea that she is an artist.

G. C. L. Riemer.

MIDNIGHT IN THE "LAB."

The halls were deserted, no lights were seen in the building. To the casual passer-by quiet and darkness reigned supreme. Such, however, was not the case.

"Well," with a groan, "I'm glad those idiots have at last left us in peace." This from HCl. "I really don't know where I'm at, or rather, where I'm not at. Here I am in my bottle on the shelf and trickling down to the floor and a thousand other places. Who could feel the comforts of home life when knocked about like that?" —bursting into melancholy song—

"Oh, I'm a wanderer, I am,
And they think I am a lamb,
But"—

Seeing Phos. nudge his neighbor H_2O, he shot an angry glance at him. "Umph, you needn't make remarks about me, you'd be in just as bad a fix if they didn't have to keep you caged, yes, caged, in a big glass bottle. Phos.— "What if I am shut up! When I get out I have fun enough to make up for it. They're afraid of me, they are, and so I stir them up by sputtering and burning like a–a–a—"

"You don't seem to scare them like I do," broke in H_2S. "Somehow or other when I'm around, they either go, or else I go. It's queer they don't like me, I've always treated students nicely. Don't you know I believe Prof. has been working some little dodge, innuendos, etc., and so they sort of fight shy of me. Anyhow, you're not in it with me, old Phos; they walk from you, but they run from me."

"That's right, boast all you want to, it's good for little children to quarrel,"—with the most sarcastic of smiles NH_4OH turned to his neighbor. 'There is nothing good in human nature, chemical or physical, years of experience have"—

"O, dry up, you old sceptic, we've enough of your—Psychology, or whatever it is you're throwing at us!"

Voice from below: "Hello! Hello, there!"

Consternation stood on every face.

"Say, hello! can't you help a fellow?"

MnO_2: "Well, where are you, and who are you? I'm used to helping. Third party seems to be my lot in life. Every experiment that comes along, they put me in, simply to make so-and-so join so-and-so. Go-between may be very nice in Japan, but it don't go here. I'm about tired of playing chaperon.

With a muffled groan the voice from below ceased.

For a moment the room was still, when a little piece of litmus paper broke the silence plaintively,—"Poor fellow, I declare he gives me the blues."

"Hear! Hear!" came from various parts of the room. The medley of sounds now became indescribable. "Say, what did you think of the game?" "Did you see that gold bug on ——'s collar?" "You're too green, you are, only the other day McC— said you were—" Now and then disconnected sentences could be caught from the confusion of voices. Sulphur was just rising to the point of order when one–two–three–struck the hour of twelve. With one last word smothered in a yawn, they one by one sank into silence and dropped into the Elysian sleep which seemingly enveloped "the hill!" E. M. B.

ATHLETICS.

The work of the team in practice since the game with the U. of Pa. Reserves has been very encouraging both to the team and its followers. That game was a very practical demonstration of the team's ability to play winning foot ball and resulted in a determination on the part of the players and all those having any connection with the team, to develop it into what it is capable of becoming, i. e. one of the strongest, if not the strongest team that has ever represented the orange and blue.

The practice has been hard, many times consisting of a full game followed by a mile run. The results are denoted by the fact that the men have greater endurance than any Bucknell team for some years.

Every effort of the players has been supplemented by those who have to do with the management of the team. During the week before the game with State, George Megargee and Harvey Smith assisted Coach Young on the field and explained the points of the game to the players in the evening.

On Saturday, Oct. 31, several hundred Lewisburg and Bucknell people journeyed to Williamsport to witness what proved to be a most exciting game of foot ball. It was generally believed that State College had exerted every power to put a winning team in the field, and the game proved them to be far from weak.

State won the toss and took the ball, expecting to gain an advantage as a result of Bucknell's supposed weakness in the kicking department.

Their kick-off was well returned and then began a battle royal, in which Bucknell's superior interference gained them the advantage, ultimately yielding a touch down. No goal was kicked. From this until the call of time the play was near the center of the field.

Bucknell kicked off in the second half, after which State carried the ball to their forty yard line by a series of rushes through center. Here they lost it and Bucknell, after a twenty-five yard run and several fine center plays, scored the second and last touch down of the game. The try for goal was successful.

After this the game was most exciting. State put forth every effort to score and twice came within Bucknell's ten yard line. Here, however, they met with a resistance which could not be overcome and the ball was punted out of danger.

Toward the end of the game State's line weakened very much, allowing two kicks to be blocked and losing the ball. The game ended with the ball in Bucknell's possession on State's ten yard line.

As to the play of the home team, it can be said that every man went in to win and to keep his part of the foot ball machinery in running order. To credit one player with good work is to credit all since team work won the game. It was a fine exhibition of hard, clean foot ball.

The line up was as follows:

P. S. C.	POSITIONS.	BUCKNELL.
Beers	center	Jennings.
Sholl	right guard	Lesher.
Block	right tackle	Cober.
Murray, (J. T. Dunsmore)	left tackle	Rowe.
Mechesney	right end	Gilchrist.
Sellers	quarter back	Nattress.
J. A. Dunsmore	right half-back	Bunnell.
Haryes	full-back	Catterall.

If there has been any question as to the attitude of the town people toward the foot ball team, it has been decided by the concert given by the ladies of the town for the benefit of foot ball and the reception given by Mrs. Walls after the State game.

The Concert was a success throughout and great credit is due the ladies for their efficient help.

On Monday evening, Nov. 2, Mrs. Walls gave a reception in honor of the victory over State. The decorations were profuse and appropriate, there being every evidence that the score was 10—0.

Professors Perrine, Rockwood, Hamblin, Hon. H. M. McClure and Capt. Cober were called on for addresses and responded with remarks bearing upon the past, present, and future of foot ball at Bucknell. The evening was a most enjoyable one and every one felt that many thanks were due Mrs. Walls for her interest in, and kind treatment of the team.

COLLEGE NOTES.

"We came,
We saw,
We conquered—"
Bucknell, 10; State, 0;
Now for Cornell!

Bevan, '99, spent a few days with his parents and at Mt. Carmel a short time ago.

We learn that of the new men Nattress, Grim and McFarlin are excellent base-ball players.

The school of music will give a musicale Friday evening, Nov. 20, in Bucknell Hall. Admision fifteen cents.

The political clubs of Bucknell received invitations to participate in the demonstrations at Williamsport on Oct. 31.

Everett C. Conover, '99, who has been hindered from coming back this term, promises to be here in time for base-ball in the spring.

Dr. and Mrs. Courson have been obliged to delay sailing for Burmah until Nov. 18, owing to uncompleted, necessary preparations.

The Anderson Club recently presented the University with a new and very acceptable yell. Thanks for the originality and generosity of our friends.

During the evening of Oct. 23, the Peddie Club of the University spent an enjoyable evening with Mr. and Mrs. Ivins, corner Third and Market.

The "unsexed New Woman" was discovered by Dr. Hulley to have existed in the 11th century. "Countess Matilda—she's the man that had more influence than any other".

An excellent concert and literary entertainment was given by the ladies of Lewisburg in the Opera House, Tuesday evening, Oct. 27, for the benefit of the Bucknell foot ball team.

Memorials of Bucknell University, issued in honor of the University Semi-Centennial, may be had from the Registrar at 50 cents per copy, bound in buckram. By mail 60 cents.

Several students are regularly attending the various missions near Lewisburg. Pine Grove mission has erected a beautiful chapel within the last year and promises greater development in the future.

A new course consisting of Agricultural Chemistry, much the same as is offered at Cornell University, has been established for qualified students. Prof. Owens will equip a special room for the pursuit of this branch.

The Bucknell band participated in the political demonstration at Williamsport, Oct. 31, and compared favorably with the other bands present.

The Bucknell Bi-Metallic Club in conjunction with the Bi-metallic League of Lewisburg, held a very interesting meeting in the Court House, Friday evening, Oct. 23. Hon. Walter E. Ritter, of Williamsport gave an excellent address on the issues of the campaign. Music was furnished by the Bucknell Band.

The Registrar's office is now equipped with quite a valuable telephone, the instrument being connected with nearly a thousand subscribers in the towns of Shamokin, Mount Carmel, Pottsville, Sunbury, New Berlin, Northumberland, Mifflinburg, and Lewisburg. Milton and Pottsville are soon to be added to the list of the Shamokin Valley Company as it is called.

Class in Rhetoric. Prof. P.—(showing difference between sarcasm, satire, and wit:)

''Sarcasm literally means to tear the flesh from the bones, while satire means to tear the skin from the flesh.''

Mr. Levan in deep thought: "Could we infer from this that wit means the tearing of the hair from the skin?''

The Philadelphia Alumni Club will hold their annual re-union at the Hotel Walton, Monday evening, Dec. 7. The invitation this year will include the wives and lady friends of the members of the club. The officers, J. K. Weaver, M. D., President, and Rev. R. B. McDanel, Secretary, are working enthusiastically to make this re-union the best since the organization of the club.

The University Band organized this year with W. M. Bunnell as leader and LeRoy Hall as manager. Under the efficient supervision of Dr. Aviragnet the Band takes up its work where it left off last year. Several excellent players have been added to take the place of those who left on account of graduation. The band consists of twenty-six members and had several engagements during the campaign season. A much needed thing for its prosperity and advancement is a complete set of new uniforms. We hope it will not be long before our band can cope with others in this respect.

''My, what a difference between the Bucknell and State College boys!'' This is an exclamation frequently heard from the people of Williamsport. ''Of course,'' they said, "the Bucknell boys are making lots of noise, and are making us almost deaf with their yells, but who has a better right to yell than they? We are glad to hear them yell so long as they use decent language, but such language as the State College boys used last year was a disgrace to themselves and to their school. We like to see the boys happy, but we do not like to see them make rowdies of themselves.'' These are only a few of the expressions of approval uttered by some of the best citizens of the Lumber City. Are they not well worth being proud of?

Friday night, Oct. 29, witnessed a large and enthusiastic assembly of students in Theta Alpha Literary Hall. Junior Ritter took the chair and called the meeting to order. Professor McCay stated the business of the meeting some what as follows: ''A week ago last Saturday Lafayette defeated the University of Pennsylvania just through pure grit and enthusiasm.'' (Loud applause.) "What Lafayette did to U. of Pa. we can and will do to Pennsylvania State College, and more.'' At this point Mr. McCay was compelled to stop until order was once more restored. After a few more well selected sentences by the Professor, the discussion was made general and during the remainder of the meeting enthusiasm ran high. Captain Cober spoke in behalf of the team in words which every one knew came from his very heart. Mr. Cober said: "The men are in good condition. They have worked hard and their spirits are high. Give us one more good night's sleep and State College will go under.'' The modest old veteran retired amid overwhelming applause. After the appointment of several committees, the assembly adjourned feeling confident that ere another sun should set State College would be humbled. It is not necessary to say what the result was. In Centre County, great mourning and lamentation, State weeping for her heroes and would not be comforted because they were not. What is one's downfall is another's gain. Lewisburg rolled in glory. Brass bands were only secondary. Every fellow was a whole orchestra in himself. Everything rejoiced, from ''Bob'' Koons' double-barrelled shot-gun to the little cricket down cellar behind the furnace. What adds to it all, no team except U. of Pa. has yet scored on us this season.

A "LOCAL" EXPERIENCE.

La Grippe, Parliamentary Law and foot ball joined forces in furnishing their common victim a night's entertainment more realistic than the ordinary nightmare.

At 10:30 P. M., in accordance with the Bucknell foot ball rules, I threw myself upon my bed, my head throbbing and my bones aching. Soon Morpheus waved his magic wand before my eyes and I was asleep. But sleep did not appear in her accustomed rôle of "sleep, gentle sleep," but, wearing a green riding habit, she came in on a black animal, a vicious "night mare."

Immediately the experiences, sensations and ideas of the day began clamoring for first ride. At length Parliamentary Law and foot ball mounted double and the entertainment began.

The chairman called "play," and, dispensing with the reading of the minutes, the game began. Luck was against us and we arose again and again to a question of privilege only to be thrown back for a loss. We moved to postpone, to adjourn, only to be voted down, while the crowd called for the orders of the day. At length we were pushed ever the line. I had fallen out of bed. The game was called and the meeting adjourned.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

The first examination of the school of music was held October 24.

Miss Edna Russ, a former student, has been visiting Miss Virginia Noyes.

Mrs. Larison and Miss Brown visited at the home of Mrs. F. H. Purdy in Sunbury, October 24.

During the cold nights in October, ice was frozen an eighth of an inch thick; skating permits are in order.

Miss Bertha Watkins, class of '96, who has been very ill, is now improving and intends soon to return to Bucknell and take up her studies with the Sophomore class.

The young ladies greatly enjoyed the Hallowe'en reception given by Mrs. Edwards, Friday evening, October 30.

Miss Armitage recently visited Miss Laura Angle of Strafford, Pa., and while on her visit witnessed the game between U. of Pa. and Lafayette.

The Y. W. C. A. was represented at the state convention at Harrisburg this year by Miss Sharpless and Miss Allen. Very interesting reports were given by them containing excellent suggestions for further work. The interest manifested by each member augurs well for the prosperity of the Association.

ACADEMY NEWS.

Prof. Phillips filled the pulpit at Montgomery, Pa., Sunday, Oct. 25.

A joint Debate has been agreed upon between Adelphia and Hermenia. Let us endeavor to make this new departure successful.

Registrar Gretzinger again presides at his table after a short but pleasant vacation.

Judging from the number of Academy boys at Williamsport, the interest in Athletics is growing.

Through the kindness of Mrs. Edwards we passed a very pleasant evening, Friday, Oct. 30. She is to be congratulated on her skill in making an evening both agreeable and profitable.

Miss Armitage has succeeded in making the Saturday morning exercises very interesting. She has appointed a committee of Academy students who arrange and assign the work.

On Saturday morning, October 24, the Second Form completely outclassed their opponents, the Lewisburg High School, at foot ball, winning by a score of 22–0. Evans, Jr., that tower of strength, was greatly missed at right guard.

We are glad to know that a closer relation is springing up between the Institute and the Academy. Already many are quite intimate and others show a desire to become so. Let brothers and sisters dwell together in friendship and love.

The Academy has many loyal men, if subscriptions to the Mirror are a proof. Yet we have a few "spongers," students who do not consider the paper worth subscribing for, but valuable enough when borrowed from their neighbor. More should subscribe. The more subscribers, the better the paper.

EXCHANGE.

The Muhlenburg, in the play entitled "Miranda," shows she has men of literary ability.

It is interesting to learn from Our Dumb Animals what humane people are doing toward the mitigation of suffering on the part of brute creation.

Our old friend, the Susquehanna Journal, comes to us now as the Susquehanna, enlarged and with a new dress; we notice also that one of the Faculty has been put on as Ed-in-Chief.

We are glad to find amongst our exchanges the College Folio, published by the Allentown College for Women. This journal is thoroughly up to date and appreciates the needs of the school.

The Lafayettee tells us that a board composed of the Senior class edits a new monthly journal, the Touchstone. This seems to be a commendable feature and an advance toward literary culture.

The Temple Magazine is hardly what we might call a College publication, yet we are glad to have it on our table, for it never fails to fairly teem with rich blessings to all interested in Christ and the Church.

In The Madisonensis we learn that the Athletic Association at Colgate University has passed a series of resolutions concerning the means of raising finances to carry on Athletics more successfully. Would it not be well for other colleges to establish a similar financial system?

The faculty of Allegheny College, Meadville, has declared against foot ball playing by the students of that institution and the team organized at the college is now under temporary suspension on account of its failure to obey orders. Two hundred students have signed a petition to the college officials asking that the edict be rescinded.

NOVEMBER 25, 1896.

BRIEF mention is necessary of the Bucknell-Cornell game. We were disappointed; of course we were. We were defeated, badly defeated, and there is no getting around it, squirm as we may. There were causes, we are glad to say. First, we should have had a hand in the choosing of the officials. Second, we should never have broken training after the State game. For these there is no excuse. However, there is no reason for discouragement; defeat rightly received prepares the way for a more glorious, final victory.

THANKSGIVING Day has again rolled around and it is the MIRROR'S privilege to wish you all the fullest enjoyment and blessing of the national home festival. May it be to you a richer holiday than preceding ones. Have the thanksgiving spirit. Draw from the Thanksgivings at home in childhood and clothe the day in a flood of happy memories. Those days were good, inestimably good, but the present ones are better. To-day we are moulders of ideas, builders of our fate. Then, we received a father's love, the spirit of the home, and an acquaintance with the good Father of all. Centuries produced what we received, centuries of the best thought and feeling. One cannot wholly assimilate this wealth of ideas or fully comprehend the Thanksgiving spirit in the height to which it has been developed in the race, but he can feel its power and to some extent grasp the meaning of the day. This is our best wish for you. May its richest blessings attend you.

THE preparations for the intercollegiate debate with Franklin and Marshall are progressing finely. Friday evening, Nov. 6, preliminary debates were held in the literary societies in which twenty-five contestants took part. Of these, eight were chosen for the public preliminaries, which were held in Bucknell Hall, Nov. 13. Though the time for preparation was short, the participants were successful in their efforts in getting up one of the finest debates we have listened to for a considerable time. The attendance was not so large, but it was encouraging, for it was composed exclusively of students and of that class of students who take especial interest in this kind of work. After the debate, the interest was manifested by knots of students gathered here and there, rediscussing the question and emphasizing the strong points of the debaters. Such an audience, though comparatively small, is more conducive to our success in this line of work than a larger crowd of mere curiosity seekers. Of the eight contestants, two were chosen to represent Bucknell in the final debate. We are satisfied with the ability of the two chosen, and know that they will do their best to sustain the honor of the college. Self-sacrifice and hard work on the part of the speakers will bring success to their efforts and glory to Bucknell. The co-orperation of the students, the Literary Societies, and the professorsis assured.

FOOT BALL has attained a prominence worthy of the attention it is receiving in the editorial column. It is asked, is it just to give it so much space, and to bring foot ball with its brutality and others attendant evils into such prominence in college life? The point is well taken, it requires an angwer. The brutality of the game is becoming a thing of the past. The foot ball of today is a science, surpassing that of any other athletic exercise, giving to the player a physical development which no other one game does, and cultivating in him that vigorous, determined spirit so much needed by us all. But this is not sufficient to grant it a place of such importance. The training, however good, of some thirty should not be made detrimental to the physical development of the remainder. The importance of foot ball rests in the fact that it is a bond which unites us all in a common sympathy. It is the one center about which all students can gather and rejoice in Bucknell's prowess, which so helps in the cultivation of a strong unified college spirit. This is no theory, it is fact. Few things are of so much importance as strong college spirit, which makes a man desire honor, not for self, but for the College.

WHEN TIME WAS CALLED.

Well of course you know the date,
When time was called.
Old B. U. had vanquished State,
When time was called.
Got our ten to zip O. K.
Wasn't that a glorious day?
Thought my mind would go astray,
When time was called.

But we did it, so we did,
When time was called;
And I felt just like a kid,
When time was called.
Shoulder-high from off the field,
Carried we the team that sealed
Old State's doom—her blood congealed,
When time was called.

Bucknell's banners floated high,
When time was called.
Everybody gave the cry,
When time was called.
Yah, yah, yoo, Bucknell B. U.;
'Twas the orange and the blue,
And we all were loyal too,
When time was called.

Decked the town in colors bright,
When time was called.
Never went to bed that night,
When time was called.
Tried to stand upon my head,
Can't remember what I said,
Perhaps I seemed a bit illbred,
When time was called.

V. F.

HE FALLS IN LOVE.

His friends all swore that he would, yet he vowed that he would not. They smilingly told him that many fated ones had talked as he, but he assured them that they had never heard any one like him talk. No! he was sure that he would not.

He was a student, and where is the student who does not fall in love? He did not think it necessary to school himself against woman; indeed, he boasted that he could go just so far in his relations with woman as he cared to and then stop, on the safe side. He told himself with a smile of assurance that the boundary of his passion was wholly at his option. But alas! how quickly are the mighty fallen.

Her name was, of course, poetic, yet we will simply call her "she." She came to school a week late, but what a trivial thing for one so bright as she to make up a week. She was pretty to be sure; who in fact ever knew a girl who was not pretty to at least three persons?

As she went out of chapel on the first morning, he saw her, and he had to confess to himself that he wanted to see her again. He wondered whether she would be in any of his classes. As fortune would have it—surely it was not because he had walked rapidly—he was behind her in walking up the hill. Her voice had a sweet rippling of cheerfulness about which he found himself thinking the second time. He usually looked down at the path with a philosophic air as he walked up the hill, but now, strange to say, he was looking at her hair waving so quietly about her neck; he was not in the habit of so closely scrutinizing his sister students, but he was viewing this simply from an anatomical standpoint—so he said. At the class room door a thing happened which he felt sure was going to happen, yet when it came, it seemed unexpected; the girl with whom the new comer had walked up the hill turned and presented him to his "class sister;" he bowed with precision, quite formally, and, entirely unconscious of what he was saying, expressed the greatest pleasure at knowing his class was to be so honored. As he looked up at her from his bow their eyes met; he was sure there was a peculiar kindliness in hers, but he could be so readily mistaken, you know. In class he was repeatedly looking over at his newly acquired "class sister"—he rather liked the word- and was studying every line in her profile; but pshaw! he was only looking upon her as he would upon a—horse; the last word staggered him; his mind refused to be imposed upon by such a rude, lying comparison, but he had to do something to quiet his conscience, which was begining to tell him that the new class sister was occupying his mind almost too fully. He looked at the page of Lysias before him, but confound it! he did not see the ungainly little Greek characters, but a pretty face out-lined, there—"I beg your pardon, Professor, but I don't see the place where he left off reading;" then, for no apparent reason he did a most remarkable thing, a thing he had never been guilty of before—he flunked. That almost made him sick, for there was one he was more anxious to recite well before than the Prof.; wholly ashamed of himself he glanced over to see if he might learn from the side of her face what she thought of his wretched failure; but lo! he need not guess from her profile, for her full face greeted him and the smile she sent him was one of sympathy and encouragement rather than condemnation,—perhaps she half suspected that she was the cause of this failure. Dad! he longed for the chance to flunk again if only he might be thus rewarded. When he went to his room he felt all out of sorts. If the truth be told, he was fighting against the inevitable conclusion that he was begining to experience that state which people call "love," that passion to which he claimed he was invulnerable. Oh well, he could let himself go just as far as he cared to and then step back; this was simply a new fruit and he was allowing himself to enjoy it more than was his wont.

He learns in some way which is the window of her study and now, as he goes by the Seminary at night, he always looks up to see whether there is a light at that window, and then he looks at the ceiling and, seeing two circles of light, wonders which is made by her lamp; then he thinks of the head bending over the book in front of that lamp and oh how he envies that book.

How eager he is for the first "Sem." reception be given; he goes and monopolizes her; he knows while they are off in a corner talking together that he is selfish, yet they enjoy it immensely, so why should they do otherwise? At this reception he asks for the privilege of calling; it is granted as he was sure it would be. Now every week he adds a card to her increasing pack. His friends say to each other, in tones loud enough for him to hear, that they once knew a man who was never going to fall in love; he laughs and tells them that he is not in love, but in his heart he no more believes that than they do.

Time flies rapidly and now comes the season for boating parties on the river. He always arranged it so that some other boat had the chaperone—that excellent institution which nobody wants, yet which every lover must be bored with. She wants to learn to row; he is only too anxious to teach her, for like every man who has ever sailed boats in his mother's wash tub, he thinks he can row like an University stroke. They go far up the river and then drift down. Her hands are upon her knees as she sits facing him, so how could he fail to see that simple little ring upon her finger? He asks to see it, she holds out her hand. He holds her hand rather more solicitously than necessary while helping her to remove the ring, but perhaps he is thinking of a time when he might be putting a ring on her finger rather than taking one off. He asks for the privilege of wearing it a while; she grants it, provided he will loan her his class pin; the exchange is made. As they slowly drift down the river he gazes into her eyes and wonders if ever any man thus basked in the sunlight of her presence before,—of course they have, confound it, and the thought actually makes him feel sick. He asks her to tell about her early life; he hangs upon every word of her narrative and wonders why she does not tell him all. As unconcernedly as possible he says: "I suppose a woman can be in love with half a dozen men at a time," and then, half ashamed of himself, he looks up to await her reply. She is idly lapping up the water with her hand and appears not to have heard him. He wonders if the same things are in her mind as in his; he thinks of the things he would say if he only knew how she would take them.

That night he sits in his room with the lamp turned down and plays with the little ring upon his finger. Oh! could he but be as near to her as this little ring has been for so long a time! He wonders if now she is thinking of this ring—and him.

It is no use trying to deceive himself any longer, he is surely in love; he is filled with an intense love, a selfish love which can not bear to think of the object of his love receiving attention from any one but himself. He stops playing with the ring now, for a happy picture is thrown upon the screen of his imagination; he sees himself a dozen years hence sitting before the busy desk of his study, tired and discouraged; the door of the study opens and in backs a chubby faced youngster pulling along his reluctant mother, whose hesitancy vanquishes as soon as she sees that her husband is not busy, then races with the boy to see which shall be the first to kiss the tired man. But—dad! there goes the town clock—ten—and a page or more of Cicero to be gotten out yet.

There is no need of continuing the story farther, he is in love and every body knows it. Yes, he has fallen in love very nicely, and the only question is, will he fall out as safely as he fell in?

NOLI SPE.

ORATION

DELIVERED AT THE DEDICATION OF THE COLLEGE GIRLS' BUILDING.

Friends and fellow-workers in educational interests:

I come before you to-day with a heart full of gladness and thankfulness and hope. The bright sunshine of this beautiful morning falls upon something which we have long hoped and labored for, toward which our most earnest endeavor has been directed,—this new building for the College women of Bucknell. As I look into your faces I can see that it is a source of gratitude to each one of you also, and that your interests are at one with ours. It denotes one more step in the progress of our beloved University.

A few years ago we began to talk seriously of a College girls' building. We saw the need of it; and as this increased, the stronger grew our determination to do what we could. One by one we put our shoulders to the wheel, as also you and many other good people have done. The work, once well started, advanced quite rapidly. For several years the need had been so apparent that interested people were ready to come forward with their assistance. For a time hesitation and doubt prevailed, but little by little that cloud was dispelled and we saw before us clear and bright the new building as an actual certainty. How glad we were! We foresaw therefrom an increase in the prosperity of the College and an additional field of usefulness.

And so for the past two years this work has been carried on nobly by those who saw its need. These bricks piled one upon another are the loving thoughts and kindly deeds of many an one who is eager that this world may be better, that the future have whatever of good the past had not.

Behold in this structure the effort of many helping hands! In its walls are the labors of the past cemented by the hopes of the future. The building which we see is not mere stone and wood, brick and mortar. Far from it! It is the expression of hopes and aims formed long before the first stone was laid in its foundation, before the first bit of green sod was taken away by the workmen.

It has been built, not by one of wealth to quiet the pangs of conscience, but by the many, with much effort and self denial. For that very reason it means more to us. It has been built for an earnest purpose with the hope that they who dwell within its walls may in turn live for an earnest purpose.

To you, young women, then, we turn, knowing that in you and in your successors lies the future of this work begun for the education of earnest women. They who have built it have done it with the sincere wish to do right and to carry out Nature's plan, believing that woman should be educated. Why did the allwise Creator endow woman with a mental capacity equal to that of man if he did not intend that she should use it? He in his wisdom surely did not bestow on the creatures he formed superfluous capabilities. Each and every power was bestowed for a purpose. This is one reason why we believe in the higher education of woman—because we feel that the Almighty sanctions it.

A second reason is a very practical one. It is because of the help she can give herself, so that, if necessary, she may make her own living, that she may have ready weapons with which to battle with the hardships of life.

A third and last reason is one which we need offer only to those who are greatly opposed to such advancement for women. It is this,—that the Creator has arranged the laws of our physical being so that the mother has an almost unlimited influence over her son, who is very frequently an exact counterpart of herself. Someone has said "No man can rise above his mother," and though of course there are exceptions to this rule, still in general it is quite true.

Let us then, parents, educate our daughters. Let us follow out the intention of the Creator, giving them the power to care for themselves, and making them able and worthy to train their sons into noble and upright men. You know that "as the twig is bent, so the tree's inclined" and it is usually the mother who bends the twig. If she has been trimming and pruning and lopping off a worthless or harmful branch here and there in her own life, so much the better can she trim away the defects in her son, and see that his growth is firm and sound.

Today, then, we desire to welcome you, young women, to this your new College home, trusting that in it your lives may be made happier and better, and that in the ranks of noble, finished womanhood there may be in the future many of the College women of Bucknell.

He has studied well his book,
And he doesn't care to look;
He's just like the babbling brook;
No he's not.

For his book is on his knees
And he's cold enough to freeze;
He's in something of a squeeze.
That's what.

G.

THE AIM OF COLLEGE EDUCATION.

Extracts from the oration delivered before the College Alumni, June 23, 1896, by Prof. M. G. Evans, D. D., of Crozer Theological Seminary.

"It is not the aim of colleges to fit men for professional life, nor for industrial pursuits, nor for technical investigation. These ends are attained by institutions specially equipped. Collegiate education has higher aims than any and all of these. It prepares, not for this calling or that, but for life and all that the term life implies."

"If education be regarded simply as a means of securing employment, it fails to give refinement; if it is gained for the purpose of display, of occupying a teacher's chair, of writing books, it fails to give culture. The student who values education for the sake of what it can give in money or reputation, lacks the scholar's spirit and can never become educated."

"The graduate from any college has the possibility of enjoyment enlarged in proportion to his acquired power to appreciate the loftiest standards of beauty in nature and morality in character."

"The allotted tasks of the recitation room have not their proper educational value, unless they excite the sensibilities. From a knowledge of botany the roadside, once dusty and tiresome, now entrances by its moss and lichen and fern. A limited amount of information about Geology transforms the museum from a mere collection of minerals and fossils into a drawing room where Eozoon, Canadense, Trilobite, and Mastadon recount in simple and impressive language the story of the earth. It is impossible for a person to pass from the recitation room, where he has demonstrated by diagrams on the blackboard the properties of the ellipse, into the observatory where he sees the planets like some mathematician's pencils of light diagraming on the blackness of night the same figures to demonstrate the same properties, without instinctively feeling that he is in the presence of a Person who thinks, a Mathematician infinitely greater than Plato and Kepler."

"Colleges justify their right to exist if they beget a love for books and ability to interpret historical phenomena. He who has acquired a taste for literature that informs and inspires has learned one secret of living nobly. A graduate is fully recompensed for his time, money, and toil, if he has learned to read, that is, learned to recreate in thought and feeling the creations of philosophers, poets, and historians."

"Education is the training of persons that they may become all that they can. Education is complete only when the can and the will coincide, for the lazy and cowardly cry "we cannot," when they mean "we will not." Young men enter college lacking will power rather than intellectual ability; in college they gain all that is worth gaining if they learn that what they determine is more important than what they know; for knowledge is of value to persons only so far as it influences the will, since will determines conduct."

"Men are matured by resistance. Armor plates are tested by the impact of projectiles; conversely, projectiles are tested by the resistance of armor plates. Each reveals to the other its weakness and its strength. So men are tried by antagonists. The one is the measure of the other. Studies are antagonists that make possible the feeling of humilation or the ecstacy of victory. Curricula are designed to disclose to students the conditions of joyous superiority. They are difficult enough to arouse interest, strengthen the will, reveal to the mind its power, and infix faith in the efficacy of patient industry."

"In college we may learn to live, since we may learn the secrets of highest good, the supreme happiness of overcoming difficulties. The campus and the lecture room alike teach that sensations of victory come only by persistent endeavor and vigorous concentration of energy, in short, self-mastery."

"He who in college learned to apply himself assiduously to Greek for two hours, then concentrate attention for the same period on Trigonometry, then relax his energies for a time, and then at a given signal become engrossed in Literature or Chemistry, has found the clew to every labyrinth. This power to fasten thought on any subject at any time is the aim of education; its origin and development depend on faithful and conscientious submission to the requirements of a college curriculum."

"There is another battle the college student must wage; it is the warfare for character urged in the realm of morals. This battle began in days of childhood but it was only the stray shot of the picket line; in college the engagement becomes general, for students are removed from home restraints and form a new society which fairly represents the social conditions of the world. The college boy that resists temptation has verified by fact of life the adage of the ancient wise man, "He that ruleth his spirit is better than he that taketh a city."

ATHLETICS.

The work of the team during the week following the State game was very much hindered by rain and the consequent wet field, but since that there has been no drawback in that line.

The absence of all coaches during the practices before the Bloomsburg game resulted in a standstill, at least, in the team's work. It seems that without constant coaching no team can keep up in its play. The return of Harvey Smith as coach was an event very much desired and the team has profited by his work.

Saturday, Nov. 7, Cornell defeated the home team at Ithaca by a score of 54–0. The result of the game was a disappointment in many respects yet the circumstances were somewhat extenuating. It must be said that the home team did not play the game of which it is capable, also that Cornell played one of the best games she has put up this year. The officials, both chosen by Cornell, gave decisions which would not be allowed anywhere but on their home grounds. When an umpire decides that it is "our ball" or "their ball," it does not sound like the language which would be used by a strictly neutral official.

The teams lined up as follows:

CORNELL.	POSITIONS.	BUCKNELL.
Tracey	left end	Gilchrist,(Riemer).
Taylor	left tackle	Rowe.
Reed	left guard	Hollinshead,(Wilson).
Fennell	center	Jennings,(Wilson).
Hill	right guard	Lesher,(Huntzberger)
Sweetland	right tackle	Cober.
Taussig	right end	Jenkinson.
Bassford	quarter back	Nattress.
Beacham	left half-back	Thomas.
McKeever,(Ripley)	rt. half-back	Bunnell,(Elliot).
Ritchie	full-back	Catterall.

The open date, Nov. 14, was given to the Bloomsburg State Normal Team. The game was played on the home grounds and resulted in a victory for Bucknell, 18–6. The Bloomsburg men were a heavy, stockily built set of fellows and were very well trained.

The game opened with the kick-off by Bloomsburg. Bucknell returned the kick, after which play continued near the center of the field for a short time, when Bucknell by a number of short gains through the line carried the ball to the visitors twenty yard line. Here the home team used the play employed so successfully by Cornell and the remaining twenty yards were covered and a touch-down made. The try for goal was successful. No further scoring was done in the first half. The play was not threatening to either goal, Bucknell, however, had the advantage.

In the second half the home team put more life into their work and soon scored a touch-down. The goal was kicked. After the next kick off Bucknell by good hard playing made a third touch-down which yielded a third goal.

The scoring by Bloomsburg was done after Bucknell had made her eighteen points. The play had been near the center of the field; Bloomsburg punted and the home backs attempted to pick up the rolling ball instead of falling on it, thereby allowing a Bloomsburg player to get it. One rush through tackle yielded the remaining ten yards and the thing was done.

Worthington of Bloomsburg was the star of his team.

The line up was as follows:

BLOOMSBURG.	POSITIONS.	BUCKNELL.
Lewis	left end	Riemer.
Willmore	left guard	Hollinshead.
Butts	center	Jennings.
Laubach	right guard	Lesher(Huntzberger).
Thompson	right tackle	Cober.
Snyder	right end	Jenkinson.
Aldinger	quarter back	Nattress,(Griffith).
Owens,(Worthington)	right half back	Elliot, (Griffith, Bunnell).
Fox	full-back	Catterall.

While the first team was battling with Bloomsburg on the home grounds, the Reserves were playing the Williamsport High School eleven at Athletic Park, Williamsport.

The game resulted in a victory for the Reserves, the score being 4–0. Those who saw the game say that the home team played good ball considering the fact that they had practiced together but once. The field was very muddy and of course anything like long end runs or fast interference was out of the question.

BASKET BALL.

Recently the "Philadelphia Press," announced a meeting of the University of Pennsylvania basket ball candidates in which they elected a manager and captain. The article further stated that it was the intention to begin practice at once and to schedule games with Yale, Brown, Bucknell, State College, Haverford, etc.

Now it is evident that Bucknell must better herself along this line, if she desires to have an at all representative team this season.

Many students and Bucknell sympathizers have sneered at the idea of attempting to compete with other colleges and schools in this particular line of athletics, placing their "reasoning" on the success of last year's team. But it must be remembered, in this case as in all others, that perfection or even "standing" cannot be attained at a jump. Last year Bucknell had her first team on the floor, composed principally of green players, yet we succeeded in defeating one experienced team, and made a good showing in several other games. This season ought to be productive of a far better team, inasmuch as nearly all of her last years players are back with the addition of several experienced new men.

Let every candidate be practicing daily,—those who take no interest in foot ball—and immediately after the close of the foot ball season, we shall organize and begin systematic work in the gymnasium.

D. H. ELLIOT, '98.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Sharpen your skates.

Bucknell 18, Bloomsburg 6.

Cornell, well we did what we could.

On Tuesday evening, Nov. 24. the students and friends of the University were favored with a lecture by Dr. Tupper.

Mr. Harvey is doing successful work as a preacher at Centralia.

The few snow squalls of the last two weeks make us think of sleighing.

We are glad to see the cheerful countenance of Miss Watkins among us once more. Welcome.

McFarland, 1900, accompanied the foot ball team to Ithaca to witness the match with Cornell.

Manager Wilson acted as umpire in the recent game between Lafayette College and the Bloomsburg State Normal School.

Robert Green Slifer, who has been absent on business the greater part of the term, has again taken up his college duties.

Prof. Rockwood, together with Messrs. Lesher and Wilson, attended the Bloomsburg–Lafayette game at Bloomsburg, Nov. 10.

Dr. W. C. Bartol was recently called to the bedside of a departing father. The Mirror extends sympathy to Dr. Bartol in his bereavement.

A number of the Senior Class recently went to Dale's Hill in search of Geological specimens. Mr. Nelson Davis chaperoned the party.

Several students from Susquehanna University witnessed the game of foot ball between Bucknell and the Bloomsburg State Normal School on Nov. 14.

The Chemical and Physical Society met Thursday afternoon, Nov. 12, the subject for consideration being "Tuberculosis." Mr. Nelson Davis treated the subject in an able and instructive manner. The attendance showed that the subject is a popular one.

The class in General Chemistry was thrown into confusion a few days ago by a student rushing in with the news that the Freshman Class were out on a straw ride. All rushed to the windows and behold! a farm wagon was passing by loaded with cabbages piled on straw.

The contest to decide who should represent Bucknell in the coming debate with Franklin and Marshall College was held in Bucknell Hall, Friday evening, Nov. 13. The question was: "Resolved, That verse has exerted more influence on mankind than prose." The affirmative side was upheld by Buckminister, Grim, Meserve, and Hankey; the negative by Collins, Warren, Dutton, and Gilpin. Dutton and Collins were chosen.

Professor (in Chemistry): "Photographs at the present time may indeed be taken very quickly."

Student: "Professor, I knew of a young man taking a snap shot of a streak of lightning when on the platform of the rear car of an express train going at the rate of sixty miles per hour. It is a fact."

In many respects Bucknell stands on a level with the very best colleges in the land, but for some time she has felt the need of a book of good and original college songs. We have sung the songs of other colleges until we are tired of them. At various times many good songs of our own have been printed in pamphlet form, only to be sung at special seasons and then lost or forgotten. The musical talent of Bucknell will to-day compare favorably with that of any college in the land. What we need, want, and are about to have is a College Song Book up to date. The present Senior Class have formed themselves into a committee to arrange and publish such a book. All the old songs which belong exclusively to the University have been resurrected and remodeled where it has been necessary. These will be carefully arranged with the addition of many others of recent date. Drs. Doane, Lowry and Johnson, are at this work. The book will contain about fifty pages or more and will be out April 1, 1897. A large number of subscriptions have already been received. Let everybody who is interested in Bucknell purchase one or more of these excellent song books and sing to the health of his dear Alma Mater. During the Spring term there will be a musical given in which the best features of the book will be presented. Buy a book and sing.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Mabel Wells, who has been ill, is now convalescent.

Miss Josephine Garrett of Ridgeway has been visiting Miss Gertrude Grant.

Professor Martin led the Y. W. C. A. prayer meeting on November 10. He gave a most forceful exposition of the theme "Unity in Christ." Mrs. Larison will lead one of the meetings in December.

The Class of '97 in the School of Music has elected the following officers: President, Mr. Brown Martin; Vice President, Miss Birdie Taggart; Secretary, Miss Eleanor Potter; Treasurer, Miss Frances Bloom.

The first "Program Meeting" of the Y. W. C. A. was held Sunday afternoon, November 15, the subject being "Light." An interesting program was rendered. Two of the most attractive features were a vocal solo by Miss Crawford and a selection rendered by a quartette of College men.

The program of the November meeting of the Lewisburg Alumnæ Club was as follows:

HARRIET BEECHER STOWE MEETING.

Her life - - - - - Mrs. J. R. Loomis.
Review of her writings - Miss Sallie VanGundy.
Reading selection from Old Town Folks, Miss Bessie Bates.
Remarks upon her life and work by different members of the club.
Current Events - - - Mrs. Weber Gerhart.

A very pleasing communication from the Philadelphia Alumnæ Club, was read by our Philadelphia correspondent, Miss Mabel Thomas.

An interesting account of the proceedings of the meeting of the Woman's Federation of Clubs, held in Bradford, Pa., October 1896, was read by our Secretary, Miss Annie Evans.

The social season of the Institute opened with the annual Senior Reception, on Friday evening, November 6, and it certainly augurs well for the social functions of the year. The parlors were beautifully decorated, the class colors, blue and gold, predominating. Two highly appreciated features of the entertainment were a recitation by Miss Margaret Wagner, and a cornet solo by Mr. Weymouth. At nine o'clock the school room doors were opened, displaying in the decorations of the interior the artistic skill of the Class of '97. Mid ivy-twined pillars and luxuriant palms, the guests partook of refreshments. The entertainment was so inspiring that one of the guests actually lapsed into poetry, not altogether classic, 'tis true, nevertheless deserving a place in the annals of the evening.

There was water and peanuts
And salad and cream,
And coffee and kisses,
And olives serene,
And sugar of course,
And fun to be sure,
A screen to fall over,
And thoughts to allure.
And flowers and music,
And chums who must be
The subjects of "swipings"
'Too endless to see.
But pray who did do this—
On earth devise Heaven?
With our kindest regards,

The Bucknell Alumnæ Club of Philadelphia met on Monday, November 2, at the Foulke and Long Institute. We were glad to welcome a larger number of our members than we have had for a long time, among whom were some who had not met with us for nearly two years. A most encouraging feature in the matter of replies to invitations, was the fact that more were sent than ever before. Many times the invitations have not been answered at all, and out of this has grown the fear that some of our Alumnæ have lost their interest in Bucknell. It was indeed cheering, even though a number of regrets were received, to have them in almost every case accompanied by kindly words of greeting, and to observe that there is still in the hearts of many the warmest admiration for their Alma Mater.

After lunch had been served, a special business meeting was held to discuss the joint meeting of the two Philadelphia Clubs, which will be held at the Hotel Walton on the first Monday in December. Four speakers were chosen to represent our club at the joint meeting, and matters bearing on the general subject for discussion on that occasion were talked over.

At the close of the business meeting, the President, Mrs. Spratt, introduced the subject, "Present Politics—How they Look to Me," and asked for a general discussion of the question, inviting all who were present to take part.

Mrs. M. E. R. Cobb began the discussion in her usual interesting way. She said that for her, as for most women, it was difficult to speak of this matter of Politics. Women are not in the habit of formulating their ideas on this subject with a view to giving expression to them. They know when they read what appeals to them and what coincides with their beliefs, but women have had so little occasion to express themselves on Political questions, that when there comes an opportunity to do so their ideas are rather confused. If a woman does speak on such matters, the average man is apt to wonder, like Samuel Johnson, "Not that she does not do it well, but that she does it at all."

Mrs. Cobb did not discuss "Present Politics" from the monetary point of view, nor did she attempt to show the relations of either political party to the future welfare of the nation. In her opinion the question of the relations between classes and masses is of greater national importance, and one of the leading causes for the spirit of unrest among our people to-day. It is not easy for those who are kept in poverty and ignorance by force of circumstances, and who are often as ambitious for better things as others who have been more favored, to be content with their lot and to restrain their feelings of bitterness against the higher classes. If it is hard for a man, naturally able and filled with a desire to better his position,to work at some degrading task, it is certainly harder for a woman. Many men who have begun in the humblest way have attained positions of trust and influence, and we honor them more because of the fact that they began at the lowest round. A man knows that he can work his way up and win for his efforts the respect and sympathy of his fellowmen. With a woman it is different. Mrs. Cobb wanted each one of us to ask ourselves as to whether we are apt to give due honor to the woman who has been employed at some manual labor, as a domestic servant perhaps, and who has through persistence shown herself qualified for some higher walk of life, until gradually she has reached that position. We women have been putting the responsibility of solving the "class" problem on the men, but perhaps our share in the task is not the least.

Mrs. Bailey, Mrs. Yerkes, Mrs. Musselman, Mrs. O'Harra and others followed Mrs. Cobb, dealing with "Present Politics" from their respective points of view.

It seems to be a difficult matter to get up an animated debate in our club. We are too harmonious to make things interesting. Whether the fact that we were all on the right side of the Political question was due to the fact that we have wise husbands and fathers to instruct us, or whether it was because we were Bucknell women, and were therefore wise ourselves, we cannot tell. Such harmony, however, is not conducive to debate, and made our meeting less interesting, perhaps, than it otherwise would have been. It is nevertheless a joy to meet and renew old friendships, and if we help to keep up interest in Bucknell our purpose will have been accomplished.

ACADEMY NEWS.

Mr. Evans visited for a few days his daughter and his sons, Tommy an Willie.

Mrs. Davis and daughter recently made the Davis Bros. happy by paying them a visit.

Prof. Fisher shows his interest in Bucknell by attending the games on the campus. He was with us Saturday, November 14.

Prof. Phillips stimulated the boys in their Y. M. C. A. work in one of the meetings of this month. Let the teachers be leaders oftener.

Do students of the Academy prepare their lessons as well as College men? It would benefit many of us to attend the recitation of a College class. What keeps so many of us from our books?

The members of the Fourth Form intend to play "She Stoops to Conquer." It is believed that this new feature will be a success, for some of the boys are experienced actors, and Miss Armitage has patience enough to perfect the rest. The place for the public exhibition is not definitely determined.

The victory of the Reserves at Williamsport proved that Prof. Kaufman is an excellent foot ball coach. This Williamsport team defeated us last year, because we lacked team work. We were in good physical condition but not coached. Therefore our victory is due to good coaching as well as to the faithfulness of the boys in practice.

Before the appearance of this issue the first "At Home" of the Institute will have been given. These "At Homes," begun last year, seem to be excellent for satisfying the desires and wishes of Bucknell students. It is said that in former years the Seminary doors were open only to a few; the boys most in need of the social culture given by receptions and parties were never invited. Let the Academy come to the front and enjoy such excellent training.

PERSONALS.

'55. Hon. Alfred Hayes, an ex-Representative from this county, and wife lately returned from a several day's trip to New York and Philadelphia.

'60. Wm. L. Nesbit was recently elected State Representative from Northumberland County.

'61. Dr. Jos. K. Weaver, President of the Bucknell Alumni Association, has been making every effort to have the next meeting of the Alumni the largest ever held.

'63. Rev. W. W. Case has accepted a call to Rutherford, N. J.

'63, Inst. Mrs. Margaret Barber, formerly Miss Margaret Marr of Lewisburg, lately founded a large school at Aniston, Alabama, for the higher education of the negro in that section of the country. This project was heavily endowed by her husband, Phineas M. Barber, '55, at his death in 1891.

Ex-'66. Mr. G. Barron Miller will be one of the thirty-two electors from Pennsylvania, who will meet between now and March 4, to elect Hon. William McKinley President of the United States.

'67. Hon. T. J. Philips, of Atglen, Chester County, was re-elected as a member of the legislature from his county.

'69. Rev. J. S. Wrightnour is the new pastor of the Oil City Baptist Church.

'69. Under the direction of Mr. A. Scott Sheller, the choir of the Presbyterian Church of Lewisburg shows marked development. This choir is composed largely of College talent.

'74. Hon. Ward R. Bliss, of Delaware Co., Pa., was recently elected to the State Legislature.

Ex-'74. Mr. W. Scott Chappell, a noted musician of Williamsport, is leader of the popular Lettan & Chappell orchestra, of that city.

'75. Mr. John F. Duncan recently returned from an extended trip through the West.

'80. Rev. H. M. Wolf, Jr., has entered on the fifth year of his pastorate at Waterford, Conn.

'81. The Factoryville Baptist Church, upon the closing week of Rev. M. J. Watkins' seventh year, held their annual roll call meeting which proved successful both financially and spiritually. Rev. Watkins may be said to begin his eighth year with the church in good condition notwithstanding the hard times. This speaks well for him as a pastor, as he is the successor of our esteemed President, Dr. Harris, who held the pastorate at that place for about twenty years.

'84. George P. Miller has been elected for the second time Para Secretario de la Corte de Pruebas, Taas County, New Mexico.

'87. J. W. A. Young, Ph.D., an instructor in the University of Chicago, was married on Oct. 28, at Fort Madison, Iowa, to Miss Dora Louise Shafer.

'87. Prof. J. S. VanGundy of the Norristown High School, recently visited the Philadelphia High School to see the method of instruction employed there. Prof. VanGundy is an old Lewisburg boy and a graduate of Bucknell.

DECEMBER 10, 1896.

THIS is the last issue of the MIRROR before the holidays. We therefore wish you success in your examinations, a pleasant vacation, a Merry Christmas and Happy New Year. May you return fresh and invigorated, determined to accomplish great things for yourself and for the good of your fellow men.

THE foot ball season has closed. Out of eight games played, all of them hard ones, Bucknell has lost none except to the large Universities of Pennsylvania and Cornell. This is encouraging. The team have worked well and we are proud of them as representing so large a part of our athletics.

WE were recently honored by a lecture from Judge McClure on Commercial Paper. We understand that this is but the first of a series that the Judge is to deliver. The course will be most heartily received. In addition to the valuable knowledge gained, which every student should possess, an occassional lecture like the recent one adds spice to college life. In nearly all the leading colleges a large share of the instruction is given by lectures. While this method may be overdone and lead to a superficial education, it is also true that the bone-down, hard-work, every-day-recitation method may likewise be overdone and lead to listlessness and lack of energy. For this reason we welcome this series by the Judge and wish that other valuable courses might follow.

THE College Glee Club has been reorganized and from the material both in quality and quantity and from the character of the leader it bids fair to attain no moderate amount of success. For the last year or two Bucknell has been without a glee club. It is with joy we welcome it as one of the great powers for good in our beloved institution. It will add to our college life a richer tone and help in arousing a stronger college spirit among the students. In most colleges the glee club assumes an importance unsurpassed by any other branch of work during the winter term. Why should it not be so at Bucknell? The start is made, the musicians are at work; let us see to it that they have the support of the student body and that we give them the encouragement they need.

THE election of officers for the Athletic Association occurs on Saturday, December 12. Those to be elected are president, vice president, secretary, treasurer, manager of base ball, manager of basket ball, an executive board, and a finance committee. Membership in the association is open to all students upon payment of one dollar to the secretary, Mr. John Lesher. It is hoped that as many as possible will identify themselves with the association, as it is desired that it should be as nearly representative of the whole school as possible. A little advice to the unexperienced upon the eve of election may not be out of place. First, do not under any circumstances allow another to pay your way into the association; it will turn out to be a bribe for your vote or will put you under some obligation. Second, do not compromise, but vote for whomsoever you believe to be the best candidate, regardless of party, clique, fraternity, club, or personal regard. Third, if you are unacquainted with the candidates and have not knowledge from which to make a fair judgment, do not vote. In other words, do not blindly do as your friend tells you. The MIRROR believes that individual manhood and the force of public opinion in the school will prevent a repetition of the corruption of last year's election.

WE welcome the return of the "At Homes." To Mrs. Larison, the college girls, and all who have been foremost in this movement, the young men of the school owe their most sincere thanks. While many attend to meet congenial spirits and for the pleasures of society, a great majority of the students are not able to find this pleasure and are liable to regard the social side of life with contempt. Especially for these, we understand, have the ladies instituted the "At Homes." These present a feature of college life which can hardly receive due praise. The cultivation of the social spirit, the training of one's self in social customs, the attainment of a kindly-disposed, dignified cultured mind are essentials to every man. Of ministers, doctors, lawyers, teachers, and all others in high positions social functions are required. We hope no student will fail to avail himself of the opportunities now offered. The presence of the college professors, the Seminary teachers, and many town people lends without question a high character to these social gatherings. The attendance at the last one showed that the students are not indifferent to social requirements, and the presence of many awkward, restless ones indicates that they are fully awake to their need. Many a lady also is in need of social training. It requires some art to set everybody at ease and bring out their better parts. Let all attend and receive mutual benefit.

A CALL TO SERVICE.

Work there is that must be done
  In this busy world to-day,
Before the setting of the sun
  Bears the fleeting time away.

Many nations in commotion
  Far across the dark blue sea,
Wretched men and fainting women
  Cry for aid from you and me.

Come with me beyond the waters
  To a land as rich as gold,
Where the summer never fadeth,
  And the winter ne'er grows cold.

Brightly beam the rays of heaven,
  Giving to the earth their best;
But beneath them men are living
  Void of love and peace and rest.

Listen to their cries of anguish
  As they pass you on their way,
Up to yonder temple going,
  There to kneel in vain to pray.

See that proud young mother coming
  With her babe upon her arm;
How she loves her only darling,
  How she shields her child from harm.

But within that bosom swelling
  Is a heart with grief o'erflown,
That for months hath borne its sorrow,
  Drooping, bleeding, and alone.

From that shrine she now returneth,
  Where of late we heard her pray,
And the heathen god has told her
  She must cast her child away.

Can she bear to leave her darling?
  Can that heart forget its claims
To a child whose very life blood
  Courses through a mother's veins?

Slow her step and sad her face is,
  As with child upon her breast,
She descendeth to the valley
  At a heathen god's behest.

She must yield her richest treasure
  To appease a god of stone;
She must sacrifice her infant,
  To the water's sullen moan.

Hideous monsters, rushing, roaring,
  Dash the water into spray;
Rush upon the beach in madness,
  Ever eager for their prey.

"Either hopes of heaven will vanish,"
Was the cruel god's reply,
"And the fiends of hell will haunt you,
Or your infant child must die."

In the face of such a verdict
What was there for her to do?
Was it not the way to heaven?
T'was the only way she knew.

So in agony and anguish,
From her breast she tears her child,
And with one sad look to heaven,
Tosses him to monsters wild.

From the scene she quickly hurries,
Finding not the peace she sought;
Had she known the love of Jesus,
T'would not all have been for naught.

Thus in lands across the waters
Souls are passing to their graves
With no voice of love to warn them,
And no helping hand to save.

Have you found the love of Jesus?
Is He all in all to you?
Tell it then among the heathen,
That is what He bids you do.

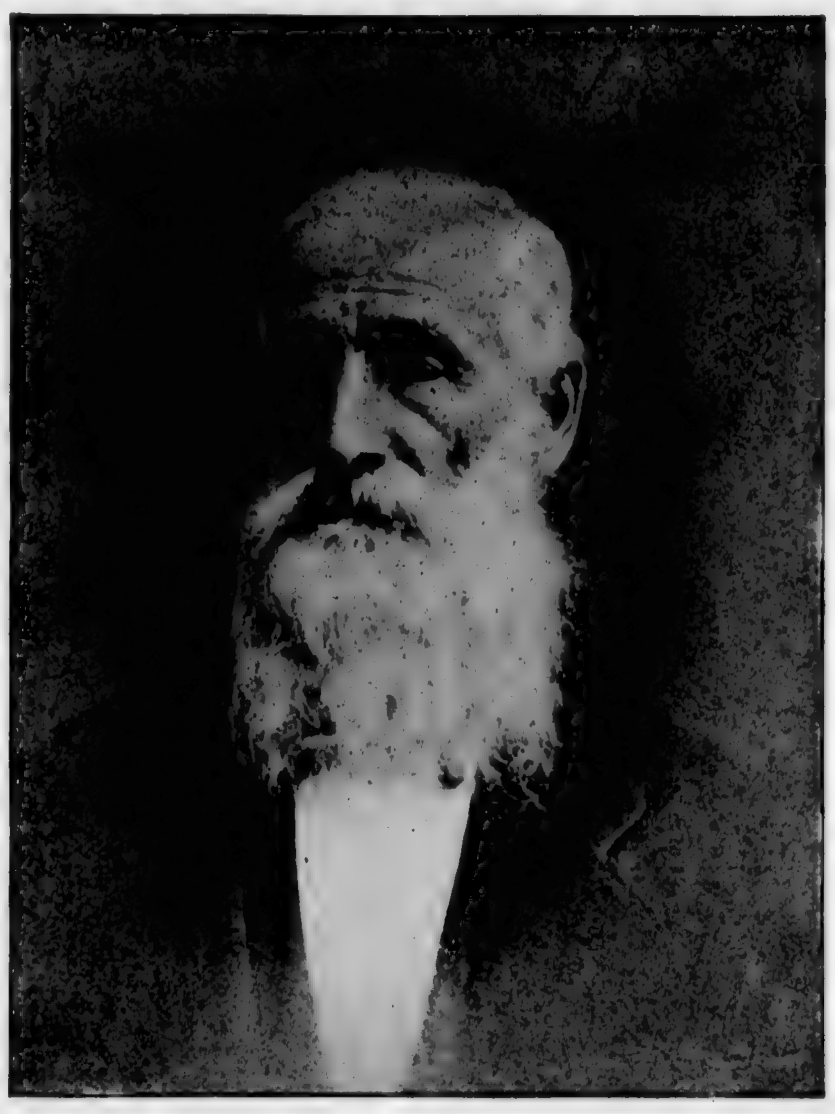
THE ORIGINAL MANUSCRIPT CONCERNING THE FOUNDING OF THE UNIVERSITY AT LEWISBURG BY ONE OF THE FOUNDERS.

[Now printed entire for the first time.]

LEWISBURG, April 10, 1878.

"I will as briefly and truthfully as possible write down what I know of the first resolves and acts towards founding a Baptist College or School in Central Pennsylvania. It may be possible, after so many years have passed, that I may be slightly inaccurate as to dates, but the facts are so fixed in my mind that I cannot forget and will be correct. In the year 1836 I was residing on a farm in Turbot township above the town of Milton and was a member of the Milton Baptist Church. About this time a Rev. Mr. Parker, highly educated and of a very pleasing address, visited Milton (he, Parker, was from the State of Vermont), preached for us several times and we loved him in every respect, and concluded he would be the right man to help us start a Baptist School, under a Baptist College Charter, at Milton. Myself, my father, James Moore, Joseph Moore, Joseph Meixell, Henry Fink, Benjamin Bear, and others were consulted. We went so far as to be certain we could raise fifty thousand dollars towards the object, and if it had not been for a crisis in the money affairs of our country, the effort would have been put forth to found a Baptist College at Milton. But as money collections and payments were out of the question, we stopped short in our efforts before the incipient undertaking was made public, and by the time the country revived under the Tariff Act of 1842, I had sold my property in Turbot and bought in Buffalo Valley, near to Lewisburg, where I determined (God favoring the enterprise) the School should be founded.

From my first settlement near to Lewisburg in the year 1839 I never doubted but Lewisburg was the location. This made me anxious and often caused me to raise my thoughts to God in prayer that we might have a Baptist Church raised up in Lewisburg, knowing it would be idle to talk of starting a Baptist College in a town where there was no church or society of our order. This state of affairs made me careful and watchful who the man or men should be that put forth the effort for establishing a Church, yet when Rev. William Grant came, about the middle of November, 1843, from Saratoga county, New York, first to Milton, expecting to hold a protracted meeting there, and upon their refusal, Rev. C. A. Hewitt brought him to me, it appeared to me after a long and careful interview with him, Grant, that God had sent him. He was what we term a self-made man, using good strong, common sense language, had the Scripture in a measure by heart, and prayed as if he expected God to hear and answer him, was rather slow in his speech, in person rather tall, light complexion, prominent forehead over-shadowed by heavy eye brows, an excellent full blue eye. I believe he was truly a man of God sent to Lewisburg to give us a Baptist Church. Very soon after our organization as a Church, I took Bro. Wm. F. Ludwig, M. D., aside and told him we must now as soon as possible build a good respectable meeting house, and in the interim we could talk over establishing a Baptist College. I shall never forget the effect this suggestion appeared to have on him. After sitting perfectly quiet for a time filled with the idea, he looked up and said: 'Do you think it possible for us to get an Institution of that kind here?' I answered, 'I don't think there is any doubt about it, unless they make a move at Philadelphia or Pittsburgh before we get ready; we must get ready, however, as soon as possible and build our meeting house.' I then further added, 'I have had this matter pressing upon my mind ever since my schoolboy days under the Rev. D. Kirkpatrick, D.D. for more than fifteen years, we must now work hard and keep the matter to ourselves, until we are prepared to move openly and publicly, and now what do you say to trusting Bro. Samuel Wolfe to our full confidence in this matter. Ludwig replied that there would be no risk in trusting Wolfe, and we three had many a talk over the matter before anybody else was consulted. The next was James Moore, Sr., my father, then followed brother Joseph Meixell, Eujenio Kincaid, D. D., Rev. J. E. Bradley, Professor Stephen M. Taylor, and L. B. Christ was sometimes of our number; we would not only meet and talk over this matter, but pray over it and promise God and one another to be faithful until death.



JAMES MOORE, JR.

These quiet meetings and consultations went on until our meeting house was well under way. We got into the basement Sept. 28, 1845, and the house was completed and dedicated on November 15, 1846, Rev. George B. Ide, D. D. and Bro. Wm. Shadrack, D. D., preaching the dedication sermons. But some time before this (before we got into the basement) Ludwig, Wolfe, and myself, supplied money and got Bro. E. Kincaid to go to Hamilton, New York, and bring Prof. Stephen W. Taylor, a man in every way fitted to guide us About this time we, Wolfe Ludwig and myself, bought the grounds for our enterprise. The deed from Foresman, son-in-law of Jno. Brown, was made to Wolfe, Ludwig & Moore, on November 8th, 1846.

I recollect the impression it made upon old Prof. Taylor, when we showed him that wooded hill with the water view of the Susquehanna. The first he said was: 'Have you really secured this location?' We told him the deed was executed and on record. 'Well,' said he, 'it is beautiful, just the place, what can't this be made by improvement?' Very soon after arriving from Hamilton he went to work on a Charter. Up to this time we had thought only of a College Charter, and Taylor said to us, why not at once get a University Charter, it will cost no more? This was at once agreed to, and he wrote out a Charter that was passed by the Legislature and signed by the Governor, that was not altered in a word. Up to this time and for sometime longer there were no funds and the three very often had to put their hands into their pockets and supply.

But in all of our movements God appeared to favor us, gave us health, energy, and a oneness of mind to work.

Bro. E. Kincaid having returned from Burmah to Lewisburg, his old home, was at once taken into our confidence and council, and he was of great service to us; it was he that suggested that Professor Taylor would be just the man to aid us in our lifelong enterprise that we had commenced. When the Charter was written out, the self-made committee of three furnished Professor Taylor with the means to go to Harrisburg and remain there until he could bring the executed Charter back to Lewisburg with him. This he was enabled to do. He was one of God's noble men. Next we wanted a first class man in every respect for General Financial Agent, and our minds at once rested upon Wm. Shadrack, D. D., at the time pastor of a large wealthy church in Philadelphia. The two, Wolfe and Ludwig, urged me to write to Bro. Shadrack asking him to resign his pastorate and take the General Agency of our University, going to work at once to raise one hundred thousand dollars in valid subscriptions. He did as urged and was the efficient means in the hands of God of securing the first one hundred thousand dollars and making a favorable impression all over our great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and likewise over New Jersey. Bro. Shadrack, in talking to me about his accepting that Agency as he did, said it was one of the strangest things that had happened to him in all his life. He said: 'When I received your letter I only laughed at it, to think of leaving my comfortable and responsible place here in a great city with a good salary and take that hard place with a less salary, and since it was so uncertain about raising so large an amount, I came to the conclusion I could not do it. Yet for days and nights I could neither work, eat, or sleep without that subject being uppermost. God was in it of course.' About this time, when we had secured the Charter and Bro. Shadrack as General Financial Agent, we had a meeting when our hearts appeared to overflow with thankfulness and prayer to God for his goodness in directing us, and we importuned him to still guide us in the future in our life work that we had voluntarily entered upon, and we further pledged ourselves to one another. Up to this time and after, our Pastor Rev. J. E. Bradley, (a good worker and adviser) worked with us well and pleasantly. About this time we asked our friends in Philadelphia to publish a meeting to take place soon in some central point of the City, and the friends from Lewisburg would be present to explain all they had done and their plans for the future. This meeting was advertised to take place in the Lecture Room of the First Baptist Church, Rev. George B. Ides. Many of the leading ministers and brethren were present. The friends of the University from Lewisburg were Prof. Taylor; E. Kincaid, J. E. Bradley, Wm. Shadrack, D. D., and myself.

WILLIAM H. LUDWIG, M. D.

We had made up our minds to be good natured, knowing they would say hard things of us and about us for not taking them into our confidence and council before we fixed the location and secured the Charter, &c. They called us a set of green horns away up in the interior, without experience, and predicted failure and disgrace. We from Lewisburg had each something to say in reply, Professor Taylor making the longest speech. He had experience and was abundantly able to reply. It is sufficient to say that every objection they raised was more than answered. They owned we had secured a good common sense Charter and a better one than would have been gotten up, if they had done the work, and that we had already secured some first-class men in Pennsylvania and New York as friends to work for it, and that it would only be fair now that we should have a fair trial without opposition from them; that we would not disgrace the Denomination with failure for we had bound ourselves in our Charter to raise the one hundred thousand dollars, before we would begin or commit anybody, and if we succeeded in securing the amount named, it was to be invested in good cheap, substantial property. The Charter did not permit the Trustees to encumber the property with judgment or mortgage, so we would be starting and building on a sure and safe foundation. Some of the best business men of Philadelphia at once, at this first meeting, said we had acted wisely and that we must have their influence and aid.

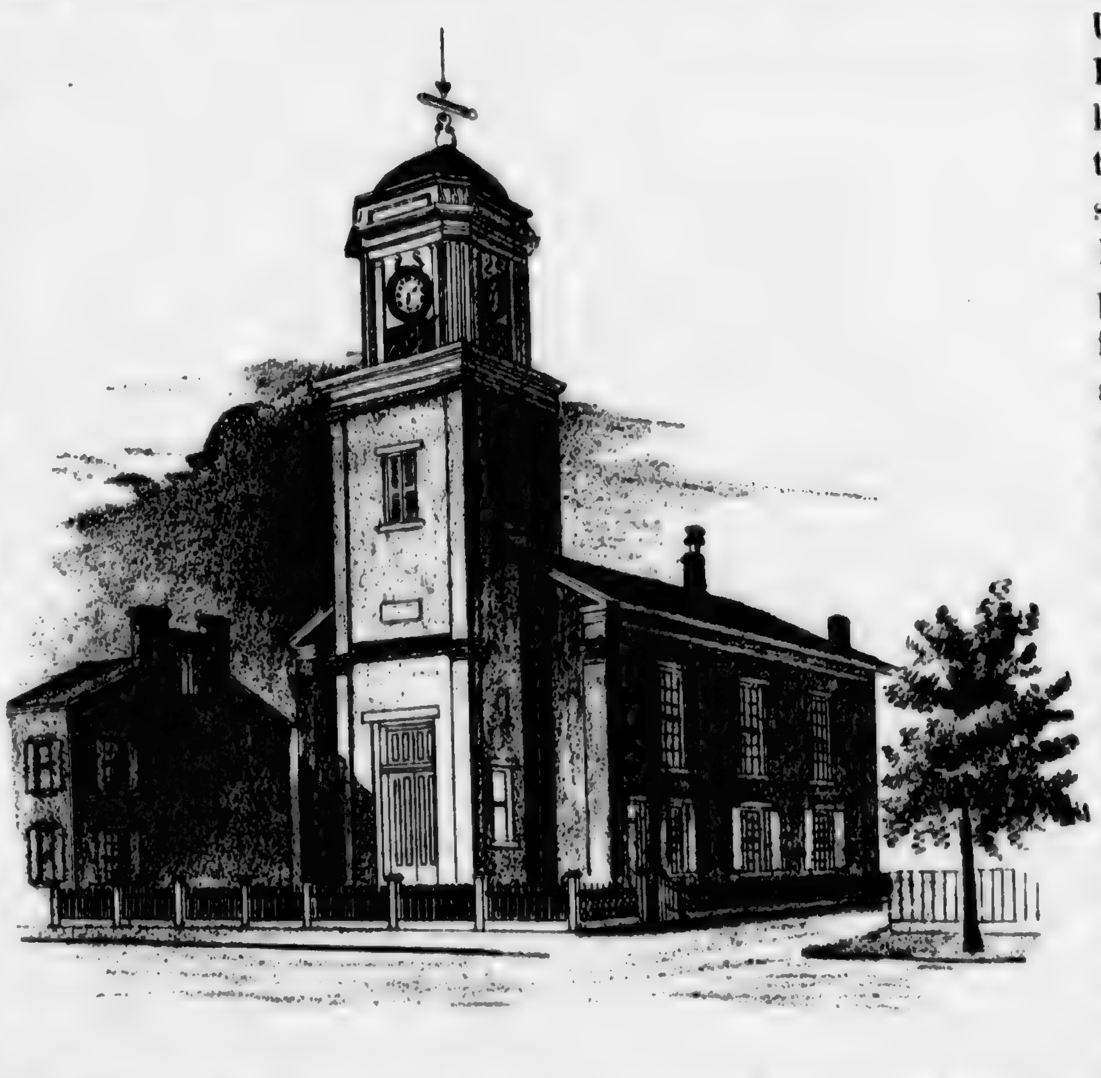
Our firm conciliatory course made us friends, and this first Philadelphia meeting was a success in every respect. The appeal was made strongly to them to take hold and help build a University that would be a credit to our Denomination and the world, where we could educate our sons and daughters and feel safe in doing so. From this time the Boards began to work under the Charter, and the General Agent and his assistants worked hard to secure the required subscription of $100,000. Prof. S. W. Taylor and his assistants soon started a preparatory high school in the basement of the Baptist meeting house. From some cause there appeared to spring up a bad feeling about this time between Rev. J. E. Bradley and Prof. S. W. Taylor. It increased as we went along and gave us a great deal of trouble. Bradley had to resign and go away, and Prof. Taylor's resignation followed. Permitting Prof. Taylor to resign was the first big mistake the Board of Trustees made.



THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH IN LEWISBURG, IN THE BASEMENT OF WHICH THE FIRST SESSIONS OF THE COLLEGE WERE HELD.

I have thus noted down a number of events connected with the first movements of founding the University at Lewisburg. By referring to the Charter or one of the early Catalogues, it will be seen my name stands second on the list of the incorporation, my father, James Moore, being first. I remember in one of our early Board meetings (Trustee meetings), we were working on the early or almost first records, and it was asked by some member, I don't remember who it was, 'To whom shall the credit be given of first suggesting the founding of a University at Lewisburg?' I know I was entitled to it and several of the Board were apprised of the fact, but from some cause did not speak. After waiting a short time, I said: 'Give the honor to my father, James Moore,' and my recollection is that it was so put down. I think my father was not present at that Board meeting or if he was he did not catch the sentence; he was hard of hearing which was much against him in acting with the Trustees in their meetings. He was always ready and willing to do his full share of work or give to any and all benevolent objects as God prospered him, and from the first was a true and lasting friend to the University in all its interests up to his decease. But still I don't know but I did wrong in giving him the honor that belonged to myself. I know I was the first person who thought of founding a Baptist College at Lewisburg.

I have said in another place that Professor Taylor was the one that proposed the word University for College, and I further know I worked and labored for its advancement to the best of my ability, from the first incipient movements until I left Lewisburg and Union county with my family for Missouri in the Spring of 1858. I had met with heavy pecuniary losses by the breaking up of the railroads, one in Western New York and the other in Central Ohio. My losses in the two roads were about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. With the pittance I had left I thought it would be better for me to go West and encourage my six sons to become farmers. After a dozen years or more in working up the School, or rather watching it come up, helping to complete the buildings, helping to vote down by more than a two thirds vote the removal of the University from Lewisburg to Crozer, Delaware county, I felt sure the University could live and grow on to maturity without my active aid. But I had resolved,God giving me health and strength and the means to travel, I would retain my place as a Trustee and attend the annual Board meetings. But I had not gotten fairly settled in the West before the question of slavery precipitated our beloved country into a terrible war, and I could not during that time return to our Board meetings and I so informed the Secretary of the Board. But still the Board saw fit to fill the place made vacant by my absence. When the intelligence reached me I felt a pang pass through me that I can never describe,my thoughts coming back to Lewisburg and all its interests, especially the Baptist Church and all the University interests, and I have always in all places prayed that God would watch over and prosper them. It will be recollected that this promise was made to God,and to one another when we were struggling with our big load in starting the enterprise. I think when I heard of my place in the Board being filled something of this kind passed through my mind: 'They ought not to have done it, they certainly know I could not control the events of this terrible war and during its continuance attend the Board meetings.' But still I felt I belonged to it and never could be separated from it or its friends. I will suggest here, I fear the members of the Board of Trustees do not pray for each other as often or as fervently as they ought. If the twenty Trustees had their hearts full of God's love and power for our noble University, it would advance in strength and beauty much faster; let us pray for this and labor for it. I was out of the Board from 1861 until 1877 when the Board saw fit to re-elect me. I wish now to help work up all the interests connected with the University, especially the increasing of the Endowment Fund. I feel that God has greatly blessed the noble beginning the friends and patrons have made towards fully establishing our University and making it a lasting blessing to our Church and the world. What is thirty years, or fifty years,or even one hundred, when used in building up Institutions of learning?

We have been engaged in this good work some thirty years only,and cannot we say 'what has God wrought' and take fresh courage and give thanks? Yes, thanks to God for he has given us the victory already. I did not intend to say so much when I commenced this sketch of earlier and later events connected with the resolves and doings of friends connected with the University.

But it is said out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh, and I would say here as I close this short, disconnected narative it has been out of a full and warm heart that I have put down the facts so full of import to

JAMES MOORE."

NOTE.—The narrative of James Moore, Jr., is a valuable contribution to the history of Bucknell University. It explains fully why the University is located at Lewisburg and not elsewhere. It is a beautiful illustration of what the persistent energy of one man may accomplish.

The writer of this note spent an evening in the company of Mr. Moore a short time before his death. He then received from him an account of the founding of the college, almost in the words of the narrative. On being questioned he said that he believed that he was an instrument in the hands of the Lord in founding the University. His energy is seen in this, that he had purchased the farm on which the college is located before he had consulted with any one except his Lewisburg friends, and before Professor Taylor came to Lewisburg to look the ground over. When the Professor stood on the summit of the hill he remarked, "This is an ideal location for an Institution of learning.'' Mr. Moore informed him that it had been purchased for this purpose. The Professor then asked him if he had considered the time and money required to found a college. Mr. Moore in reply said he and his friends had consecrated their lives to the effort.

The narrative also explains how the title "University" rather than "College" came to be applied to the Institution. As a contribution to the history of the University, the narrative is of great value. GEO. G. GROFF.

HE FALLS OUT OF LOVE.

"Curse it all, what a confounded fool I've been!" This was strong language, it verged upon profanity, yet the man who uttered these words felt he was justified in thus expressing himself; he was our friend who had lately fallen in love so beautifully, and now he had fallen out. Just how it all happened is not to be known, for who can ever tell how such quarrels happen? We think there was an element of groundless jealousy in the cause; and, if we were not afraid of giving offence, we would suggest that he had sucked the orange dry and had thrown the pulp away. But we have interrupted him, why not listen to him a while as he sits alone in his solitary study and talks to himself?

"I wonder if now she is thinking of the same things I am—of course not, she's thinking of a new dress or a reception which she will attend to cut a dash. She loved me, I know she did; I could read it between the very lines of the letters she sent me during vacation; I wish she had in some way told me though, yet I am glad I never told her in words of my love, but of course she knew all about it. What foolish things we said and did! Now perhaps she is thinking of these and laughing at me.

Yes, I did fall in love; but dog on it! I couldn't help it. No! that's not so, I could help it; it was like all alluring evil, I knew I would be sorry if I tried it, in fact, candid men who had fallen into the pit warned me, but like all other mortals I waived their evidence, and must try it for myself; yes I tasted it, and it was sweet, very sweet at the beginning, but now—Oh how bitter! I now believe that misery and gloom predominate in the world, happiness is only a chance acquaintance. I sometimes try to wish that our love had never been, but somehow I can't.

One evening lately when walking past a fine mansion, I heard a man swearing at his wife and children, because his dinner was late; now this man when in school, as I am now, was as mild in disposition as any one could wish, indeed, he was far more gentle than myself, so what might I become if I should marry? No! I can not afford to fasten any woman with the fetters of a family, then abuse her to relieve my pent up feeling just as I would by swearing at an inoffensive dog.

But say I had married, our connubial skyrocket would have shot up with dazzling brightness and all our friends would have said, 'Ah! how glorious, how happy!' But soon it would have reached its height and returned—a black and ugly stick. We would have found an entirely new relation existing between us and then—ah then! Oh yes, but as you say, I would have her 'for better or for worse,' that's a mighty cute clause isn't it? Well there may be great virtue in keeping your mouth shut after driving a bad bargain, but it is much better not to make any bargain at all. By dad! that's logic. Ha! ha! I am becoming pleased with myself.

I know there isn't going to be any loss of life or even sleep over this, but I would like to know what she will do. I wish I were sure it made her cry, but even tho she should, she would go out with another fellow just to show me that she doesn't care; well, I don't care either, but I am not going to take out any other girl to show how I triumph over my feelings. Oh no! I am a burnt child.

Ha! ha! that's a funny picture. I can imagine a time in the future when I see a care-worn woman pushing at a wash board, while half a dozen dirty children hang around her skirt, for they are afraid to go into the house while their drunken father is there. But come to think about it, I don't know as this is so pleasing after all.

Confound it! I feel as tho I had lost something valuable, yet I feel a great deal freer. I suppose I am better off, but am I going to be happy and satisfied? Time alone will tell, but I am more than sure that I have had enough of love."

We, too, are sure the young man has had enough of love, but whether he is dealing justly with himself we can not say, for we have never been, and hope we never shall be in either of his trying positions. NOLI SPE.

ATHLETICS.

The game with Dickinson at Sunbury, Saturday, Nov. 21, was very interesting inasmuch as it afforded Bucknell almost unlimited opportunity to display her ability as a ground gainer. This opportunity was the result of penalties imposed upon her, aggregating something more than the length of the field.

The Dickinson team played a good defensive game but were not strong on the offensive.

The only scoring done was the result of a fine run by Nattress, who, aided by good interference, passed the greater part of the Dickinson team and scored a touch-down. The try for goal was successful.

The second half was not many minutes old when a dispute arose over slugging indulged in by both teams and it unfortunately terminated in the withdrawal of the teams from the field. The score stood as in the first half, 6–0 in favor of Bucknell.

The teams lined up as follows:

DICKINSON.	POSITIONS.	BUCKNELL.
Craver	right end	Jenkinson.
Ford	right tackle	Cober.
Taylor	right guard	Lesher.
Troxel	center	Jennings.
Houston	quarter back	Nattress.
Hockenberry	right half-back	Bunnell.
Devall	left half-back	Thomas.
Heckman	full-back	Catterall.

Touch-down, Nattress; Goal, Catterall; Umpire, Hancock, U. of Pa; Referee, Godcharles, Lafayette; Linesman, Chamberlain, Lafayette.

The last game of the season, that with Franklin and Marshall at Lancaster, on Thanksgiving Day, resulted in a tie, neither team being able to score. While the result may not be all that might have been desired yet it is better than any Bucknell team has ever done at Lancaster. The F. & M. team put up a snappy game and once succeeded in bringing the ball dangerously near to Bucknell's goal line. When time was called in the first half Bucknell had the ball on F. & M's five yard line, and twice during the game after having advanced the ball many yards the home team lost it at a critical moment and were unable to score.

The teams lined up as follows:

F. & M.	POSITIONS.	BUCKNELL.
Greenwalt	right end	Jenkinson.
Bertolet	right tackle	Cober.
Hight	right guard	Lesher.
Ginter	center	Jennings.
Schneider	left end	Riemer.
Locher	quarter back	Nattress.
Hosterman	right half-back	Bunnell.
Cessua	full-back	Catterall.

The Williamsport High School sustained a second defeat by the Reserves on Thanksgiving Day. The game was very close the score being, Reserves 10, High School 8. The close score however does not tell the story of the game since both touch-downs of the High School were made possible by the fumbles of the Reserves. The game was won in the last minute of play by a ten yard rush for a touch-down and a most difficult goal by Senn.

With the close of the foot ball season comes basket ball and it is desirable that Bucknell should develop a team worthy of representing her among other colleges. Manager Wilson of the foot ball team has received a communication from the U. of Pa. basket ball managment desiring to shedule a game with Bucknell. As the game is becoming more general in other colleges it is necessary for Bucknell to keep in line.

At a meeting of the players on last year's team Elliot was re-elected Captain and a request was immediately made that all candidates begin pratice at once.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Basket ball.

Bucknell—0, F. & M.—0.

Christmas is coming—so are the examinations.

The foot ball teams recently had their pictures taken.

Mr. Wiltbank preached at Pine Grove, Sunday, December 6.

A number of students went home to eat Thanksgiving turkey.

Dr. Tupper, of Philadelphia, lectured to the students of the University December, 8. His sudject was "The Shadow of Castle Garden."

E. C. Kunkle has accepted a call to Elemsport Baptist Church.

Dr. Harris was present at the recent dedication of the Baptist Church at Muncy, Pa.

Dr. Harris attended the funeral of the Rev. Miles of White Deer Valley a few days ago.

The Misses Watkins, Woodard, and White have been initiated into the Pi Beta Phi fraternity.

Coach Smith has returned to the University of Pennsylvania to continue his studies in the Medical department.

Professor Rockwood witnessed the game between Bucknell and Franklin and Marshall on Thanksgiving Day.

Much honor is due Captain Cober for the masterly way in which he led our foot ball team to victory during the past season.

Several students ate Thanksgiving dinner with friends at Northumberland. It is said that the turkey was not the greatest attraction.

Elliot, '98, has been re-elected captain of the basket ball team for this season. Great interest is being manifested in the game and there is an abundance of good material. The prospects are bright for a winning team.

Rev. B. B. Ware, '96, was married, Dec. 9, to Miss Emma C. Weber. Mr. Ware has recently been ordained to the ministry and has accepted a call to the Greenwich Baptist Church. We wish him much joy.

The College Girls' Glee Club has been reorganized for its second season, with the Misses Hartley and Goddard as directors, Miss Hanna, Business Manager and Miss Allen, Assistant Business Manager. The Club will give its first concert on Saturday, December 19, at Williamsport, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. of that city.

The first basket ball game of the season was played in the Gymnasium, Tuesday, Nov. 24. The contending teams represented the College Girls and the Institute. The game was exciting throughout and much enthusiasm was shown by the supporters of the two teams. The first half was very close but in the second half the College Girls experienced no difficulty in distancing their rivals and the game resulted in a decided victory for them. Score 20–11.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

The members of the Pi Phi Sorority recently spent a social afternoon at the home of Miss Elizabeth Bates.

Mrs. Edwards very delightfully entertained several young ladies from the Institute on Thanksgiving Day.

Professor and Mrs. Martin and Dr. and Mrs. Brown, of Mullica Hill, N. J., were entertained at the Institute on Friday, November 27.

The young ladies of the Beta Delta Pi Sorority enjoyed a very pleasant evening at the Sigma Alpha Epsilon Chapter house, Friday, November 20.

Miss Armitage spent Thanksgiving vacation at home in Elmira, N. Y; Miss Bell visited Miss Sarah Lillibridge at Olyphant, and Miss Miller visited friends at Shamokin.

Mrs. Watrous, the widow of the former pastor of the Baptist Church of Lewisburg, whose talented daughter, Mrs. Dora E. W. Spratt, is well known in literary circles, took tea at the Institute, Monday evening, November 30.

Every meeting of the missionary study class convinces the members anew of their good fortune in having secured as leader Miss Sallie VanGundy, whose readiness of wit and long experience as a teacher enable her to present the lessons in a most entertaining and forceful manner.

Mrs. Larison delivered an address on the "Higher Education of Women" at Mifflinburg, Tuesday evening, December 1. She also spoke in behalf of the women now attending Bucknell Institute and College at the joint meeting of the Alumni and Alumnæ clubs of Philadelphia, held at the Hotel Walton, December 7.

On Monday afternoon, November 23, the first "At Home" of the year was held in the Institute parlors. Like all former occasions of the same kind it was greatly enjoyed by all, and more than one expressed a wish that these popular social events should not be like angel's visits, few and far between. Over three hundred guests shared the genial hospitality of Mrs. Larison and the college girls who assisted her in making the occasion a pleasant one. A great many of the town people and several Professors of the University were present besides many students from both College and Academy.

ACADEMY NEWS.

Mr. R. B. Hadley, Ex-'98, paid the Academy a visit on Thanksgiving Day.

Mr. M. L. Anthony cheered for Bucknell at Lancaster, November 26. He expects to be among us again during the Spring Term.

Some of the teachers and many students spent their Thanksgiving vacation away from the school. The majority departed Wednesday afternoon and nearly all were ready for work Monday morning. Since vacation the boys have worked with more vim, thus repaying the Authorities for their kind consideration.

G. J. Dickinson, in company with the three Bowers, recently spent a day on a geological expedition. The result of their labors is some hundred pounds of hard stone.

The Joint Debate was won with a very small margin by Adelphia. Hermenia felt that the question was not a suitable one for Academy students. The speakers were nothing but phonographs, spouting the opinions of some college professors. There was no original thought by the debaters.

Our singing at the evening chapel seems to be injurious to the song service in Bucknell Hall. Too few of us attend the morning services, too many fail to sing. Why not use the Hymn books which are provided for our benefit? That we can sing is shown every evening.

Every member of the Academy who has not already personally expressed his sympathy, wishes to make known his sorrow at the recent defeat of the Institute in a game of basket ball with the College Girls. The beautiful and graceful bodies of girls of tender years were not able to withstand the strength and endurance of young women, over whose heads have passed more summers, especially in basket ball. Our hopes are for your success next year.

PERSONALS.

On Friday, Dec. 20, 1896, the funeral of Rev. J. G. Miles took place from the First Baptist Church of White Deer, Pa. Rev. Miles was the pioneer Baptist minister of the West Branch Valley. He was one of the committee of five appointed by the Northumberland Association in 1845, which reported on Aug. 14, that "A high school for males, another for females, a College, and also a Theological Institute" should be established in Central Pennsylvania, and which in the following year, 1846, obtained a charter for the "University at Lewisburg."

In 1857 the Theological Institute was discontinued in favor of Crozer Seminary, at Chester. This is another instance where, it seems, that death alone brings to our knowledge a life simple and obscure, yet truly great and fruitful.

'87. Rev. Miles O. Noll, pastor of the First Reformed Church of Carlisle, is a candidate for the position of Chaplain of the next House of Representatives.

'88. Rev. W. H. Clipman, of Harrisburg, a graduate of the following year, is a candidate for the same position in the State Senate.

'89. Prof. Joseph M. Wolfe, lately of State College, was married November 21, 1896, to Miss Georgia Thomas, at the bride's home in Amherst, Mass.

'91. Born—To the Rev. and Mrs. A. Lincoln Moore, at Hampton Junction, N. J., September 28, a daughter, Marian Wolverton Moore.

'92, Inst. Miss Katherine Baker has registered as a student of law under the preceptorship of her father, J. Thompson Baker, Ex-'69. "Miss Baker is the first lady in Union County or Central Pennsylvania to take up the study of law."

'94. On November 19, 1896, at the bride's home in Lewisburg, occured the wedding of Mr. Howard P. Gundy and Miss Annie Fisher.

'95. Mr. Frank W. Jackson is teaching at Chester, Pa.

JANUARY 11, 1897.

THE Holidays have passed. They have passed like a dream, a fairy dream; like the rich days of happy childhood. The adieus and well wishes of friends are yet fresh in our minds. We have met again as schoolfellows and not without pleasure is the meeting. The work of another term is before us and we feel strong to plunge manfully into it. That for which we came to the halls of learning appeals to us most strongly, the attainment of a higher standard of character. The "cathedral minded" man, broad and grand and holy, correct in all parts, is the ideal character artist; the intensive, energetic, far reaching mind is the true scholar's pride. Yet withal, men's tastes and ideals differ. not so much in point of right and wrong. as in different provinces of the right. The greatest need is that men live up to the ideals they possess, and develop each individual structure with its own peculiar beauty. May you, fellow student, strive to attain to your highest ideal of life and make golden these fleeting years of preparation for a wider field and a broader work. The MIRROR wishes all the highest success and the truest happiness for the New Year.

GYMNASIUM drills which the students are required to attend will be held during the term. An improvement in the gymnasium will make these more pleasant. Instead of the gloomy oil lamps or no lights at all during the early winter evenings, there is now to be a splendid illumination from the dynamo in the laboratory. Students should make calculations to take this very important branch of work. Physical exercise is necessary; mental education is not complete without the physical.

THE intercollegiate debate with Franklin and Marshall occurs soon and but little time remains for preparation. The societies will hold sessions for the discussion of the questions and for the coaching and drilling of our representatives. In these meetings we hope for the coöperation of all society men. A little encouragement to the speakers, a little labor on the part of all, and a pull together will result in final victory. The supremacy of well chosen material, of good, clear logic, of choice speech, and manly address, is the greatest of victories for Bucknell.

DURING the coming term there is no small amount of work to be done in the college organizations. Basket ball has taken the place of foot ball and games are being arranged with some of the leading schools in the country; the Glee Club is preparing for an Easter trip; the literary societies are getting ready for the intercollegiate debate with Franklin and Marshall; the various publication boards are especially busy. There is need for the labor of every man in college in some of these, or other, lines of work. If not for the organization, if not for his own development, then for the glory of Bucknell should everyone assert himself and put forth his best efforts. The responsibility for failure and poor work rests on all. Bucknell looks to every man to do his duty.

None are more anxious for the progress of the Mirror than the editors, yet they are restrained continually by financial considerations. The personals and exchanges are at times almost completely cut out because of other important matter which takes the space the manager prudently does not see fit to increase. If the paper is to progress as it should it must have a larger support from the student body. In many leading colleges the paper is sent to every student and he is charged for it. Such is not done at Bucknell, probably never will be done, but that does not relieve every loyal student, who can possibly do it, from taking the college paper.

The improvements which have been going on in the library are very gratifying. The new cataloguing case and the furnishings for the ladies' room are among many other long wished for improvements. The Mirror would suggest another for which the outlay would be small but the benefits large. A place simular to that for the magazines should be prepared for the university, college, and high school papers. At present they are dumped in a pile upon the end of one of the tables and a second load is not deposited until the first has been put on file. In this way the papers are often put in the library a month late. Were there a suitable place for them, we are sure the manager of the Mirror would see to having the papers promptly placed in the library, so they could be used by all.

THE SPIRIT OF THE'ROSE.

(A Legend.)

'Twas in the days when all was'new—
Fresh-made the earth and sky—
The first of every kind had sprung
From the will of God on High.

Upon a verdant, grassy slope,
In graceful, soft repose,
There bloomed a tender bud of red,
A bending, blushing Rose.

The Rose breathed up a fragrant prayer—
A fragrant prayer to Heaven,
And with her sweetness thanked her Lord
For the new Life He had given.

Then God looked down upon the Rose
That bloomed so blithely there;
He smiled upon her lovingly
And blessed her gentle prayer.

The warm Sun circled round each day.
The Rose's petals spread.
The South-wind crept caressingly
To kiss her nodding head,

And combed and smoothed the silken grass
That clung around her feet;
And everything paid court to her,
And Life, O Life was sweet!

As Time went on the warming Sun
A narrowed circle drew,
And on the drooping, wrinkled Rose
The heartless North-wind blew.

Then as the snow beat in her face
She felt Death's cruel hand,
And bowing low her head cried: "Lord,
Can this be Thy command?

The Life Thou gavest me is sweet,
And O I love it so!
But if it is Thy Will, I go,
Yes, Lord, I go—I go."

Again God looked upon the Rose
That died so bravely there;
He thought Him of her beauty and
Her gentle, fragrant prayer.

The pity that surpasseth all
Welled in His loving breast;
He whispered low: "Come Daughter I
Will show Thee where to rest."

He took the Spirit of the Rose
Up in His strong right hand,
And carried her across the Sea
Unto another Land,

To where there lay a beauteous form
Fresh-moulded from the clay,
A new, strange creature to the earth,
A Maid, as fair as day.

And as He breathed the Breath of Life
Into the maiden's form,
He placed the Rose within her cheeks,
That were so soft and warm.

And ever since, thro all the years,
In cheeks of maidens fair
The spirits of the roses red
Have found their Heaven there.

THE FORGOTTEN TRUNK.

(Translated from the German of Helene Stokl.)

" 'Merry Christmas' Annie and Henry!" The girl, clad in her warm traveling suit kissed both children. "Good-bye, good-bye Miss Edith!" "Merry Christmas!" "Merry Christmas!"

The coachman cracked his whip, the bells on the horses jingled merrily, and away went Edith in the clear, bright, winter morning. Joy beamed from every feature of her fresh, young face.

* * * * *

In the coach to which the conductor directed the young governess, for such was our girl who had made her debût in this vocation but six months before, there was no one except a lady who was evidently sleeping. It was inconceivable to Edith how any one could think of sleep on Christmas Day. She at least did not, that was certain, but with clear eyes looked out upon the landscape glistening in all the beauty of its wintry adornment.

The train now stopped. Edith found herself in the metropolis, in which she was compelled to spend two hours before she could resume the journey to her native city. What a holiday appearance the streets presented! For a long time the girl walked up and down with no especial purpose, then entered one of the gay crowded toyshops. However carefully she had been compelled, when here before, to balance her debit and credit accounts, now she scarcely regarded the price, selecting the most beautiful express wagon, drawn by two splendid black horses. It was too large to be stored away in her traveling case, so there was no alternative but to carry it in her hand. Of course, together with her bag and muff, this was somewhat inconvenient, but who would mind such a trifle as that on the "Holy Evening!"

Her feet fairly danced over the snow as she thought of the face of little Paul, so sweetly surprised at the sight of the wagon. Presently she glanced at the town clock. It was high time to seek the South End station, from which she was to continue her journey. The girl hastened on, but it was not long before she became uncertain as to what street she should take. She remained standing for a moment, looking in vain for some official to relieve her uncertainty, then observed a man near her, who was also in traveling costume and carrying a satchel. Assuredly he likewise wanted to catch some train. Edith took courage and asked him timidly, "Can you tell me whether this is the way to the South End station?"

"It is, certainly," he answered courteously. "I am also going there, and if you have no objections and will allow me, we can make it out together." She hesitated, confused. How often had her mother impressed upon her never to pay attention to any one, especially to a strange young man, who might chance to accost her on the street. But she had spoken to him first—

"May I carry something for you?" asked the stranger in a friendly tone. With confidence Edith handed him the express wagon.

"You are surely going home," he continued, after they had proceeded for some time in silence. Edith wished to reply, but the words died on her lips. She stopped, alarmed, while her rosy cheeks became deathly pale.

"May I ask what troubles you?" queried her companion, anxiously.

"My trunk," she stammered, "I have forgotten my trunk!"

"Forgotten it? Where have you forgotten it?"

"At the West End station," she murmured with a sigh. Then more appealingly, "Oh what shall I do?" while she looked at the stranger in a helpless sort of way.

"Do you wish to take the next train?" She simply nodded her head in assent. He looked at his watch. "We have twenty minutes yet before we start," he said. Bright tears filled her eyes. "Then it is too late! I can't leave the trunk behind, and if I miss the train I shall not reach home to-night." Her voice became stifled with sobs. But the young man had already hailed a cabman and was helping Edith into the vehicle.

"To the West End station; quick, I say! If you reach there in eight minutes you shall receive double pay." The driver applied his whip, and the cab fairly flew along. Presently Edith looked at her companion with a troubled expression. "What if you should miss the train on my account?" "That would be no great misfortune," he replied, but I hope we shall make it out all right, yet—just give me your check.'' The cab stopped. "You remain here. I shall be back directly,'' he added. A few minutes passed, then he returned, followed by a baggageman panting under the trunk, which he had been forced to carry in such haste.

"Now just as fast as possible to the South End station!'' called the young man. They reached it safely and dashed upon the platform, just as the bell was ringing for the third time. The door was closed, and the puffing, screeching train was set in motion.

"I call that in 'the eleventh hour,' '' cried the young man. They looked at each other, and broke into a contented laugh. Edith immediately became serious again.

"How can I thank you?'' she said with emotion.

"What would you have done if we had returned too late?'' he asked in response.

"I would have been compelled to spend the night at the railroad station. Oh, I can't bear to think of it!''

*   *   *   *   *

It was growing dark. Edith left her seat and looked out of a window on the opposite side of the car. She could, however, discern nothing more in the gathering gloom. A prolonged whistle from the engine sounded shrilly upon the evening air. Laden with bag and baggage, Edith then took her position at the entrance, while the light of the station now gleamed forth in the darkness. Then the door was opened, and there stood her brothers and sisters, foremost among them little Paul. With a hasty farewell she passed her traveling companion and with one bound reached the ground.

"Has 'oo bringed anyfing wif 'oo?'' asked chubby little Paul, as his sister lifted him in triumph.

"Of course, my darling,'' was the reply, with a swift glance toward Emma, who had hidden the express wagon under her wrap. In a few minutes they were at home, and with a joyful cry Edith flew to the arms of her parents.

*   *   *   *   *

It was half an hour later. The family gifts had been distributed and the first storm of delight began to subside, when Edith announced: "Now I shall give my presents! Carl will you not bring my trunk in for me?''

"Your trunk!'' he replied amazed, "Why, you haven't brought any trunk with you.''

"No trunk!'' exclaimed the girl, pale with fright.

Was it conceivable, was it within the power of man, that she had forgotten her trunk for the second time on this one day!

"Well, that is not such a great misfortune,'' said her mother in a comforting tone. "I suppose you still have the check.'' The check, if only she did have it. A heavy weight fell upon her heart, and in a low voice she blushingly related to her parents her experience with the trunk during the day in Dresden. Scarcely had she ended her confession when there came a sudden knock, and on opening the door, a young man in traveling outfit appeared, followed by a dray-man carrying Edith's trunk upon his shoulder.

"I beg your pardon, if I disturb you,'' said the newcomer, in whom Edith immediately recognized her companion of the day, and "help in time of need.''

"Don't mention it,'' responded her father. "But I am quite at a loss,'' continued he, "to know how we are to thank you for the trouble you have taken, now for the second time, for a thoughtless child.''

"This was very little inconvenience,'' laughingly answered the stranger. "I am extremely glad to see the trunk, with its certainly interesting contents, once more in the possession of its owner, and I wish you all a 'Merry Christmas.' ''

He spoke politely, and was about to withdraw, but at this a protest arose from every one. "You are surely not inclined to retire from our thanks so quickly,'' said the father "is it not possible for you to afford us the pleasure of your company for a few hours?''

"You would give us great happiness,'' interposed the mother in a cordial manner, "if you would spend the evening with us.'' "I fear, that as a stranger I may interfere with such family festivities.'' "You will soon see whether my children allow themselves to be so easily distrubed in their Christmas pleasures,'' replied the mother laughing.

And indeed, when an hour later the young man sat at the great family table and looked upon the contented faces with which it was surrounded, it was difficult for him to feel like a stranger in this joyful circle.

At the close of the meal, a Christmas story was demanded from the father. "If I did not fear trying your patience,"—said he hesitatingly; but such was the interest manifested in the faces of those about him that he began without farther delay.

"It was Christmas night twenty-five years ago. I was at that time a young physician scarcely known. Seated alone in my apartments I was gazing at the brightly lighted house opposite, when my bell was hastily rung. I opened the door. There stood a fellow panting breathlessly, who besought me to come with him as quickly as possible to a neighboring hotel, where a strange lady was lying in an unconscious condition and could not be revived. I followed the messenger. In a poorly furnished room there lay a slender young woman with closed eyes, deathly pale, yet with noble and refined features. A maid belonging to the establishment was waiting upon her, and beside her on the bed was a fair haired, three-year-old boy, crying piteously and calling his mother the sweetest names. I lifted the little fellow and set him on the floor. My efforts in restoring the mother to consciousness were soon rewarded. She breathed heavily, then opened her eyes. After having taken some refreshment, for hunger was doubtless the cause of her faintness, my patient quickly recovered strength to tell me her story, sobbing during the recital.

The child again climbed up beside her and whispered something in her ear which seemed to weigh upon his heart.

"What does the boy wish?" I asked presently. She hesitated.

"The Christ child shall come, the Christ child shall not stay away long," cried the child aloud. The mother laughed softly, pointing to a tree ornamented with a few candles and some nuts and apples. "But will the Christ child bring nothing else?" queried I, looking at the scantily decorated tree.

"No, nothing else," lamented the little fellow in a resigned tone. "I would like very much to have had a wooden horse ——."

A good thought suddenly came to me. I sprang down the steps and hastened across the street into one of the brilliantly lighted toy shops. I purchased a wooden horse and whatever else came to hand. The joy with which the little fellow received me and the unexpected gifts was well worth seeing.

A few days later both mother and child left the city. I have heard nothing from them since."

The father became silent.

"You have not quite finished your story." It was the young man, speaking in a deep voice trembling with emotion. All eyes were turned toward the stranger with a look of surprise.

"Allow me to continue it," persisted he. "The mother took the money offered her by the doctor, with a trembling hand, regarding it merely as a loan, and reached home safely. As soon as possible she wrote to the man to whom she was so deeply indebted, but her letter was returned as a "dead" missive. Since that time no Christmas evening has passed on which she has not done some good deed in your name."

"So she is living and well?" asked the father with uncertain voice.

"She still lives, and has never ceased to bless you."

"And what has become of the child?" continued the father softly.

"The child became the man who now stands before you, to thank you for the kindness you once showed his mother." The stranger bowed his head, his face expressive of deep emotion, and before the father could prevent it the young man had drawn the hand of the former to his lips and kissed it.

* * * * *

Some years after the events just related the young man chose the city in which Edith's father lived for his permanent residence. A cordial friendship had been formed between the two families, and a most affectionate one between Alfred (for such was the stranger's name) and Edith, who, when they went upon their wedding journey, three years before, bestowed the tenderest attention upon the old leather trunk, which first of all had caused their acquaintance.

MAUD E. HANNA.

IN MEXICO.

The city of Mexico was decked in gala-day attire. The streets like those of London were a panoramic epitome of cosmopolitan variation. The two potent forces of Mexican civilization, the church and the gambling den, were alive with people in their finest garments. This means sometimes more and sometimes less. Here is a Londoner with eyeglasses, there a Yankee trying to keep cool and dry; here a haughty Spaniard with his gaudy pantaloons and broad sombrero, there a native Mexican stark naked but for a mere girdle arrangement. To complete the turmoil, in loudest and most convincing tones came the cries of the "hot-tomalig" man.

After lunching we proceeded at once to witness the tauricide, the occasion for this unusual stir and bustle. We paid the fee necessary to obtain a seat in the shade. Above and around us, dark with dirt and made muddy by perspiration, was the jabbering mass of natives. And we, belonging to the shekeled aristocracy, were surrounded by the pride and glory of Spanish blood. The maidens, deep brunettes, with color heightened by expectancy, looked like rosebuds contrasted with their attendants, the dark hidalgo and the inevitable duenna.

The natives leaned far forward impatient for the combat. The Spaniards, unwilling to show anything so vulgar as interest, chatted unconcernedly with their fair companions, and we, getting used to the situation, kept tight rein on a pardonable curiosity.

The time had come.

The fanfaronade was still living in its echoes when about two dozen, some on horse, others on foot, entered the arena, made deep salutations, and as quickly retired.

The dramatis personae of the first act consisted of a bull and eight footmen. The aim seems to be to direct the bull's onset toward the flaming cloth, and, dexterously dodging with the body, to insert a lance held in the other hand into the thick muscles of the bull's shoulders. These lances are not fatal. The point is only three or four inches long but covered with a smarting, painful Mexican drug. The more weapons inserted into this infuriated target the higher the score and the greater the applause—from the natives I noticed, for the Spaniards pay no attention to the first act.

The conversation near me had become animated. "Did you notice he wore a red rose like hers?" said the older woman. "They must have come to some agreement."

"Oh of course she would," was the reply. "She loves him passionately and his immense wealth would compensate for his deficient lineage."

"They quarreled so long the reconciliation will be violent. She will soon wear a bridal veil and the padre at San Marco will do the grand."

Another flourish of trumpets announces the second act.

"See how excited she is getting," continued the older; "he must be going to fight among the horsemen."

And my attention was turned to a lithe little maiden in the lowest tier. Dark hair, cheeks over which a touch of crimson came and went with each passing emotion, and eyes whose warm glances were messages of far-away sunny Spain.

The bull, with three lances bristling in his shoulders at that time, rushed madly across the sandy floor. The rider with his slender sword must boldly meet the attack. He rises in his stirrups and thrusts between the wide-branched horns. The horse and rider are overthrown. A terrific applause rang from the barbarians—they always applaud the bull. But their joy had exploded prematurely, for the boys dragged off the animal, dead. It had been pierced to the heart, the fatal approach to which is through a narrow opening between the shoulders. Had the slender blade swerved sideways by a half inch, it would have slid harmlessly along the monstrous flanks.

The valiant torreador is carried away, badly crushed by the collision.

Another victim more ferocious than the first is led into the arena. As he enters, two lances are stuck in his neck. He tosses his noble head and with terrible speed makes for the second redblanketed horseman. He is skillfully eluded. He turns again and is again mocked. In blind fury he springs over the first enclosure, about five feet, and is now directly beneath the first tier. The maiden, who had previously attracted my attention, beaming with excitement, disengages a little bunch of red roses and deftly drops them over one of the animal's horns. It is soon driven back and, stung with more lances, it must continue the deathly combat. It bellows with pain.

During this short and rather unusual episode, the hero of the previous encounter, freshly equipped but pale from loss of blood, has taken the privilege always accorded wounded torreadors of re-entering the lists.

He wears proudly, in spite of pain, the red rose, now more prominent than before. The bull plunges toward him, but fails. It refuses to be diverted by the red blankets of the attendants and pursues with increasing ferocity. The battle waxes hotter and fiercer. The torreador is put on the defense again and again. The monster assumes the role of avenger. The arena becomes deadly quiet at each infuriated attack, and then rings with applause at each artful escape.

The wounded man seems to realize his decreasing nerve and spurs his horse for a mutual attack. There is a terrific onset. Again he rises for the thrust. The Spaniards burst into applause; but it suddenly ceases. The horse misses its foothold in a place uneven and wet with blood from the previous death; the blade glances into the muscles of the flank. The youth is borne down. The bull is hurriedly dispatched by the footmen, but too late. Its rose-decked horn by a curious fatality had passed through the rider's breast.

“Mausalva,” dead easy! “Mausalva !” rang out from the natives. The sight was sickening and before the barbaric plaudits had ended we were away from the scene.

The morning's El Capital contained a full account of the event and alluded to the unpleasant incident of the torreador's gallant death, and in another item, apparently unconnected, was a notice that the beautiful Mariposa Blanca had taken the nun's veil at the convent near San Marco.

ATHLETICS.

The annual election of the Athletic Association was held Saturday, December 12. It resulted as follows: Pres. of the Association, B. F. Thomas; Vice Pres., George M. Davis; Sec., H. R. Kress; Treas., Joe Hazen; Foot Ball Manager, C. D. Koch; Base Ball Manager, J. V. Lesher; Basket Ball Manager, Albert R. Garner; Manager of General Athletics, B. Trimmer; Members of Finance Committee, Joe Hazen, J. H. Bogert, F. W. McFarlain, H. R. Kress and W. C. Gretzinger; Members of the Executive Board, B. F. Thomas, Judge McClure, Prof. Rockwood, Dr. Hulley, Dr. Gerhart.

Saturday, December 5, the foot ball teams, both first and second, repaired to Ginter's Photograph Gallery, where, after having group photographs taken, those elgible to vote chose the captain for next year. E. W. Cober, who successfully captained the team last season, was re-elected on the first ballot. Captain Cober's work with the team justifies the choice and leaves no reason for anxiety as to the Captaincy.

Manger Garner is in correspondence with several basket ball teams and games with Lock Haven, Danville, Bloomsburg, and others will probably be arranged. As before mentioned, a game with the U. of Pa. team is among the possibilities, also one with Temple College.

Captain Elliot has been coaching the basket ball candidates and several games have been played between picked teams. It seems that there should certainly be material for a good team. All that is needed, as is always the case, is hard work by the team and good instruction.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Several of the boys spent their vacation at Lewisburg.

Cober, '99, has been re-elected captain of the foot ball team for the season of '97.

J. B. Martin and H. P. Moyer played at the Bucknell Alumni Banquet, recently held at Philadelphia.

Sherman, 1900, has taken unto himself a wife as a Christmas present. We extend to him our congratulations.

The latest initiations into fraternities are Cober, '99, into Sigma Alpha Epsilon and Catterall, '99, into Kappa Sigma.

Mr. E. C. Conover, who has been unable to be with us during the Fall term, is back once more, ready for study and athletics.

H. B. Moyer attended the thirty-ninth convention of the Sigma Alpha Epsilon Fraternity at St. Louis during the holidays.

The men who are working for the Junior debate this term are: Anderson, Dutton, Fithian, Diggs, Forrester, Cook, Wiltbank, and Stober.

The Anderson bachelor's club regret the loss of their Vice President by marriage. It is thought that others may follow Mr. Sherman's example.

E. C. Kunkle, H. Sprague, C. Meeker, E. Flint, B F. Thomas, J. T. Anderson, and others have been engaged in religious work during the past vacation.

A. C. Apgar, 1900, has been conducting a series of successful revival meetings at Hughesville, Pa. The church has been quickened, and several have signified a desire to lead a better life.

The College Girls' Glee Club gave their first concert at Williamsport, Saturday evening, Dec. 19, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. of that city. They rendered an excellent program.

The annual Sophomore contest was held Saturday evening, January 9, and was attended by the usual appreciative audience. All the contestants acquitted themselves in a creditable manner.

J. E. Saul, '98, again met the students at the stations and in his usual manner transferred the baggage to the University. He expresses himself as highly gratified at the way in which the students patronize him, and wishes us to express his appreciation of their kindness.

Mr. James Moore's recent gift of furnitnre for the college girls' study room is greatly appreciated. Mr. Moore has shown admirable taste in the selection of the pieces and the delight of the fortunate recipients is quite natural. May kindly Fortune favor our college girls still further and in the near future bestow upon them that which they so greatly desire and need—a cottage of their own.

The Intercollegiate Debate between Bucknell and Franklin and Marshall will be held in Bucknell Hall, Friday evening, January 22. The question is: Resolved, "That a national board of arbitration, with compulsory powers, should be established to settle interstate railway disputes between employers and employed." Bucknell has the affirmative. There will be an admission fee of 15 cents to pay the expenses incurred. Come all and help make it a success.

Rev. P. E. Weithaase, '98, who re-entered college last September to complete his course, has accepted the pastorate of the Montandon Baptist Church, in connection with his school work. He has been conducting a series of very successful revival services; about thirty-five have entered on the new life and "the end is not yet." Mr. Weithaase was assisted in the work by Mr. Farley, Pastor of the Milton Baptist Church, and by Fisk, Shields, Skinner, Barner, and Saul of the University.

Friday evening, December 11, the Phi Epsilon Local Society became the Alpha Phi Chapter of the Kappa Sigma Fraternity. The initiatory exercises were conducted by J. H. Covington, Esq., of Easton, Md., and Prof. G. Harold Powell of Cornell University, assisted by the State College Chapter. The following men were initiated as charter members: W. R. Paulin, Jr., J. W. Davis, A. W. Johnson, M. R. Collins, G. A. Jennings, S. W. Gilpin, O. J. Decker, G. E. Jenkinson, B. W. Griffith, W. R. Morris, S. C. Bell, and A. D. Rees. A banquet was then enjoyed at the Cameron House.

BUCKNELL ALUMNI AND ALUMNAE CLUBS OF PHILADELPHIA.

The magnificent Hotel Walton, Broad and Locust Sts., Phila., was the meeting place of a large and brilliant gathering of the friends of Bucknell on Monday evening, December 7, 1896. The occasion was the annual meeting of the Philadelphia Alumni Club and in celebration of the occasion a joint meeting with the Alumnæ was arranged. Pres. Harris and Principal Mrs. Larison were the guests of the evening. A delightful season of social intercourse was enjoyed, after which a collation was served. Excellent music was rendered by the Mandolin Club of the University. After full justice had been done to the menu, a few items of business were transacted by the Alumni Club, among which was the election of officers for the ensuing year as follows: Pres., J. K. Weaver, M. D., '61; Vice Pres., Prof. M. G. Evans, D. D., '82; Secy., Rev. R. B. McDanel, '88; Treas., C. B. Lowe, M. D. '65; Chairman of Ex. Com., Rev. B. MacMackin, '74.

An innovation was the carrying out of a prepared program as follows: "The Old Home," Pres. Harris; "The Girls at Home," Mrs. K. B. Larison, Inst. '67; "Bucknell's Grown Up Boys," Rev. J. S. James, D. D., '68; "Institute Girls in the Good Old Days," Mrs. M. P. Tustin, Inst. '55; "Bucknell's Grown Up Girls," Mrs. Daniel Sutter, Inst. '63; "Social Life and Athletics at Bucknell," W. C. Gretzinger, '88; "Alma Mater's Grandchildren," Mrs. Dora E. W. Spratt, '78.

A number of college songs were sung, such as "It's a way we have at old Bucknell" and "For he's a jolly good fellow." An original song, "Dear Bucknell," was written by Rev. S. S. Merriman, '86, and was sung by him. "Auld Lang Syne" revived many old memories, and the college yell was given more than once with all the vigor of the old days on the campus. Over one hundred guests were present. The Board of Trustees was represented by Rev. C. C. Bitting, D. D., Eben C. Jayne, Rev. D. P. Leas, Geo. M. Philips, Ph. D., Rev. A. J. Rowland, D. D., Rev. Geo. M. Spratt, D. D., Rev. Leroy Stephens, D. D., Rev. Henry G. Weston, D. D., Earnest L. Tustin, Esq., and J. K. Weaver, M. D. Among others present were, Prof. H. L. Atkinson, '59, Samuel Bolton, M. D., '85, Hon. Ward R. Bliss, '74, Rev. John Brooks, '76, Rev. W. H. Conard, D. D., '62, Miss Nellie Conard, '93, Miss Mary A. Custer, '88, Rev. T. J. Cross, '91, W. J. Coxey, '54, O. B. Finn, '89, Rev. M. G. Evans, D. D., '82, J. H. Grater, '72, Rev. H. B. Garner, '65, C. A. Gundy, M. D., '93, Rev. R. J. Holmes, '91, Miss Ida Hammond, '87, Miss Jessie Jones, '88, Rev. D. M. Jones, '88, O. B. Jenkins, '84, C. B. Lowe, M. D., '65, Rev. A. L. Moore, '91, Mrs. I. H. O'Harra, '83, Rev. G. A. Peltz, D. D., '57, Prof. J. E. Perry, '78, Miss S. A. Reed, '68, Mrs. J. W. Lynch, '55, Rev. G. M. Righter, '72, Rev. H. B. Rankin, '89, Rev. E. H. Ranney, '63, W. O. Shaffer, '72, Miss Bertha Shirley, '91, Rev. D. W. Sheppard, '73, Rev. F. H. Shermer, '81, Dr. P. N. K. Schwenk, '76, Rev. J. G. Walker, D. D., '62, J. R. Wood, '94, Dr. S. L. Ziegler, '80, Hon. W. B. Hanna, Miss Maud Hanna, '87, Rev. Jos. S. Evans, Rev. P. L. Jones, D. D., Mrs. T. E. McVitty, '64, Mr. Joseph Moore, Rev. J. W. Sullivan, J. L. Van Gundy, '87, Mrs. Stubbs, '58, and Rev. J. W. Weddel.

At 10:00 o'clock the company dispersed after singing "Good Night Ladies."

This was a most enjoyable meeting and brought old and new friends in closer touch. The wives of alumni and husbands of alumnæ met and felt that they knew each other because of all they had heard from their husbands and wives of the old days at Lewisburg. The addresses were all good, with no attempt at formality, and all breathed a spirit of tenderest love to Alma Mater. In her present prosperity all rejoice, and for her future success her loyal children will ever pray and labor.

DEAR BUCKNELL.

Dear Bucknell, oft of thee we're thinking,
And mem'ries fond come trooping by;
The tireless stars may cease their blinking,
But thoughts of thee shall never die;
And tho' the years steal swiftly o'er us,
And winter comes with biting sting,
Our hearts with youth's undaunted chorus
Shall e'er with praise of Bucknell ring.

We burn the incense of affection,
As in thy sacred fanes we meet,
While down the aisles of recollection
Come thronging forms we long to greet;
And tho' life's bitter storms sweep o'er us,
And pleasure 'bides on fleeting wing,
Our hearts shall blend in loving chorus,
While Alma Mater's praise we sing.

To thee we swear our proud allegiance,
Thy loyal sons are we, and true;
Nor time, nor tide, nor fortune's pageants
Shall daunt the orange and the blue;
Then, with thy glory e'er before us,
Our loving tribute we will bring,
And once again, in hearty chorus,
Thy praise, dear Bucknell, we will sing.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Welcome '97.

Messrs. Grant, Richard Bell, and Calvin Elliot recently dined at the Institute.

Miss Crawford spent the holidays in New York City.

Several new students have registered at the Institute.

Miss Laura Angle, Ex-'97, has been visiting Miss Armitage.

Miss Marguerite O'Donnell spent the holidays at the home of Miss Margaret Raike in Doylestown.

Professor Aviragnet intends to organize this term a French Club, composed of ladies and gentlemen from the town who have formerly studied under him.

Miss Sarah Black spent part of the vacation with Miss Edith Phillips at her home in Plymouth.

On Thursday, December 10, 1895, Miss Aikin's class in Musical History gave a "Mozart Evening" in the school room. Essays upon the different portions of his life and selections from his compositions were acceptably presented to an audience composed of the friends of the class.

Miss Margaret Montgomery entertained her Pi Phi sisters and their escorts, along with Mrs. Larison and Miss Brown, at her home in McEwensville, Friday evening, December 11. The evening spent in the Montgomery mansion and the moonlight drive were exceedingly enjoyed by all.

Miss Mary G. Youngman, who took a special course in Modern Languages at the Institute, '95-'96, is recuperating at the home of her uncle, Mr. Isaac Grier in Danville. Miss Youngman sustained serious injuries several months ago by a fall from her bicycle.

PERSONALS.

'63. Rev. W. W. Case goes to Rutherford, N.J.

'67, Inst. Miss Hannah E. Johnston is expected to visit the Principal of the Institute the second week in January.

'69. Attorney A. A. Leiser is said to have won an important case recently in a law suit before Judge Biddle in Carlisle.

Ex-'72. A second series of interesting articles on "Lewisburg in the 60's" is being published in local papers. The series consists of personal recollections of Mr. Eli Slifer, Jr., located for sometime past at Kankakee, Illinois.

'85. Mr. C. C. Law, of Pittsburg, was seen about the University lately.

'85. Hon. C. N. Herman was again honored by the Republicans of Snyder County by being returned to the State Assembly.

'85. Rev. Jas. F. Brown, D. D., for a long time Curator of Bucknell, with his wife visited Mrs. W. E. Martin shortly before the holidays.

'86, '87. Messrs. Grant Dreisbach and W. C. Gretzinger were appointed Councilmen of Lewisburg to succeed two members who resigned.

As usual the Sibyl contains many interesting gems, articles, and jokes.

The Ursinus College Bulletin is almost a model of typographical neatness and excellence.

We are glad, indeed we feel complimented, at receiving the St. John's Collegian among our exchanges.

Delegates representing Faculty, Alumni, and students from the following colleges, Union, Hobart, Rochester, Hamilton, and Syracuse met for the purpose of purifying athletics, by revising the methods of conducting same.

The Mountaineer from Emmitsburg deserves mention because of its many interesting features, not only in style but also in its diction.

She (snubbingly)—"You think you are perfection."
He—"Always, when I am near you."

The Muhlenberg for October is a memorial number in honor of the late Dr. Garber who had been a Professor at that school for more than a score of years.

Some of our sister colleges would profit by reading Edward Everett Hale's article, "Sixty years since at Harvard", in the October number of the Atlantic Monthly.

Junior (anxiously)—"What is it your father sees in me to object to, darling?"
His "darling" (wiping away a tear)—"He doesn't see anything in you, Algernon; that's why he objects."
Junior hastily reaches for his hat,—Ex.

Graduation Day at Peirce School, Philadelphia, is an important day, not only to those who on that day make their formal entrance into the business world, but to the public, also. Great statesmen and great orators have esteemed it an honor to take part in these exercises and bid the graduates "God Speed." Carnegie, Depew, General Harrison, Speaker Reed, have appeared in recent years. At the last exercises Congressman Quigg and the Reverend Thomas Dixon were the speakers. Honorable John Field presided. The class of '96 will be publicly graduated January 15, 1897. Honorable Theodore Roosevelt will make the annual address, Reverend Dr. Palmer the address to the graduates, and His Honor Mayor Warwick will preside.

JANUARY 25, 1897.

THE intercollegiate debate with Franklin and Marshall will occur too late for mention in this issue of the MIRROR. Our debaters have worked hard and diligently, and are deserving of our praise. Likewise we are well pleased with the way the professors and students have given their support in this contest. We believe that the same immediate results have followed at Franklin and Marshall. But in addition to this excellent drill for the speakers and the increased interest in literary society work, we hope to obtain a better acquaintance with our neighboring college, by means of which we may broaden our views and receive inspiration in our work of higher education. And whatever the decision of the judges may be, we feel sure that in a much broader and higher sense both colleges will be winners.

WE regret that we have to speak of a practice that is all too common at Bucknell, as well as elsewhere, and that cannot be too strongly condemned, that of cheating in the class room and examinations. It is not smart or cunning to study up the point for recitation behind some one else's back or to escape the notice of the professor in examination, and it is unjust and unfair to the student who does his work honestly and faithfully, yet may stand lower in his class than the cheat. It has a disastrous effect upon the one who practices it also, for it is sure to dull his sense of honor and blunt the keen edge of his conscience. One cheats himself more than the professor. Then too it is a deep and permanent injury to the college, for it is a shame that any school should graduate men who know nothing of the subjects they have passed and who will bring disgrace and reproach upon its reputation for scholarship. Yet, if the truth must be said, some of the blame must be put upon the professors who allow such things to prevail. Be that as it may, let us hope that the "honor system" may soon gain an effective and permanent hold in the examinations and class room work of Bucknell.

THE present term is one of hard work. There is hardly a student who is not spending at least eight hours a day at work, and many a great deal more. The spirit of industry seems to be in the air, more so than in former terms. The fact that more students than ever before are taking honor work points to the general interest in high educational aims. The first duty of every student is to do the required college work to the best of his ability; but the grand idea of a general education should be kept clearly in mind. To work for a mark is not a high aim, but to work for love of the study and for the educational good it is going to accomplish is no unworthy motive. How much better is it when we can get above a doggish servitude in our work and be rational men, masters of it! But class work is only a part of one's education. The work in the literary societies, upon the different publication boards, our every-day actions toward one another, the lectures and entertainments we attend and the organizations of which we are a part, are great factors in our education and as such every true student should take them into account and perform his part diligently.

THE UNTOUCHED CHORD.

My Muse with me
Held colloquy.
I playfully besought her
To lead the way
Where wood-nymphs play
By streams of limpid water.

At this she sighed,
And then replied:
"Why so misuse your powers
In idle dreams
Of rippling streams,
Wood-nymp'hs, and sylvan bowers?

Come, let me lead
You to a deed
More suited to your station.
Your strength is such
You can do much
Of true worth to creation.

There is a chord—
An untouched chord—
Of stern, majestic beauty;
You can acquire
It's latent fire—
To strike it is your duty."

"O Muse," I cried,
Almost beside Myself in deep contrition,
"Forget my prayer,
For now, I swear,
You fire me with ambition.

Show me this chord—
This untouched chord,
I cannot wait a minute;
Lead me aright,
I'll prove my might,
I'll wrest the fire that's in it."

Without delay
She led the way
With many luring graces
The hall-way through
And then into
The back-yard, of all places!

Then turned about,
And pointed out—
A mocking courtesy dropping—
To where a cord—
An untouched cord
Of wood awaited chopping.

MISS BEGORIA BRAY.

"Poor fool that I am!" sighed Johnson Jonathan Reed, as he stood musingly before a display window on Main Street. He had been standing there for at least ten minutes, but it did not occur to him till just that moment that he was making an idiot of himself for the delectation of the world at large. "Smitten, by Jove!" he continued sadly. "And not by flesh and blood either, but by a cold, lifeless, heartless photograph! Who ever thought I wouldcome to this?"

Reed pinched his nose to see if he was awake and, being assured of the fact, returned to his close inspection of a photograph that occupied a prominent place in the window.

"Smitten, by Jove!" he said again, as still his wonder grew, and with that he turned on his heel and made off at a rapid pace for his boarding-house.

Never before had he seen such a face. Pretty faces he had seen; beautiful faces had greeted him at times; strong, handsome faces were not unknown to him; but never before had he seen such a face as this: it summed up the charms and omitted the faults of them all.

He was at the window again the same day gazing as intently and idiotically as before.

"Perfect! Perfect!" he muttered between his teeth. "I wonder who it is. I've never seen that face in this town. This town doesn't hold a face like that. Where could it come from? Well, no use in speculating here, I'm going in to ask who it is."

He walked with an air of bold determination up the steps and into the studio. Jerry Bliss, the photographer, had a slight acquaintance with him and knew that it was best to humor Johnson J. Reed whenever it was possible to do so with little inconvenience.

"I came to ask a favor," said the visitor with unabashed boldness. "I haven't come to sit for my photograph yet. Save that tragedy for another day. I came to ask the name of the person whose picture occupies the centre of your show window. My curiosity is aroused.”

Bliss smiled good naturedly.

“You mean this one?” he queried, picking up the photograph, while his visitor inwardly remarked that it was almost sacrilege for any one to touch it.

“Yes,” he said, “that's the one.”

Bliss smiled again in his inimitable way.

“Are you sure you care to know?” he asked. “And are you sure I ought to tell you?”

“You needn't parley,” said Reed, inwardly fuming, because he knew he was in the photographer's power.

“Very well,” said the latter, who was nothing if not wise in his generation, “if you really care to know who it is, I can easily accommodate you. The lady is here now. Just step this way and I will present you.”

The visitor's face lighted up as if a thousand lamps were behind it, and he felt his heart go thump, thump, thump, in a way that was very mystifying. He followed the photographer into the rear room, saying all manner of evil against himself for not having made special preparation for meeting the lady,—as if he could possibly know have beforehand that he was to meet her!

When they entered the room he looked around for the woman whom already he adored. Nothing but pictures and easels and chairs could he see.

Bliss lifted a curtain, took from behind it an easel and placed it in the middle of the room. Then he took a large framed picture from a corner and set it on the easel. It was a crayon portrait.

“Let me introduce you to Miss Begoria Bray,” he said. “My wife is something of an artist and drew this from an original fancy of her own. It was so good that I photographed it,” and again that smile illumined his face.

The visitor almost collapsed. His heart, which had hitherto been rather noisy, sank in painful silence. For a moment the room swam before him. Then he bowed gravely towards the easel and said in quite his usual tones,—

“I am very happy to meet you, Miss Bray.”

A moment later, the door of the studio slammed upon a crushed, retreating figure, and the bricks upon which Johnson Jonathan Reed trod in his mad career homeward knew that something was the matter.

AN INCIDENT AT THE SALE OF A PHILOSOPHER.

The scene is in Syracuse at the time of Dion the Tyrant. Plato is visiting Dion, and, at his host's request, expounds some of his exalted views of life. Dion is very much displeased, and so, to see how well these views would hold in practice, he orders Plato to be cast into irons, taken to the market as a slave, and sold at the common sale

Two boys on their way to school are coming down the street with a pedagogue.

“Say,” cried one “let us go down to the market and see the slaves for sale.” “It pleases me,” said the other, “call to the pedagogue and we will go.”

“By Jupiter! what a fine fellow is that one with a lofty brow! I say, I wonder if we could not buy him. Inquire of the master of the sale, and see what the Grecian slave may sell for. About twenty minae, you say? I wonder how much that is. Here, slave of a pedagogue, you know money, how much have we in our purses? Ten obols, you say. Well, is that as much as twenty minae? Why do you laugh at us? It is no joke, we want the Grecian slave over there.”

“Young masters,” explained the pedagogue, “you should surely know better how to count. Have you already forgotten the tables? Remember now, six obols make a drachma, and one hundred drachmas it takes to make a minae. So you have not even a thousandth part of what is necessary. But come, hurry on to school, you are already late, and the master will surely scold.”

The boys turned away reluctantly, and followed the pedagogue to school. “Just think,” said one as they walked along sadly, “how fine it would have been to own a real Greek slave; they say he is now a philosopher, and so he could work out all our problems for us; and think, too, what fine stories he might tell us.” “Yes,” replied his companion, “and what a nice, kind man he would be to play with, for remember how good he was to scratch the back of that old Cyrenian woman, when she could not get to a post.”

All morning in school the boys neglected their lessons and wondered how they could raise twenty minae.

REVIVAL ATMOSPHERE.

In view of the meetings that are being held this week in connection with the Day of Prayer for schools and colleges, the following extracts from an address by Rev. J. W. Weddell, who conducted the meetings last year, are printed.

PREFACE.

Dr. Livingstone asked the native of South Africa what holiness was. Here is his answer: "When copious showers have descended during the night, and all the earth and leaves and cattle are washed clean, and the sun rising shows a drop of dew on every blade of grass, and the air breathes fresh—that is holiness." And that is revival. It comes as silently, as sweetly, as irresistibly! It is in the air. God's waiting heaven above us and about us, when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord.

INTRODUCTION.

There is the tremulous expectancy of revival in the air, a longing for the breaking of a better day. Such a day of refreshing as came to this country in 1734 under Jonathan Edwards; a century later under Finney and Nettleton; in the glorious week of 1859 when the showers descended on all the churches throughout the land, and indeed in two continents; in 1875 and '76, under those marvelous men of God, Dwight L. Moody and Ira D. Sankey. Such awakenings come from God, but can we do nothing to bring them about?

ELEMENTS.

The first element in this revival atmosphere, is the divine element. The divine breath is the first pre-requisite. But it must be mixed with human breath. Yet it is not merely breath. It is truth. Truth given of God; truth believed of man. Here is your revival atmosphere. It has always been so. When prophets and preachers have stood forth and taken God's word and believed it and proclaimed it in full assent of mind and abandon of soul, revivals have come.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF IT.

Revivals are not of men, they are of God; or rather they are of men and God together, but man in his place and God in his. In the true awakening there is a conjunction of the human and divine, two elements commingling. It is not of man; it is not of mode. Wit and eloquence or other human gifts do not produce it; neither, thank God, do they hinder it—always. It comes when, God bending in mercy to man, and man rising in penitence to God, there is produced an atmosphere or temperature out of which conversion of souls is precipitated as refreshing from the clouds when the conditions are right; or, it may be, lightning from the congested heavens.

THE NEED.

Ah, but we need it—a genuine, old-fashioned work of grace; such an awakening as will check business life and social gayety; that will make men and women forget other engagements for this chiefest thing; that will cause them to stop in the street, as once they did, and talk religion; that will send them crying tears of repentance, rather than that the church should be continually crying, childwise, after them. We need a revival of religion. Is it coming? Yes, and our clamorous need is the best sign of it. Our tears and prayers are the harbingers of it.

A MODERN INSTANCE.

Let me illustrate its power and effects from a somewhat recent experience: A college community of three or four hundred members, a goodly number Christian, but the tides, social and fraternal, sweeping the other way; at the center a praying band of men whose hearts God had touched; yes and at the head a president deeply intent upon placing the first thing first—the kingdom of God and his righteousness; a company of professors and instructors heartily with him in the good sentiment and desire.

A mission service. The students' week of prayer is announced. And now, standing before the assembly of students, bright young men and women getting ready to lead the coming generation, appeal is made for Christ. There is no response. A good respectful hearing, interested, too, but no spiritual results. It is not strange. There is only one voice saying come, the voice of the preacher; yes, and the faithful president and the pastor. with mild echoes here and there.

That was the first night. A meeting of the Christian young men and women who are ready to work is called. Members of all the classes respond. The field is looked over, the class lists are examined, the number of unconverted men is brought forward. Each case is given to someone to look after, perhaps to two or three. They are to invite to the meetings, to present the subject of personal acceptance of Jesus, if opportunity offers, to call for the young men in their rooms and accompany them to the chapel, or if possible to bring them to a personal interview with the leader of the meeting. Prayer meetings are in progress in the clubs, the classes, the various buildings. The pastor or chaplain of the occassion is in each of the buildings some time during the day for personal conversation. There are conferences and reports and hastening steps back and forth. It becomes a campaign, presently a siege. Need I say that the interest of the meeting grows from day to day,and that fruits begin to show, the spirit increasing to the close in such marvelous fashion as to make men say "What hath God wrought!" A hundred fifty glad testimonies in one meeting, the tide turned kingdomwards, signboards all pointing one way, the whole current of college life changed. and blessedly so. In such an atmosphere the spectacle of thirty or forty young men and women coming forward at the last to give their hands and hearts for the Lord Jesus is to be rejoiced in, but not to be wondered at. Thus God permits us sometimes to see it.

Something for us to do? Certainly. Be ready for the blessing, all the gate-ways open, all the means of grace in exercise, all the college prostrate in prayer. Be in earnest, with heart and soul desire revival. Such a spirit opens heaven.

> "Go spread the tidings 'round
> Wherever man is found,
> Wherever human hearts and human woes abound;
> Let every Christian tongue proclaim the joyful > sound—
> The Comforter has come!"

FEDERATION OF GRADUATE CLUBS.

The Federation of Graduate Clubs of America met, Dec. 29 and 30, in McCoy Hall of Johns Hopkins University. Some sixty persons were in attendance, including delegates from each of the 27 graduate clubs that form the Federation.

Its origin and growth are of comparatively recent date. In April, 1893, a convention of affiliated Graduate Clubs was held in New York City, at which representatives from a number of the leading American Universities were present. Out of this convention, largely through the efforts of Mr. Charles E. Duniway of Harvard, the Federation of Graduate Clubs was effected. The first convention was held in Houston Hall. Philadelphia, in Jan. '96, with the club of the University of Pennsylvania.

The Graduate Clubs of Barnard, Brown, Bryn Mawr, California, Chicago, Clark, Columbia, Columbian, Cornell, Harvard, Indiana, Johns Hopkins, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New York, Northwestern, Pennsylvania, Princeton, Radcliffe, Stanford, Tulane, Vanderbilt, Wellesley, Western Reserve, Wisconsin, and Yale constitute the Federation. The aim is to aid the development of graduate study in America.

The most important matters under consideration at the recent convention were, the means by which the Ph. D. degree may be guarded, the means by which inter-university migration may be facilitated, and the publication of the Handbook of Graduate Courses.

Of the institutions represented in the Federation, Bryn Mawr, Clark, Chicago, Cornell, Johns Hopkins, Leland Stanford, Minnesota, Vanderbilt and Wellesley reported that they confer no honorary degrees. In answer to the question "Are you in favor of conferring honorary degrees?" 81 out of the 96 colleges responding, some in the Federation, others not, said no, and 11 said yes with some qualification.

The Federation adopted lengthy resolutions to send out to the various colleges and universities. These resolutions were very pronounced in opposition to the promiscuous conferring of honorary degrees, as practiced by so many American colleges.

The following statistics were read: Total number of graduate students in American colleges and universities 3024; of this number 650 are women. These 3024 students are taught by 1103 teachers, and pursue the following studies in the order named: Languages and literature, history and social science, philosophy, natural science, mathematics.

At this convention the Federation also decided to undertake, in connection with the Handbook, the printing of a list of all the dissertations for the Ph. D. degree that have hitherto been written and accepted in American Universities, with the names of the authors and of the approving professors. This then marks the commencement of the publication of a catalogue of American dissertations similar in scope to the lists of German theses which have been published under the authority of the German Government for the past ten years.

I might also speak of the three addresses of Pres. Gilman, Prof. Bloomfield and Prof. Remsen. It seems to me rather a noteworthy coincidence that these three men, all representative of Johns Hopkins, should have spoken of the same phase of the same subject, what Pres. Gilman and Prof. Bloomfield termed "greater university freedom" and what Prof. Remsen called "Akademische Freiheit." Prof. Bloomfield's address was on the subject of "Breadth." He said that a charge brought against American students today is their narrowness. Our department grooves are too narrow. We need more university culture as opposed to departmental culture. "Break down the barbed wire fence of department. There should be more university freedom." And the graduate student should attend a university, not so much because of the university as for the sake of the strong man with whom he will come most in contact.

The spirit of the Federation is well expressed in these words of Professor Bloomfield, "greater university freedom." MARY BARTOL.

NOTES FROM OTHER SCHOOLS.

It has been suggested that one column of the MIRROR be devoted occasionally to a letter from Crozer Theological Seminary and the various academies, Keystone, Mt. Pleasant, Hall Institute, etc., thus creating a common and more vital bond of interest between the schools. Most of these institutions have no representative paper of their own, and such a step would tend to deepen the interest of the students in Bucknell and would draw and bind all by the ties of a common brotherhood.

In accordance with this suggestion we are pleased to receive the following:

LETTER FROM CROZER.

This letter is written by invitation. Gladly do I respond, because it enables me to say that the Bucknell boys are in the world, though not of the world. We are too busy to be of the world, and too frequently examined to be anywhere else than in the world.

The only sins recognized here are laziness and indifference, at least, that is the way it strikes the Juniors, who are compelled to work without ceasing.

To illustrate: We have five hours each week in Greek New Testament; five hours in Hebrew; three hours in Biblical Theology; three hours in Church History; and one hour in Old Testament. To prepare for each class requires at least two hours and as much more as thoroughness demands. Yet one of our teachers is in the habit of saying, "You think that you work now; wait till you become pastors, then you will work."

But we like it; it is not a novelty; we learned the art while at Bucknell. That is the reason we fancy we are doing as good work as graduates of other colleges which are represented here. Among the one hundred four students registered there are graduates from thirteen colleges and universities. Besides the graduates, many of the one hundred four students have attended college for one or more years, or are graduates of representative academies, so that good work is expected. The boys respond to the expectation.

There are six Bucknell boys in the Senior class, and two other members of the class attended Bucknell two years. In spite of the fact that they graduated at U. P., we cordially receive Heysham and Horter into the "Lewisburg colony," and call them "our boys."

The Middle class counts among its members three graduates of Bucknell; while the Juniors can boast of seven, who give your instructors honor by their diligence and earnestness.

This letter has intentionally been general in character, but in the future you shall here from the boys individually.

ATHLETICS.

BASKET BALL SCHEDULE.

Jan. 29, Pittston Y. M. C. A., at Pittston.
Jan. 30, Wilkesbarre Y. M. C. A., at Wilkesbarre.
Feb. 6, U. of Pa., at Lewisburg.
Feb. 9, Williamsport Y. M. C. A., at Williamsport.
March 20, U. of Pa., at Philadelphia.
March 27, All Pittsburg, at Pittsburg.
March 29, Western U. of Pa., at Allegheny.

Since the opening of the winter term the practice has been hard and good work is being done. Captain Elliot, owing to sickness, has been unable to return and Mulkie has been elected to serve during his absence:

The team as playing at present is:

Weymouth, Centre.
Mulkie, } Forwards.
Smith. }
Catterall, } Guards.
Garner, }

The game with U. of Pa., will be an Athletic-Social event, and promises to be decidedly the affair of the term. After the game a reception will be given in the gymnasium to the visiting team. Among the large number of patronesses will be numbered the elite of Lewisburg and Milton.

With the opening of the winter term directors Bunnell and Cober began the gymnasium drills, which are compulsory during the winter. The directors report a large attendance at the drills. The action of the faculty in allowing two terms of gymnasium work to count as an honor study is no doubt a greater incentive to attendance upon them than heretofore.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Conover, '99, has returned to College.

Electric lights have been put in the Gymnasium.

Krise, '99, has lately recovered from a severe illness.

Messrs. Elliot, Collins, and Rees have been quite ill recently.

Prof. in Physics—"Mr. L., What is work?" Mr. L., confused—"I did not get that far."

The smiling face of Guss, ex-'97, was seen about the College at the opening of the term.

Mr. Barner has recently declared his intention of boycotting our paper, unless his name appears more frequently.

The Junior Class recently reconsidered their previous action and have decided to hold a Junior Ball.

While at Northumberland recently, Kulp, 1900, was thrown from a buggy without serious injury.

Baseball goods are expected in a short time, so that candidates will have an opportunity for some indoor work.

Davis, '95, McCay, '96, Koons, '97, Thornton, '98 and Burge, 98, are taking Human Dissection this term.

Mr. J. T. Anderson, '98, was called to preach the funeral sermon of one of his church members at Montgomery, January 16.

The editors of the L'Agenda are at present laboring strenuously to make this year's edition both a literary and financial success.

Gymnasium drill has been begun under the direction of Messrs. Bunnell and Cober. Two terms work will count the same as an honor study.

The Chillisquaque mission has presented the students who are accustomed to preach there with a boat, by which they can shorten their trip.

On the evening of January 8, Mrs. Dutton gave a reception to a number of University students in honor of her daughter. They report a very good time.

Skating has been one of our most enjoyable pastimes, but of late the snows have so covered lake and river that we have been compelled to forgo it for a season.

The Week of Prayer is being observed by the Christian Associations of the University, the last Thursday in January being the day of prayer for colleges.

New baskets and a ball have been procured by the Athletic Association for the basket ball team which has been practing hard of late to make this season's a success.

The Inter-collegiate Debate between Franklin and Marshall and Bucknell took place Friday evening, Jan. 22, in Bucknell Hall. The affair was well managed and was a success both financially and otherwise. Messrs. Collins and Dutton represented Bucknell and put forth a clear-cut, well constructed argument which their opponents were unable to overthrow. The judges gave their decision unanimously in favor of Bucknell.

The University Band still continues its good work, having received several new pieces of late. Arrangements are being made for a concert to be given in Bucknell Hall in the near future.

The Euepia Literary Society elected the following officers for this term: President, Sinnette; Vice President, Smith; Secretary, Hankey; Treasurer, Bell; Critic, Dutton; Librarian, Grim.

The following are the officers of Theta Alpha for the current term: President, Collins; Vice President, Strayer; Secretary, Hanna; Treasurer, Cook; Critic, Wiltbank; Curator, Diggs; Censor, Forrester.

The University Song Book will soon be out. It is the first issue of such a book by the University and is therefore eagerly awaited. In size and quality we hope to rival those of the larger Universities.

On Jan. 14, the Literary Societies held a joint debate, Grim and Bell representing Euepia, Diggs and Robbins, Theta Alpha. The subject for debate was the same as that for the Intercollegate Debate the following week.

Miss Annie Louise White proved herself to be an excellent entertainer in her rendering of "Flirts and Matrons" in Bucknell Hall, Friday evening, Jan. 15. Her subject was presented in six scenes, "The Vassar Girl," "The Society Belle," "The Bride," "The Wife," "The Mother," and "The Grandmother," all of which were portrayed with great fidelity to life.

In the absence of Dr. Hulley, Mrs. Hulley has aught his classes in college to the entire satisfaction of the students.

If you have not paid your subscription you will oblige the manager by paying at once.

"To owe, is human,
To pay, divine;"
A quotation borrowed
From Professor Perrine.

"Oh you naughty pointer pup! Where have you been?" "Now don't scold, mamma pointer; I went to College, and I'll tell you about it. First, I went to chapel and found a whole lot of people who made grabs at me as I ran by them; soon these people began to sing, and then I thought I would go up front where the Faculty were; I came near being trampled to death by the choir who were singing and stamping, to keep time I gaess, but a nice Professor rescued me and put me on a chair beside him, this was a Professor's chair yet I felt that filled it very well. When chapel was over, I went out and found a much educated dog called "Scott," who advised me to go to the class in Physics, and so I went. The steps of the "Lab" are steep and I was getting into trouble when some good fellow caught the back of my neck, as you used to, and carried me up stairs to the recitation room. The recitation was so dry, altho they talked about "water-vapor," that I began to play; I caught hold of the fur cape of one of the ladies, but she drew it away with such an aristocratic air that I was discouraged; next went up and put my jaws lovingly upon the knee of the Professor, but he hit me an awful slap in the face. No body seemed to like me, so I got out in front of the class and ran 'round and 'round trying to catch my tail; I almost had it when a student caught me up by the neck, and, carrying me down stairs, threw me out; I almost cried, and ran home now just as fast as I could to tell you about it."

LIBRARY NOTES.

During the term closing with the old year many gratifying evidences of progress were manifest. The gratitude of all friends of Bucknell is due to the kind benfactors who have made this progress possible. Early in the session, Mr. Craige Lippincott donated sixty-six volumes of carefully selected works for immediate service in all the partments of instruction.

In December, Rev Franklin G. McKeever, pastor of the First Baptist Church of New London, Conn., presented to the Library a set of the new edition of "Johnson's Universal Cyclopedia," in 8 vols., royal octavo, half morrocco binding. Mr. and Mrs. McKeever made a very pleasant call at his former school home, during the Autumn; and the Cyclopedia is both a souvenir of pleasant memories of by-gone days, and an earnest of future gifts to the library, since he desires to be acquainted with our needs annually.

William J. Coxey, A. M., of Camden, N. J., has filled his "Alcove" with twelve hundred volumes in the past sixteen months; and recent advices assure us the end is not yet reached, as a shipment may be expected about Feb. 1st. Mr. Coxey's contributions to the working tools of the institution are highly appreciated by all who use the Library.

Through Professor F. E. Rockwood, Hon. John Wanamaker has just contributed twenty-seven volumes of useful works. Mr. Wanamaker's interest in education is one of the chief characteristics of his varied and forceful personality. Bucknell appreciates his testimonial to her work and workers.

The chief feature of 1896–7 is the Card Catalogue. For the efficient service of the Cataloguer, we are indebted to the generosity of two worthy members of our Board of Trastees, Treasurer D. P. Leas and Earnest L. Tustin, Esq., both of Philadelphia. For the material form of the index, we are indebted to Dr. Joseph K. Weaver, of Norristown, also a Trustee, who contributed the beautiful walnut cabinet which is to contain the twenty trays filled with 20,000 cards, and to Dr. Wm. Frear, of State College, Pa., who kindly furnishes the cards for the catalogue.

D. Barron Miller, A. M., of Lewisburg, and Mr. Calvin Greene, of Lewistown, have quite recently made substantial gifts to our Library Improvement Fund.

Joseph Moore, Jr., A. M., of Philadelphia, has supplied a great need in his gift of thirty-seven pieces of beautiful and useful furniture for the Ladies' Library,--the South room between the Main Library and the Museum. Expression of the gratitude of the ladies was made in our last number. At the present rate of increase the time is not far distant when the Library will need the Museum room; unless, in the meantime, some friend of the University shall immortalize himself by erecting a fire proof Library building upon the campus.

Our immediate needs for completed files, for new books, and for binding are as urgent as ever, and offer to many friends possibilities for helpfulness, of which we are sure they would gladly avail themselves, could they see the results of the gifts of others.

ODE TO PSYCHOLOGY CLASS.

We sat in the class of Psychology,
While time wore wearily on;
Each moment an hour it truly seemed,
Before it bowed out and was gone.

Said Brutus to me, "O! had I a string
Attached to the hand of the clock,
I'd pull the clock's leg, or rather it's hand,
And further reciting I'd block."

The back row, of course, didn't worry a bit,
As their fiery red steeds pranced on;
The front row crouched low for time was so slow—
They felt they were lost and undone.

Meo Periculo.

WHEN THE SEASON'S ENDED.

Beneath the oak-trees on the hillside,
Stood a solitary figure
Looking far across the campus,
The deserted field of battle.
Wrapped in thought he stood and silent,
Silent as the trees about him,
Looking, thinking, still he lingered,
Tho' I spoke to him, inquiring
Why he seemed so full of sadness.
Scarcely noting that another
Stood beneath the oak trees with him,
To himself he murmured sadly,
"It is ended all is over."
"Friend," I cried "what is your meaning,
Has death robbed you of a friendship?"
Still unheeding, he continued,
"All is ended; and no longer
Will we don the canvas jacket;
Will we know the joy of victory;
Will we feel the thrill of battle
Or the wild delight of conflict
With a foe who tries our mettle.
All is over; it is ended."
Thus he spoke, then turned toward me,
Startled, muttering as he saw me,
"Where did you come from—the branches?
I was looking at the campus,
Thinking of a track about it.
Come, it's late, let's go to supper,"
Tho' he tried thus to dissemble;
Trid to hide his strange confusion,
Yet his speech did not deceive me;
In my ears his words were lingering,
"All is over; it is ended.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

The few days of skating were greatly enjoyed by the girls.

The class in English Literature has received twelve additions this term; it is now too large to be comfortably accommodated in the Library.

The Alumnæ club expect to entertain Mrs. Brock, the President of the Penna. Federation of Women's Clubs, at their regular meeting the second Tuesday in March.

The Students' Loan Association is doing a good work and meeting all its financial obligations in spite of the hard times. Miss Jessie Wheeler joined the Association at its last meeting.

Miss Candace Wood, the former head of our Art Department, is spending the winter with her sister in Newark, N. J., and goes daily to New York to attend Mr. Chase's class in portrait painting.

Mrs. T. H. Purdy of Sunbury, treasurer of the Students' Loan Association, attended the quarterly meeting of that Society on Tuesday, January 12, and also attended the meeting of the Alumnæ club in the evening.

The missionary class, under the capable leadership of Miss Sallie J. Van Gundy, has been studying the lives of the most prominent missionaries of the present century. They will next study the work of missionaries of earlier times.

The Freshman Bible Class of the Baptist Sunday School met in the Institute parlors on Jan. 16 to plan their work in Bible for the present term. After transacting this business, the rest of the evening was spent in a pleasant social. The College Girls and Institute Seniors assisted Mrs. Larison in entertaining her class.

Those present at the regular meeting of the Alumnæ in the Institute parlor, Tuesday evening, January 20, enjoyed a rare treat in a lecture by Professor Martin on Browning. He spoke first of the mission of the poet. He is the great realizer and traveler. He can bring and make real to us not only the scenes, customs, and people of distant lands, but he can open up a new world to us in the realm of the imagination. He compared him also to a harp, upon which may be played for us the songs of the famous singers of the past. Thus Browning brings to us the song of David in his wonderful poem, "Saul." He spoke of the obscurity and occasional grotesqueness of Browning, and likened him to a beautiful cathedral. On the outside are the gargoyles, up under the eaves, sometimes grotesque and rudely carved. But why should one fix his eyes upon these, and be blind to the lofty spires, the magnificent mass as a whole, or the noble interior, with its rich carvings and beautiful pictures? He passed in rapid review a number of Browning's best known poems, and ended by saying that as Tennyson was the poet of faith, Browning was the poet of hope, making real in this age of science and materialism the things of the soul. At the close of the lecture, Mrs. Larison paid a well deserved tribute to Professor Martin himself.

ACADEMY NEWS.

The time of meeting of the Y. M. C. A. has been changed from 9:00 to 6.30 P. M., Tuesday evenings.

We have welcomed five new students this term. All classes are quite large and the students are doing good work.

Miss Armitage is well pleased with the progress of the students who intend to take part in "She Stoops to Conquer." They expect to give it by the end of this term.

The members of Adelphia gave a "Mock Trial" Thursday, January 21. The Institute is ladies were invited. This act should arouse interest, not only in that society but also in Hermenia.

Every day we see that man needs a companion. One student, who is not fortunate enough to attract one of the gentler sex, has taken unto himself a dog and upon it he showers all his dearest affections.

Some have stopped their subscriptions to the Mirror. Is it because they cannot afford to pay a dollar and a half, or do they no longer wish to remain in touch with Bucknell? If the names were published you would be surprised to see what class of students has done so. One finds them anxious to appear wealthy, or rather sporty. But this is only one of many acts that show how superficial they are. To seem, and not to be, is their aim. The paper is not worth the money, do we say? Undoubtedly our judgment goes beyond that of the college professors and students! The paper is the best we have, let us support, and perhaps make it better.

PERSONALS.

As many of the subscribers of the Mirror are still in arrears with their subscription, the manager would be greatly obliged if such could find it possible to settle the same on or before February 6, when the term of the present management expires. B. F. Thomas.

'75. Mr. D. P. Higgins, whose term as County Treasurer will soon expire, is said to be a candidate for Postmaster at Lewisburg.

'77. It has been reported for some time past that Mr. C. J. Wolfe, the druggist, expects to build on his lot opposite the Seminary next spring.

'78. Dr. Joceph E. Perry has just entered upon another year as Principal of Peddie Institute.

'82. Dr. Milton G. Evans, who delivered the Oration before the Literary Society last Commencement, was among other Bucknell Alumni in attendance at the Ministers Conference held in the Old Tabernacle Church, Phila., Jan. 11.

'84. Howard H. Baldrige, of Omaha, Neb., is spending some time at his home in Hollidaysburg. Mr. Baldrige was here during last Commencement.

'91. Rev. A. Lincoln Moore is pastor of the Spruce St. Baptist Church, Phila.

'93. Professor Arthur Gardner, of Keystone Academy, took a post-graduate course at Cornell last year.

'94. Mr. Calvin is professor of mathematics in Manchester College, Indiana.

'94. Mr. Harvey L. Fassett has been the Professor of Science at Peddie Institute since leaving Bucknell.

'—Ex-Pres. Hill is now filling the chair of English Literature at Harvard College.

EXCHANGE.

No college in England publishes a college paper.

Daniel Webster was editor of the first college paper in the United States.

The University of Berlin, the largest in the world, has an enrollment of 8,343 students.

Cornell has dispensed with Greek and Latin as requisites for the degree of Bachelor of Arts.

The Student has many interesting features. Its selection of literary matter shows taste; its length of productions is proportional to prominence of subject. As a college journal it ranks among the best.

Said the whiskered "med"
To the fair "co-ed,"
"I'm like a ship at sea—
Exam's are near,
And I much fear
I will unlucky be."
Then murmured she,
"A shore I'll be,
Come, rest, thy journey o'er."
Then darkness fell,
And all was well,
For the ship had hugged the shore.—Ex.

In all the Universities of France there exist no college periodicals, no glee clubs, no classes, no fraternities, no athletics, no commencements.

Many of the college journals came to us dressed in beautiful holiday attire. These contain many pretty poems and interesting articles on Christmas:

A box of powder,—
A pretty girl.
A little rain,—
Away it goes,—
A red haired girl,
With a freckled nose.

FEBRUARY 10, 1897.

WITH the present issue, the work of the MIRROR board which has served since last September will come to an end. Our task has been in many respects very pleasant, and it is with a sense of regret that we close our labors, our work incomplete, unsatisfactory. Our opportunities have been large, but our limitations, especially as to time, have deterred us from realizing anything like the fulfillment of our ideals as to what a College Journal should be. Our best wishes go with the incoming board. We hope they may be able to advance the standing of the paper so that every student and friend of Bucknell will be proud of his College Journal. They shall have our help and appreciation, and we believe they will, likewise, receive the hearty support of the whole school.

THE Week of Prayer was observed in our College and it has left behind one of the greatest changes in the student life of our school that we have ever known. It would be unfair not to mention this as the greatest factor in the social life at Bucknell. Studies, football, basketball, baseball, athletics in general, the literary societies, the glee club, the publication boards, are all of them means of activity which, rightly participated in, bring great results in the life of the College and of the individual. But that which, judging from results, adds most to a man's moral tone, and leads him to an exalted feeling of brotherhood and a realization of responsibilities, is the Christian faith. So, even from a standpoint of merely practical benefit, if nothing else, Bucknell has reason to rejoice over the results of the recent meetings.

OUR school work is a real, practical business. It requires constant drudgery. It develops the sterner parts of our nature. The factor of idealization is left to be developed by the student himself, yet it is no less a part of a complete education than that firmer structure which we are daily building. The student who does not idealize, who does not give play to his imagination, but confines himself to the so called realities, is not a student in the high sense of the term. Would that our school were completely dominated by students of lofty ideals and high sentiments. As it is, there is an abundance of low sentiment and "jokism," which a high ideal of virtue will not permit, for it is death to dignity of character.

WHO is able to tell what is in a man until he has been brought to the crucial test? External appearances are delusive, apparent knowledge of persons is delusive; the greatest and best qualities of our fellows are those which lie deep beneath the surface and are seldom seen. We should, therefore, be careful about our judgements, and remember that the greatest man is he who, instead of finding a fault, can bring out a virtue. There are many hidden talents in our University, more valuable than we know, waiting for the touch of some master hand to bring them forth.

ODE TO A DANDELION BLOOMING IN DECEMBER.

Fluffy little thing!
Did the merry cricket
Hiding 'neath the thicket
Whisper it was Spring?

Is your lovely cup
Set for bees to sup?
Did sprites neglect to waken you
And thus deprive you of the dew,
Which so becomes your royal crown
That shimmers o'er the em'rald down?

No fire flies twinkle
Nor glow worms winkle,
This fine December day,
Almost like dreamy May.
Methinks it was belated thunder
That rous'd you from enchanted slumber,
To take a farewell peep
Before your winter's sleep.

Mayhap you heard birds sing,—
"No snow upon the hills;"
And winter's welkin ring;—
"No ice across the rills."
You'll soon find Boreas blow
With sleet and snow;
You'll soon see warblers fly
And all flow'rs die.

Tho' morn is bleak,
You look quite meek;
But lift your starry face,—
The painted leaves can trace
A little color there,
To tinge your amber hair.

But late, the dainty asters stood,
Fair hostesses in purple hood;
Now sumach's bright ambush,
Is rife with song of thrush,
That welcomes you
Beneath the blue
Of saphire skies,
And liquid eyes
Of Daphne's shade
In laurel glade.

Shine on! bright golden flow'r
The stars outvie;
Bestow your wanton dow'r
Without a sigh;
Gleam o'er the plumy heath
And dusty ways;
To lonely fens bequeath
Your silver sprays!

But you have ventur'd late
To open winter's gate,
Upon a hinge of gold,
Clear crystals to behold.

N. P. E.

STUDENT LIFE AT VASSAR.

One of the first things that a Bucknell student would notice at Vassar would be the entirely different atmosphere that envelopes the college life. This is due to the fact that it is exclusively a girls' school. At a co-educational school, the girls are, in many ways, restrained by the presence of their class brothers. They must wait for them to take the lead in many things that the girls, in a school where there are no men, can do for themselves.

One of these things is the matter of government. The system of Student Control gives the life at Vassar a shading different from that of Bucknell. Vassar is a miniature republic. The students have their own organization, constitution, and officers elected by popular vote. It must not be supposed, however, that this organization is opposed to the advice of the faculty. On the contrary the students have warm friends in the, faculty, and it is only because the girls have proved themselves eager to support the honor of their Alma Mater that the privilege of governing themselves has been granted to them.

The three requirements of each student are, out-door exercise every day, attendance upon Sunday service at College and evening chapel on weekdays, and retiring at ten o'clock each night, except three times a month, when one can "cut" as long as she desires. The girls acknowledge these regulations to be just and wise, and keep them in good faith, as a matter of honor.

Out-door exercise is not a bugbear, for there are many ways of taking it. Beautiful walks on the campus and through the surrounding country abound. The girl who plays tennis exerts her energies on the fine clay courts, while the enthusiastic bicyclist explores unknown country roads, and the amateur oarswoman spends an hour on the pretty little lake.

The attention given to physical culture shows good results in the strong, healthy girls who are full of life and spirit and well prepared to endure the strain laid upon them in the development of the highest womanhood. For the Vassar girl does not forget that the purpose of her being in college is to become a symmetrical woman. Thus, while giving attention to the physical she does not neglect the intellectual, but brings life and vigor into this, perhaps the most important branch of her education. The intellectual life is strengthened not only by the class-room work but also by the many fine lectures given by prominent men.

Vassar does not wish her daughters to be "digs," but rather girls who find enjoyment in social intercourse,and join it to their other work. It would be a strange girl who could not find benefit in some of the pretty social customs of Vassar. Prominent among these one would notice the Sophomore party to the Freshmen; or one of the Hall plays awaited with such excited expectancy; or a carnival on the ice when the bonfires light up the lake and cast fantastic shadows of the groups of merry skaters; or the Mohawk Lake trip, with the heavy barges carrying their loads of light-hearted girls to the beautiful lake in the mountains; or even the group of friends in a room, one stirring the compound that is to result in that delicious discovery, "Vassar fudges," while the others sing dear Vassar songs, "Alma Mater," "Vassar Female College," "There's only one College in this world for me," and many others until the "fudges" are done. Each of these gatherings has its function, social training.

To complete the chain of development is the link of religious training. This is not thrust upon the girls, but from the chapel service during the week, the sermon on Sunday, and the prayer-meeting of the Young Woman's Christian Association, each girl is taught the necessity of being true to oneself and to one's higher principles.

So we see that Vassar life is composite. It has many phases, bound together by the influence that one exerts over another, but all have for a common purpose the training of the girls in such a way that the principles and ideals of the founder of the College may be realized, and that Vassar graduates may be in their daily life examples of the noblest womanhood.

Clarissa Fowler, Ex-'99.

AS IT OCCURRED.

The story I told the other morning at the club has caused such comment, and has been so misunderstood, that I consider it only fair to myself to make a written statement of what actually took place; then each one can judge for himself. At least if what I relate is not true, I am not aware that anything else occurred.

I must admit that I did spend the evening in town with a very spirited company, and that when I started for the "hill" it was rather late. Just how late I do not know,but it must have been some time after midnight. Not wishing to make my way up the steep path in its present slippery condition, I went around by the Seminary. The wind was blowing an exhilarating blast from a clear sky. The moon was shining—big and bright as the last dollar I had spent—and its inspiring companionship, along with the proximity of the slumbering Sem., filled my heart with noble emotions, and beautiful sentiments welled in my breast. Just as I reached the corner of the Laboratory,I was startled by a loud thumping on the window overhead. I looked up. Those beautiful sentiments stopped welling right there, and skurried back into the depths of my soul like so many frightened mice. At the window stood a white and grey figure waving frantically at me and fumbling at the latch. It was one of the late gentlemen sojourning in No. 19, Front, who evidently was trying to attract my attention. I assumed what I considered a first class impromptu look of nonchalance, and waited while he raised the window. Up it went after some obstinacy, and the wind catching the muslin cloth nearly tore it from his shoulders. But resolutely drawing it about him, he called out in the voice of a deranged Æolian harp: "Young man, will you do me a favor?"

"Ye-es," I said dubiously. He did not seem to notice the reluctance of the assent and I was glad,for his face lighted up with a phosphorescent glow that did my heart good.

"All right," he shouted, "I can't hear very well up here; those fellows have cut my good ear off. Just wait a minute till I get my heart and liver and some other things off the table and I'll be right down."

In a minute he was again at the window with his detached organs in his hands.

"Do you think you can ketch'em?"

I was not exactly anxious to "ketch'em;" but, as I was getting accustomed to the uncanny situation and did not want to offend the poor corpse, I said I would try; and removing my hat—as is proper in the presence of the dead—I held it out so the deceased could drop the parts in question into it.

Down they came, one by one, and while I busied myself arranging them in a neat row on the steps, the rest of the remains hoisted himself over the window-sill and jumped to the ground. He picked himself up, readjusted the piece of muslin, and came towards me.

Handling the bric-a-brac on the steps was nothing to the presence of this ghastly figure, wrapped in the scanty folds of the light muslin that clung around his scrawny form revealing the details and defects of his person with startling distinctness. My nerve almost deserted me, but making a desperate effort to be cordial I asked as cheerily as I could: “Well, how is life--pardon me, death treating you nowadays?”

“Shamefully,” said he, counting his effects to see that nothing had been left behind.

“Why, what's the matter?” I asked, trying to turn the noticeable quaking of my voice into a tremor of solicitude.

“What's the matter! Everything's the matter. There's no pleasure in death at all,” he broke out vehemently. “It's bad enough to have to die in the poor house with no friends to take care of you till you get onto the ropes, but to have happened to you what I have is enough to make any self-respecting corpse want to be alive again. Why it's a disgrace, Sir! I never heard of treating a body the way they have me. The very first thing they did when I died was to squirt my veins all full of red lead. Think of that! Why it just broke my heart. I'd like to know what dead man's heart wouldn't break when it was pumped full of red lead. But that was only a starter. I never heard of treatment like I've had here.”

“You seem to be all cut up by it,” I ventured sympathetically.

“Cut up? Well I should say so! Just see here,” said he, taking off the top of the French woman's skull he had borrowed for a hat and letting the flaps of his scalp fall down over his face. “That's a nice way to go round, aint it? Suppose I meet a lady and raise my hat—why she'd never speak to me again as long as I'm dead. And look at that row on the steps. Why pretty soon I won't have any piece left at all.”

“Well, why don't you do something for yourself,” I suggested, “you seem to be a man of parts.”

“That's just what I'm going to do, and I want you to help me. This is the first night the wind has been blowing hard enough for me to talk. You see since my lungs were cut out I have to get pressure somewhere, and that's why I stand this way and hold this cloth open in front.” There was a momentary lull in the wind and only uncouth moaning and rattling came from the weird figure. Then, as a fresh blast gave him back his voice, he added, a dry little ghost of a smile gliding over his face, “You see I am like these politicians, the way I talk depends on how the wind blows. But what I want to know is if you won't help me get into a grave over there in the cemetery. There is a nice fresh one just dug today, and if I could get into that I'd be settled for death. Do you know, it just makes my heart jump—jumped clear off the table the other night; I told it to be still, but it wouldn't, hearts never do, and then I had to go over and hold it down so it wouldn't break itself worse than it is—yes Sir, it just makes my heart jump to look over there at those mounds and tombstones and everything and see how nice those folks are fixed. The accomodations where I am don't suit a body at all. The room isn't so bad but I can't say I like the board. And then a dead man don't feel right till he's buried, leastwise an old fellow like me. That young man up there has no idea how a corpse ought to behave. He's been spooning with the French lady's skeleton ever since he came and don't seem to care much about having a grave of his own—unless he could take her with him. But I'm different. I didn't have a very good time in life, and now I can't stand being picked at by those youngsters. Of course you may not think the bottom of a grave is a very nice place to stay, but I never heard that any body ever complained after he got down to it.”

“My friend,” I said feelingly, “I'm very sorry I can't help you, but I should hate to break up a funeral by putting you in that grave you speak of.”

“Fune—fune—wh-o-o,” and the old fellow's vicarious voice died in a prolonged whistle.

What he wanted to say I can not tell, for the abating wind left him dumb. To his beseeching gestures I shook my head and tried to explain that graves are private property and are not intended for the first corpse that happens to crawl into them. Finally a look of determination came over his face and, gathering up his belongings, he started towards the cemetery. As I watched the lone, sad figure growing indistinct in the distant shadows, a gust of wind swept past, and I heard that strange, weird voice once more, and it was singing—yes, my straining ear caught the faint words of the dear old song:

"If a body meet a body—"

AIM HIGH.

There is at the present time a tendency on the part of most instructors, especially those in the public schools, to instil into the minds of the pupils the idea of aiming high. There are mottoes on the walls of almost every school room something like this: "Nothing is impossible to him who wills." Every director who comes into the school speaks on mottoes like this; they point to the pictures of Washington, Grant, and Garfield, and draw wonderful lessons from them. Now this motto is a lie and its influence is pernicious.

In the first place, its influence is evil because it spoils good servants. The time is passed when a family can hire an American servant girl. Not that there are none, but their spirit will not submit to being "bossed." Not that the education she may have obtained would hinder her, but the idea received at school is not in accord with that of being a hired girl. She has been told she may be a mistress if she only wills and aims high. The result is a poor imitation of a lady and a miserable servant. The poor American girls will not work in the factories, deeming it below the aim or ideal they received while at school. It is not the education but the spirit with which it is taught that has caused the evil.

At every graduation and school exhibition we hear the speeches of the boys glowing as it were with the ideas of ambition. The girls talk about "woman's rights" when they do not know how to bake a pie. Every boy has been told by his mother he can, if he wills, be President of the Union, or at least Governor of the State.

Every country bumpkin and city one as well has learned the pretty, musical falsehood of Longfellow:

> "Lives of great men all remind us,
> We can make our lives sublime,
> And departing leave behind us
> Foot prints on the sands of time."

This is a falsehood, prettily said, but a falsehood nevertheless. The lives of great men all remind us that they have made their lives sublime, but it is no assurance that we can make ours like theirs. If proof is wanted, go to the cemetery filled with men who had ambitions in life, who had dreams of fame and honor; but where are their foot prints on the sands of time? They died, were buried and are forgotten, simply because they were not endowed by their Maker with power to become the world's leaders. Of all those who in the schools dreamed of fame, honor, and position, not one in twenty thousand was ever heard of outside his own native village.

The country has need to lament this kind of doctrine. The rush for office which is seen at the present time at Canton shows that men think that to be successful in life they must leave their store, their usual place of business, and get an office that they may have social position. It is but an outgrowth of the instruction to aim high. The consequence is that the pursuit of office is the work of little men. In the scramble for official position many fools are so successful that men of dignity retire from the contest. Everybody wants to be "something," and so men leave their proper place in the world and get into places for which they were never intended.

A glance at the Legislature of the State will show in some measure what I mean. The men occupying seats there, many of them, are no more fit than children to make the laws of a great commonwealth, to deal with questions which only the wisest can understand. Many have hardly read the Constitution of the United States. They are there, a set of "nobodies" to become "somebodies."

What is needed in this country is the dissemination of sounder notions of life. Boys and girls are bred to discontent. Everybody is aiming high, and everybody, almost, is missing what they aim at. Humble employments are held in contempt, common life is discounted, and altogether it makes the youth a discontented set. One half of the world's unhappiness grows out of the fact that men are out of their place. There is room for improvement in the situation.

THE HAIR.

In nothing has the caprice of Fashion been more strikingly displayed than in the various forms which the taste of different countries and ages has prescribed for disposing of the covering of the head with which nature has wisely provided us.

Hair on the head of man has always been one of his chief ornaments; on the face, it lends character and dignity to the individual.

The hair was always an object of admiration to the ancients, especially to the Hebrews. Many instances are given in history which go to show that the Jewish race was particularily fond and indeed justly proud of its hair.

Joseph, when a young man and about to be presented at the court of Pharaoh, was required to trim his hair and shave his face.

Aaron wore a long beard all the days of his life, which no doubt gave him exceeding trouble by trailing in his consomme. But all the Israelites gazed upon his whiskers and trembled.

Absalom was a very swagger young Hebrew, who spent more time combing his raven locks than he did in studying his Sunday School lesson; he, therefore, got into trouble. The early demise of this illustrious young man is largely attributed to his luxuriant growth of hair. It was to him "a thing of beauty," if not "a joy forever." The manner in which he was called away is said to have given rise to that timely and time-worn phrase, "all is lovely when the goose hangs high."

Samson is another of the Hebrew children who grew an immense crop of hair. The color of Samson's hair we have been unable to ascertain; but he had a friend among the Philistines—a young lady who was a "strawberry blonde." Before Samson had known this young lady any great length of time, she went into the tonsorial business. Several times Samsom had some very close shaves at her establishment, but he remained at the old stand until he had a hair cut that did not suit him. "This was the most unkindest cut of all." But Samson's capillary appendages grew again, and he settled his barber bill and several other outstanding accounts by giving an exhibition at the Temple which "brought down the house."

The Hebrews were very fond of plaiting their hair. This they learned from the Egyptian ladies who congregated about the court of Pharaoh, and also from the Arabian women who were very careful, indeed, to keep their shining tresses nicely arranged, and adorned with ribbons and ornaments of gold.

These Egyptian beauties were fond of gliding down the stream in their splendid barges, while zephyrs, sweet presage of the coming night, soft as a beautiful dream on a weary brain, kissed their lovely faces; and, as the gentle breezes played with their silken tresses, they gave utterance to their satisfaction in their attar scented course.

This picture has been presented simply to show the reader how the course of Empire of the different nations that have come in contact with Egypt, has been changed. Many are the noted leaders of men who have gazed upon this scene, and then ended their days along the Nile.

THE SCOTCH COVENANTER.

Ah, fair was the land in dreamy repose,
With the green of the hawthorn, the blush of the rose;
And soft was the breeze which at sunset would blow
Where the stream echoes on with a musical flow.

And sweetly the skylark would carol his glees
As he rose on swift wings o'er the green, verdant leas,
And higher he soared till he passed from the view,
And the song of a cherub came out of the blue.

And oft as I roamed by the murmuring rill,
I would list to its flow in the eves calm and still,
As it rushed from the dingle shade crystal and cold
And rippled in music o'er shallows of gold.

Low and faint there were borne on the air through the gloom
The hum of the wheel and the sound of the loom,
And the chirp of the linnet as homeward it flew
To its heather down nest through the silence and dew.

Far overhead Pleiades shone like the eyes
Of angels of light looking down from the skies;
And lovingly Cynthia smiled on the eves,
Slanting lances of silver atween the green leaves.

On a quiet June Sabbath I climbed the tall hill
Which rose by the forest so verdant and still,
And gazed o'er the land which so richly seemed blest
With no trumpet's alarm to disturb its sweet rest.

Over summit and valley there rested a calm
Which soothed the sad spirit within like a psalm.
When the belfries rang out their wild, runic rhymes
Their notes drifted seaward in musical chimes.

From out the green valleys and hawthorn grown braes
Came the people, the infinite Father to praise,
And sweetly the symphonies rose on the air
Like the voices of angels assembled in prayer.

Ah, who would have thought that over our land
Which nature had blest with a bountiful hand,
The black cloud of war should hang like a pall,
And the cohorts of Death should glide through our halls?

For over our land in fury and power
Came the Southron with legions to blast and devour;
Where were songs of content in the morn's ruddy glow,
In the evening were heard but the dirges of woe.

All is silent and still on the rose scented lawn,
Where laughter and mirth were heard at the dawn;
And the voices of children who played by the rill
Are echoed no more, and forever are still.

The mavis still sings in the green hawthorn bowers,
Like a spirit of joy through the day's sunny hours;
And the breeze whispers still through the harp as of old,
But the hands of the harper forever are cold.

The voices of loved ones, the noblest of earth,
Shall cheer me no more by the desolate hearth;
The friends who would greet me when labor was done,
All vanished together, like mist in the sun!

All kindred and friends, like a swift fleeting breath,
Forever are wrapt in the silence of death;
I hear no sweet voice with a magical thrill,
But a host of sad mem'ries are haunting me still.

UNIVERSITY MISSION SERVICES.

The week of special evangelistic effort has passed, but its effects remain with us. How far reaching these have been and shall be, we cannot fully realize now, but that the entire University has received a mighty spiritual uplift can not be doubted. A brief summary of the events of that week of blessing will be in place at this time, in order that all who participated in them may be accurately informed of all the definite results, and also in order that the friends of the University may be made aware of the results and the events which conspired to bring them about. We may well stop to ask, "What hath God wrought?"

All told, nineteen distinct meetings were held, beginning with the convocation of workers in Bucknell Hall, on Sunday afternoon, January 24, and closing with the service in the Baptist church on Sunday evening, January 31. On Monday evening, January 25, three separate meetings were conducted under the auspices of the three Christian Associations of the University. At these services stress was placed upon the equipment for service.

On Tuesday evening, Dr. Lincoln Hulley delivered an address in Bucknell Hall on the subject of Repentance. On Wednesday afternoon, at 4:00 o'clock, another service was held in Bucknell Hall, Rev. Raymond Davis and Dr. Leroy Stephens being in charge.

On Thursday, the annual Day of Prayer for colleges, four services were held: At 8:00 a. m., in Bucknell Hall, Rev. Raymond Davis delivered an address; at 10:30 a. m., in the Baptist church, Dr. Harris delivered a powerful sermon on the subject of Regeneration; in Bucknell Hall, at 2:00 p. m., Professor Hulley spoke on Faith with convincing power; and at 7:00 p. m. in Bucknell Hall, Rev. Davis addressed the audience.

Three meetings followed on Friday, at 2:00 p. m., 4:00 p. m., and at 7:00 p. m., Rev. J. W. Weddell in charge. Three meetings followed on Saturday, at 10:30 a. m., 2:00 p. m., and 7:00 p. m. These meetings were also conducted by Bro. Weddell, who continued in charge on Sunday, in the morning in the Baptist church, in the afternoon in Bucknell Hall, closing the series on Sunday evening.

The results may be recorded briefly under three heads. First: Those who took a definite stand for Christ. Second: A revival of righteousness and a deepening of the spiritual life in the lives of the Christian students and professors, and Third: The increased interest and confidence of the patrons of the University in its religious standing.

Under the head of those who took a definite stand for Christ, we are glad that we are able to record fourteen, two of whom belong to the College, seven to the Academy and five to the Institute.

Concerning the second head no definite or particular account can be given here, except that it should be remarked that the results are great and beyond expectation. In this regard they are in a measure unseen. Yet they are just as potent for good as the clearly revealed results.

Unto whom belongs the praise? We would say first of all: "To God be the glory." We would not fail to mention in this connection Dr. Harris, Revs. Weddell and Davis, and Professor Hulley, all of whom made the extended series of meetings possible.

The character of the meeting in point of method and permanence of results was of the highest order. No superficial work was done. Wisdom and prudence were marked features in all personal work. Full recognition was accorded to the Holy Spirit's office. This is a brief account of the work, which it is hoped will continue.

ATHLETICS.

The first basket ball game, played with the Danville Y. M. C. A. team, resulted in a victory for Bucknell. The game was characterized by the fast play of the home team, showing endurance, and by plays on the part of Danville which denoted good drilling in the fine points of the game.

The teams lined up as follows:

BUCKNELL.		DANVILLE.
Wassell, (Weymouth)	center	Heinmann.
Smith, Catterall,	guards	Berckbill, Hoffner.
Weymouth, (Garner) Mulkie,	forwards	Marks, Gaskins.

Umpires, Elliot and Douglas. Referee, Garner, (Warren). Score, Danville 8; Bucknell 18.

The baseball goods are now here and candidates for the team have the opportunity of practicing in the cage as a preparation for out door work.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Do not forget the Literary Societies.

Indoor practice for baseball has begun.

The Sigma Chi Fraternity recently gave a ball.

The gymnasium drills are being well attended.

Registrar Gretzinger has returned again after a few days absence.

Business Manager Kunkle is hustling the University Song Book.

Gymnasium drills were suspended on account of the week of prayer.

Messrs. Kunkle and Flint recently held revival meetings at Elimsport.

Elliot, '98, has returned to school after suffering from a severe illness.

The home of Pres. Harris was recently made happy by the arrival of a son.

Mr. R. M. Ivins, '99, has been ill with La Grippe, but is convalescent.

Rees, 1900, is at present occupying the infirmary. We hope he may have a speedy recovery.

Messrs. Hazen, Hall, and Davis have been holding some very successful meetings at Pine Grove.

Joseph Carey, '95, was present at Miss White's recent entertainment, "Flirts and Matrons," in Bucknell Hall.

The recent snow has afforded great pleasure to some of the students, who could daily be seen riding through the town.

The arrangements for lighting the gymnasium with electricity have been completed; there are two arc lamps for the upper part, and a number of incandescents for the dressing rooms.

Dr. Perrine will deliver the eulogistic oration at Peddie Institute, on Founder's Day. In the evening he will preside at the annual banquet which is to take place in the new Peddie dining hall.

The catalogue for 1896-'97 has come out. It shows the number of students in the various departments of the University to be 424. Several new courses have been added to the curriculum.

On the evening of January 23, the students of the University enjoyed a very pleasant time at an Appellation Social given by the Christian Endeavor Society of the Baptist church. The program consisted of writing and reading poetry by various groups. The company, on assembling, was divided into sixteen parts, given the name of an apple and forty minutes in which to compose a poem concerning it. The first prize, consisting of an excellent apple pie, was given to group No. 13, composed of Mrs. Leroy Stephens, Misses Merriman, Pretzman, and Crawford, Messrs. Hall, Hazen, Fithian, and G. M. Davis. The poem is as follows:

LADY SWEET.

Where have you been my Lady Sweet,
With cheeks so red and tresses neat?
I fear from me you've strayed away,
I've seen you not for one long day.

The birds to me their songs have sung,
The purling brooks have onward run;
The trees o'er me have cast their shade,
My thoughts from thee have never strayed.

Though I have looked for thee all day,
Now clouds and trouble pass away,
My heart with joy and rapture burns,
For Lady Sweet to me returns.

Poem No. 9 took second prize and is as follows:

THE SPITZENBURG.

In the orchard over the hill,
Near the quaint, old water-mill,
Grew an apple, I love it still,
The mellow and juicy Spitzenburg.

One golden day in early Fall,
Came a lonely robin's call,
Out of the topmost branches tall,
Of that grand old tree, the Spitzenburg.

While there together, long we stood,
When my darling Nell I woo'd;
And ever since I love that good,
That rare winter apple, Spitzenburg.

Some the Russet may choose in Spring,
Malden's Blush, or Spy, or King,
Baldwin, or Rambo, or anything,
Give me my love, and a Spitzenburg.

THE "MOOT COURT" AND THE LITERARY SOCIETY.

College societies have lately taken up as a pleasant offset to their literary programs, the "Moot Court" or "Mock Trial." Members impersonate the court officials and carry the case,—generally one peculiarly interesting,—through its various stages, until the verdict is given and judgment pronounced.

To some, perhaps, it may seem to diverge from the original and generally accepted conception of a literary society. But if the aim of such a society is to secure a well rounded mental development, is not this reproduction of court life worthy of its attention? Interest can be maintained only when variety of program renders monotony impossible. A delightful diversion is the Moot Court, combining pleasure with profit. Court procedure is presented in such a way as to familiarize the student with it. Rapid thinking and concentration of the mind on the subject at hand become necessary. The importance of these the student can easily realize,—especially in extemporaneous speaking. Lawyers must be keen of argument, quick of wit. By the judge and jury must the facts be weighed and evidence clarified, —hence the importance of quick perception and discrimination. The insight it gives into the judicial organism, together with plenty of fun and opportunities to assert individuality, renders the Moot Court popular, and entitles it to a place of its own in literary societies.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Josephine Garrett of Williamsport has been visiting her cousin, Miss Gertrude Grant.

Miss Edith Phillips spent Sunday, January 31, at the home of Miss Mary Kline of Winfield.

The Rev. M. L. Ross and his daughter Margaret, class of '96, dined at the Institute, January 17.

The musical department is so large that it has been found necessary to engage Miss Grace Pretzman of Millersville as an assistant teacher.

Our library has been greatly improved this year by new chairs. The light is also very much better since we have the Wellsbach burners.

The Class of '95 has two representatives here at present, Miss Florence Stoner, visiting Mrs. Gretzinger, and Miss Laura Fague, visiting Miss Mary Owens.

Miss Mary Youngman recently called at the Institute and her many friends here were delighted to see that she had recovered from the injury she received by being thrown from a bicycle.

Miss Armitage gave a very pleasant reception to the girls of her table Saturday, January 30. The parlors were artistically decorated. The girls and their friends feel very grateful to Miss Armitage for the evening's pleasure.

The week of prayer at Bucknell was indeed a precious season. Many date the begining of a new life from the gospel meetings of that week. Christians were strengthened, and the spiritual atmosphere shows the power of earnest prayer to purify and revivify.

ACADEMY NEWS.

Hermenia has decided to have an open meeting in the near future. The great amount of literary work seems to make the students anxious for some change. What would boys and girls do, if there were no excuses to bring them together?

On account of the meetings Friday, January 29, 1897, some of the boys postponed a drive which they had intended to take, until February 4. The affair was greatly enjoyed by the boys and they have many thanks for the Messrs. Hoffa, at whose home some fleeting hours of the evening were pleasantly spent.

During the meetings in Bucknell Hall, the teachers and students of the Academy showed themselves interested in a great cause. The boys saw how enthusiastic and anxious the professors are for the welfare of their pupils. Nothing is to hinder any one of us from forming a strong character. The right course has been mapped out before us and in our faculty we have good examples.

Some members of the First and Second Forms seem too young and small for study outside of a public school. Miss Bell's interest in her pupils causes her to give an extra hour a day to all students that fail in their recitations. Whether their minds are not strong enough, or whether they desire a guard while at their books is asked by many. It would be well for them to follow the example of the older students.

The "Mock Trial," given by Adelphia was a grand success. The boys invited the faculty and their friends from the Institute. After a well conducted trial, those present withdrew to partake of the delicacies furnished by the society. During this pleasant interval the prosecuting attorney, Mr. Rowe, received many compliments upon his wit, schemes, and powerful arguments. The members are very grateful to the ladies for their kind assistance.

It is to be regretted that the Seniors are liable to give up their great undertaking, "She Stoops to Canquer." Who is to blame? Has not Miss Armitage given us much of her valuable time that we might do something unheard of at the Academy? Has she not been very patient and instructive? Have we not seen her enthusiasm and interest in us? Do we show our appreciation of her efforts by refusing to take part, because the stage of "Music Hall" might pollute us? If we have something worth hearing do we not even go among the slums that we may elevate them? Men of strong, noble character dare appear in other than sacred and holy places, if they may do good thereby.

PERSONALS.

'61. On Friday, January 15, 1897, occurred the death of Miss Emily Harrison, daughter of Col. Wm. H. Harrison, at her home, 39th and Chestnut Sts., Philadelphia. Miss Harrison was a frequent visitor in Lewisburg at the home of her grand parents, Mr. and Mrs. Peter Beaver. Her many Lewisburg friends share the sorrow of her parents in the loss of so talented a daughter and so kind a friend. Mr. and Mrs. Harrison are both graduates of Bucknell.

'72. Rev. J. H. Chambers, after a pastorate of over seven years at West Chester, Pa., has handed in his resignation but the church has refused to accept it.

'85. Rev. J. M. Hare has been reappointed a member of the Excise Board of Burlington, N. J.

'86. H. Grant Dreisbach has been nominated by the citizens of Lewisburg for School Director.

Ex-'88. Rev. E. T. Derr, of Leville, O., has accepted a call to Royersford, Pa.

'88. Prof. Lincoln Hulley baptized seventeen Sunday, January 31, at the Immanuel Tabernacle, Baltimore, Md.

'89. Wm. C. Gretzinger has been selected to deliver the Oration before the Alumni of Perkiomen Seminary on Commencement Day.

'89. Rev. J. M. Ashton has accepted a call to Chester, Vermont.

'94. During the present pastorate of Rev. Chas. F. McMann, at Lancaster, about one and one-half years, eighty-five members have been received, fifty by baptism and thirty-five by letter and experience. The pastor is still pursuing his studies in the Reformed Theological Seminary at Lancaster, and expects to graduate at the coming commencement in May.—Ex.

'94. "Mr. Robert B. Davidson seemed to be the 'leading attraction' with the University of Chicago Musical Clubs in their recent holiday trip. At the time of their appearance here, 'Bobby,' both by his musical talent and excellent comedy, captured the Cornell College student heart."

Col. Chas. H. Banes, of Philadelphia, Trustee from '82 to '91, died in Philadelphia, January 15, 1897, aged 65 years.

Hon. Chas. F. Abbot, of Philadelp'ii ι, a Trustee from 1863 to 1882, died at his home, January 15, 1897, aged 75 years.

Among the signers of the big petition presented by Senator Cameron before the Senate, a petition formulated and signed by one hundred of the representative citizens of Philadelphia, advocating the passing of the Arbitration Bill, was the name of Mr. Craige Lippincott, well known at Bucknell.

If some cloud, dark and drear,
  Hide the sun's bright face,
Bringing darkness, cold and gray,
  Making earth a dreary place,
Would you be forlorn
  Or shed a tear?
With the coming morn
  The sun's bright ray is near.

If some cloud, dark and drear,
  Hide the brightness of thy soul,
Must you cease to pray
  Because you see no goal?
Must you be forlorn
  Or shed a tear?
With the coming morn
  Love's bright ray is near.

Africa can boast of having the smallest as well as the largest educational institution in the world. The smallest has five students and fifteen instructors; the largest, situated at Cairo, Egypt, has 10,000 students.

True college spirit is an evidence of a broad mind. Not every one can be an orator, nor an athlete, nor a musician, but everyone can and ought to have an interest in the different phases of college life. Ability to sympathize with all kinds of work and activities should be the result of a liberal education.—College Days.

APOLOGIES? No. We prefer to let our readers expect something and be disappointed, if need be, rather than to assure them of our incompetency and then disappoint them too. The new board of editors take up their task with hope and confidence. They desire to begin just where the preceding board left off, and to raise the standard of the paper to the best of their ability. No retrogression, no standstill, nothing but a decided advance! As editors we ask the assistance of the whole school in making our paper better, by contributing articles or in any possible way, since we are only the representatives of you, the student body. We hope for and expect your hearty co-operation and support. Will you give it?

BASKET ball seems to be firmly established as one of the permanent forms of athletics at Bucknell. The victory of our team over the University of Pennsylvania has brought the game into special prominence among the students. It shows us that we are able to compete with other colleges on an equal footing and that our team is well worthy to represent Bucknell in this popular branch of sport. Basket ball gives one quickness of eye, steadiness of hand and lightness of foot. It helps greatly in the attainment of the highest physical development. We welcome it gladly as one of our most pleasurable and profitable games and bespeak for it a warm reception and brilliant future among the students of Bucknell.

WHAT do we look into a mirror for? Is it to see how beautiful we are, to admire and take pride in that beauty, to see if we really are not better looking than we thought, and to assure ourselves that the much dreaded wrinkles and gray hair, unmistakable signs of approaching decay, have not yet made their appearance, and cast their shadows of the coming night? If so, we are sure to be disappointed. Our mirror is nothing, if not true. Try as we may, we cannot deceive ourselves, for our remorseless glass reflects to us a perfect image of our real selves, just as we actually are; every line is brought out boldly and even harshly; every wrinkle, every imperfection of face or form is painfully evident; we see ourselves as others see us. Our mirror is true to nature. In the same way we hope to make our University MIRROR true to student life in all its phases, a faithful reflector of the good and the bad, the right practices as well as the abuses existing at Bucknell. We do not want to be always commended for our virtues, when we have serious faults to correct. It is often a greater kindness to a person to criticise him honestly and sincerely, than to give him undeserved praise or compliment. Let us not be afraid to see ourselves just as we really are, whether we look at beauty or ugliness; then, improve the good, correct the bad.

CLASS spirit has run high among the Freshmen and Sophomores for a few weeks past and they are to be congratulated upon their ability to keep from the old-time, but foolish "class scrap." To some it may seem that this denotes a lack of courage and spirit on the part of the classes, but these should remember that it often takes vastly more courage to control one's temper and rule his spirit than it does to give vent to outbursts of angry passion and fly at the object of his anger tooth and nail. The bully may have the courage to fight, especially if his opponent be smaller, but it takes a man to control his temper. To be honest, does it not seem a great deal like brandishing a red cloth before a bull to see him charge wildly at it, foaming and frothing at the mouth in his furious, but vain endeavors to gore the hated object through and through and stamp it into the earth? Is there not a slight resemblance in the blind fury and angry passion of onset?

It may seem that these tilts among the classes engender a deeper feeling of loyalty, but true class spirit can exist without them. However, if there has been an improvement in this respect, the retrogression in another more than counterbalances it. When members of the rival class in college, along with a number of other College men and Academy students, seize the occasion of a class banquet to become partially intoxicated and make rowdies of themselves, it is a disgrace to the whole school. Such actions are never forgotten by those outside of the school, who witness them. They inflict a deep and permanent injury on the prospects and good name of Bucknell. We cannot too strongly condemn this outgrowth of the recent class banquet, for it is unmistakably a shame and a disgrace.

ONLY A DREAM.

The night was clear and cold. As I closed the shutters preparatory to enjoying my usual reverie, the stars shone brightly upon me.

Drawing a chair to the fire, I propped my feet comfortably on the fender. With that complacency of mind which comes to a man after a hearty supper, I leaned back and dozed, thankful for home, friends, and the solace of my good pipe. From its curls of smoke, friendly faces seemed to beckon me back to college days. Gradually my will yielded to their enticement.

Again I wandered through the dear halls. How familiar it all looked! There walked a grizzled Professor to class with his books under his arm. Close behind came my old chum and I. We were talking up some new plan and consequently late to class. As I took my seat, Prof. looked at me with a stern face. "Mr.—why were you not at chapel?" I can remember how the unusal question startled me, and how relieved he looked when I made adequate answer. "Because, sir, I didn't have my breakfast, and I can't cut it down to less than three minutes." Opening his book, he called on me for the 500th Theorem when—

Scene changed. I was sitting in my old room in East Wing deep in the intricacies of Psychology. I was alone. The hall was nearly deserted, for Uncle Tom's Cabin had favored L—. that night. As my thoughts were getting into a confused maze of the relation of mind and soul, I felt an icy hand laid on my forehead. My heart stood still, my tongue clave to the roof of my mouth. The awful chill from the hand crept through my head, and ran down my back in little shivers. The suspense was maddening. I was about desperate when the hand left me, and —I awoke. Beads of perspiration stood on my brow, and my heart beat like a trip-hammer.

I looked around nervously. "Please, won't you take the baby" brought me down to the ordinary facts of life. My wife stood beside me, her gentle hand resting on my shoulder.

"SO AS BY FIRE."

The soft light of the sinking sun was playing upon the portico of a palace facing the rippling waters of the Bosphorus. It was a stately pile of elaborate Eastern architecture, now occupied by Punjab, the Armenian, a banker of the Turkish Sultan. Upon a divan in all the grace of luxurious ease reclined a fair young girl, of that Armenian type, fascinating alike in beauty of feature and loveliness of expression. The heavy drapery over the door leading from the interior of the house was drawn aside, and with a low salam a servant emerged, immediately followed by a commanding masculine figure, "My Lord, Ahmad Pasha, the Turk, presents his homage to the gracious Olma," murmured the attendant, and quickly retired.

"Surely Allah is propitions," exclaimed the visitor advancing. "What is thy meaning noble Ahmad Pasha?" asked the maiden, a deep flush mantlingher cheek and brow, as she acknowledged his salutation. "Can the fair Armenian whose eyes rival heaven's starry host in their brilliancy, whose hair vies in wealth and lustre with the rich covering of Cashmere's wild goat, and whose cheek bears the tint of the early rose, be so insensible to her charms as to ask 'What is thy meaning Ahmad Pasha?' "

"I fear Mohammed's follower forgets the breach that must now exist between Armenia's daughter and Turkey's son," responded Olma.

"Breach did'st thou say?" interrupted the noble. "By some it may be so considered, but not concerning thee, upon whom the heart of Ahmad Pasha pours forth all its wealth of love." "It grieves me sorely to hear such words from thee," and with the answer came a sigh from the girlish heart.

"Methinks it is not the fashion for damsels to discard their lovers' adoration; indeed, if memory doth not play me false, thy Armenian sisters are especially delighted with such tribute proffered them by the Sultan's officers of rank."

"So thou think'st, Ahmad Pasha, to tickle the fancy of the banker's daughter, by catering to the mistaken weakness of her race?" cried the girl with rising scorn and indignation. "Ah no, arrogant Turk! Thou standest supreme in thy despotic power, in the fond fancy that at thy favoring nod the highest borne of all the Ottoman empire will gladly yield to the amorous advances of a Turkish Pasha. Thou dost sadly err; Armenian Olma is of finer clay than this." "Forgive me lovely maiden; far be it from my purpose to misinterpret the impulses of thy pure soul." "But tell me truly Olma, wilt thou not accept thy Turkish suitor as thy husband, and in him find a champion for thy rights ever at thy side?"

"Doth not the high born noble, the trusted courtier of the mighty Abdul Hamid, debase himself in thus wooing a maiden of that race so hated by his monarch?" Queried Olma in a tone proudly ironical.

"Thou said'st thy people were a hated race; surely fanaticism hath blinded thee!" said the Turk.

"Can'st thou breathe the word fanaticism to me, when every message from my loved Armenia brings tidings of the utmost horror?" And even as she spoke a shudder passed over the delicate form of the excited girl.

"Believe me, my fair idol, these are but groundless tales, or grossly exaggerated by the bitter enemies of the omnipotent 'Commander of the Faithful,'" replied the noble in a reassuring manner.

"'Groundless tales,' Pasha, said'st thou? 'Groundless tales!' would the sister of my honored mother idly disturb the peace of Olma with stories of murder and bloodshed?"

"Methinks thy honored aunt, mistakes the commands of the holy Allah, when she fills these pearly ears, with fables of vile atrocity." His flattery was, however, entirely lost upon the recipient. The crimson of her cheek became a deeper hue, but not that of self-consciousness. Her words became more earnest, and rising from the divan she cast upon the Turk a glance of mingled inquiry and hauteur.

"Why, Ahmad Pasha, is it ill for me to hear of dreadful wrongs, while those as dear to me as life are called upon to suffer them?"

"Surely the rays of Turkey's sun have fired the too ardent blood which courses through our sweet Armenian's veins," continued the courtier.

"No! thrice No! my lord. 'Tis not the influence of the sunbeams that hath quickened the pulses of Olma, but the passion of a filial heart wellnigh breaking for its country's wrong."

"But tell me, gracious damsel," urged the Turk, "what myth, finding its way within these guarded walls, hath so stirred the very fibres of thy being. Doth the blue Bosphorus lying before us yield such ghastly tales?"

"Harken to my story and I defy thee, e'en though a Turkish Pasha, to call the daughter of Punjah a blinded maiden!" was the response.

"'Twas at the midday hour," continued Olma, "when Armenia's plains were bathed in the noontide glow. My uncle, his wife, and happy sons and daughters were seated at their cheerful board, when suddenly a sound was heard without like a pack of Russian wolves. At the next instant, with cries of 'Death to the rascal, we've tracked the fox to his hole,' a band of brutal kurds burst into the room. Seizing my white haired uncle the brigands slew him without mercy. Next they turned upon my innocent cousins. Not satisfied with this the villains bound my helpless aunt, while in a moment every corner of the house blazed with the incendiary's fire. A trusty servant saved her mistress' life at the sacrifice of her own, and now my broken hearted, desolate aunt alone remains to tell the tale. This, Ahmad Pasha, is the myth. Cans't thou then ask love for the supporter of a monarch, who permits his defenseless subjects to be destroyed like this?''

''My fair Olma, thou dost misjudge the character of the peerless Abdul Hamid, who in no wise smiles upon, and was in fact quite ignorant of the chance uprisings of the somewhat unruly kurds.

''A sovereign in truth, worthy of all honor, who cannot acquaint himself more nearly with the actions of the people over whom he rules!'' answered Olma. Her tone was one of sarcasm, yet her glance betokened sorrow.

''Yet believe me,'' continued the Turk, ''by the great Mohammed, the omnipotent 'Commander of the Faithful' lends a willing ear to every suggestion for the improvement of his empire, but can'st thou wonder that he sometimes fails, surrounded as he is by courtiers, each counselling a different policy?'' Consider calmly the position of our Sultan. His enemies call him a coward. Tell me, is it cowardice that makes a man boldly mount a throne, the former occupant of which, his uncle, was foully murdered? When the fleet, a monarch's rightful defense, hath turned traitor to its sovereign lord? When Russia, with relentless cries for bloodshed, compels the Turk to fight? When all the land is rife with treachery and strife? Moreover, when his subjects, as thy Armenian people, refuse to bear their burden in taxation, can he allow these unruly rascals to be unpunished and thus establish a dangerous precedent to be followed by many another state within his vast dominions? Thy people indeed, say the kurds have robbed them at the instigation of the Turkish powers. Can the Sultan give credence to this report in direct opposition to the combined denial of the supporters of his throne?

That Abdul Hamid is fierce and warlike, nay even somewhat overhasty, I will not deny; descent from all the others sends a passion through his veins not understood by common men. But believe me, lovely Olma, our glorious Sultan suffers cruelly, as distrustful of his Ulema he sits monarch of this realm. Blame not, but the rather pity Turkey's ruler in these troublesome times!''

''Doth necessity compel him to be so hampered and suspicious? Are there no worthy courtiers, whose object shall be Turkey's glory and not her shame?'' Urged the girl. Olma was evidently deeply moved, and learning the position she had taken a while before opposite the Turks, she resumed the seat upon the divan.

''Peace, my peerless Olma,'' pleaded the noble. ''In the ardor of his zeal Ahmad Pasha hath surpassed the bounds of gallantry. Surely such words as these are ill suited for thy fragile being.''

''Is it because Olma is a woman that she is deprived the power of independent thought?'' was the reply.

''Gently my beloved maiden; can'st thou not turn from controversy, and give thy mind to happier thoughts. Daughter of the honored Punjah, wilt thou not be mine?'' The words were uttered in a low passionate tone, and the girl turned toward the noble with a look of sad entreaty in her beautiful eyes.

''Speak not thus my honored Pasha! I beseech thee, for the love of heaven, ask not the Armenian maiden to turn traitor to her people.''

''No not traitor, rather saviour'' said the Turk. ''Only trust thyself to me and I will right the wrongs thou said'st are perpetuated against thy people.''

''Pasha, press the matter now no farther, for my soul is pierced with anguish. Yet it seemeth, despite thy Turkish blood, thou hast a noble heart, worthy of a woman's love.''

''Surely Allah is propitious!''

''Loved one, only say thou wilt be mine.'' And as a humble suppliant the proud coutier knelt before her.

''Spare me, bow not thus before the Armenian Olma. In the honor of thy manhood, for the love thou dost profess, urge not the sad, unhappy maiden for her final answer now. Hark! I hear my mother calling. We will meet another time.'' The girl passed within the silken folds which draped the doorway. The Turk stood gazing far across the Bosphorus, and on the twilight breeze there floated the words ''We will meet another time,' yes, and then she must be mine.''

THE PEOPLE SITTING IN DARKNESS.

The words of the ancient prophet
A vivid picture make;
In childhood's times the Scripture lines
Mysterious meaning take.

In years agone I shuddered
At the image that they brought,
For the darkness drear is filled with fear
In the realm of childish thought.

I saw the helpless beings
Crouching in dismal gloom,
And felt the fright of one at night
In solitary room,—

I fancied how the brightness
Of the marvelous "great light"
Would bring surprise and hope to eyes
So long inured to night.

And now the verse seems altered;
I knew the gloom so dense
Enshrouded the soul, the life of the whole,
And not the eye of sense.

But still I see the pagan
Peering into the gloom
Without the light of our hope so bright
Of a life beyond the tomb.

Though centuries have vanished
Since spake the ancient seer,
The Light that first on Israel burst
Hath still new hearts to cheer.

In the "valley of the shadow"
Dwell many millions still.
O, quickly haste, Earth's darkest waste
With God's own light to fill!

PROMOTION.

It was Cromwell who said that none go so far as they who know not whither they are going. His own life was the best illustration of the truth of his maxim. The farmer of Huntingdon became sovereign of England and Arbiter of Europe by doing the duty which lay nearest. If he had not been a superior captain he would not have been made colonel nor would he have been made commander-in-chief, had he not been a good lieutenant. The advance is opened by the step that precedes it, and the end is never in sight. I would name three conditions of promotion. First being worthy of it. Men are usually not advanced because they are not prepared. The poet is true to numberless biographies when he says:

> "The heights of great men gained and kept,
> Were not attained by sudden flight;
> But they while other men have slept,
> Were toiling upward in the night."

The man who is prepared will find or make his opportunity. Not many persons have heard of Choconut, Pa. But the Rector of the little church at Choconut wrote a work which became immediately an authority and has been quoted in the United States senate, in the British partiament, in the Corps Legislatif. It was for the author an honorary docterate of laws from Yale—A second book secured him a full professorship in Harvard. The distance from Choconut to Harvard was only a step for the man who was prepared to take it.

A second condition of advancement is the faithful performance of the present duty. A man must date from somewhere. If his first case is missmanaged, if his first task, of whatever kind, is not well done, it will be hard for him to rise above it. On the contrary if the present task is well done, it not only opens the way to another, but it is a moment in the habit and power of doing well. The world is eager for men who can, but it will accept them only upon the Napoleonic test, what has he done?

Again, a man must not be too modest to accept promotion when it is offered. Much no doubt is lost to the world by the lack of confidence which so many men have. Few work up to the full measure of their powers, because they distrust themselves. Self-conceit is no doubt an evil; but self-distrust is much more common, and is doing the world much greater harm.

DR. HARRIS.

ECHOS FROM THE INSTITUTE LITERATURE CLASS.

What do I think about the sunlight? Why, I cannot answer that question. The mind does not take hold of such an analysis. I can only bask in the sunlight, too contented to speak, and it seems to be unnecessary labor to do anything but lie on the grass and feel lazy and murmur "Go way, you! let me alone."

I don't care where Shakespeare was born. He had to be born somewhere. But he isn't dead yet. Yet somehow, when I read his works, I don't see the man.

I am one of the crowd in a court-room. Near me is Shylock. I know him well. A sinister, bitter smile is on his dark face and his bony hand trembles, now and then opening just enough to resemble an eagle's claw, then the finger-nails dig into the wrinkled palms. He cries excitedly—

"An oath, an oath, I have an oath in Heaven and shall I lay perjury on my soul?

Only a few of us recognize Portia in that black gown and boyish tone. It is a good thing that we have seen her before, else we, too, should be deceived. Of course Bassanio does not know her—"Love is blind."

If there is one trait in Shakespeare which is richest, it is that he knows every man's mind. You recognize an old friend in the man he pictures to you, and now and then see your own face in the mirror he holds up so knowingly. The thought which you have struggled to express appears in the flowers of the language. But it is the thought which you see, not the man, as though he had put his life into words. You are full of emotion as you read a thought in living lines, and when he pictures emotions, you are ecstatic or mournful at his will. Portia has been led on by doubts and fear until Bassanio makes the wise choice. Then her joy seems boundless.

> "How all the other passions fleet to air,
> As doubtful thoughts and rash embraced despair,
> And shuddering fear, and green-eyed jealousy!
> O love, be moderate, allay thy ecstasy.
> In measure reign thy joy, scant this excess:
> I feel too much thy blessing, make it less,
> For fear I surfeit."

But in view of Bassanio's next step, ours is the "green-eyed jealousy."

What a talker that man Gratiano must have been! Hear him: "A Daniel still say I; a second Daniel! I thank thee, Jew, for teaching me that word."

Then his cutting suggestion: .

"Beg, that thou may'st have leave to hang thyself; and yet, thy wealth being forfeit to the State, thou hast not left the value of a cord. Therefore thou must be hanged at the State's charge."

Who wouldn't be Shylock, too, if he were "spit upon, spurned," called "misbeliever, cut-throat, dog" and likely to be treated so always!

We would, like him, be taught to execute villany and "better the instruction."

Hum! I have forgotten the man.

Shakespeare,prism like, presents many different sides to our view. We can not take one side of him, describe it, and say we have given a description of Shakespeare. He seemed to be doctor, lawyer, lover, soldier, sailor all combined in one man. In fact after studying him we come to the conclusion that he must have had at least a smattering of a great many trades and professions.

A thorough study of Shakespeare leads one to believe that he led, during the obscure period of his life, a very checkered career, a life of many ups and downs. He was a man possessed of a great stock of perseverance; for without this he never could have acquired such a vast knowledge of persons and things. The wisdom displayed in all his writings could only be acquired by patient toil and untiring study.

Shakespeare was a thorough student of human nature both the good side and the bad. His character of Shylock vividly pictures a man undefended by law and unable to protect himself. It shows the hate that a down trodden man bears his oppressors. It shows his love of revenge, which all pleadings, all threats could not turn. In this character Shakespeare brings home in a forcible way the old adage that "even the worm will turn."

This great author, himself, must have been a good hater or lover, as the case might be. Critics say that he was a mild mannered and benevolent man; but when we read his works this question unvariably comes to the front. Could any man give such a graphic description of the passions if he had not experienced them himself? But we do not presume to contradict learned men. How then did he establish for himself so good a reputation. There is but one conclusion left; he did it by being master of himself. It is this that leads us to believe that Shakespeare possessed a wonderful will, a plodding perseverance which would not be balked by any force brought to bear upon it.

But Shakespeare was capable of looking upon the comic as well as the tragic side of life. He possessed an inexhaustible supply of humor.

His wit is sometimes hard to see; the point is often very finely drawn but, when we finally do catch the meaning we are struck by the subtle humor of it all.

In conclusion we add that there was, is, and will be but one Shakespeare.

AIM LOW.

It is a wholesome fact that the 19th century method of approaching a so-called truism puts it on its defense. But there is danger, in this very method, of assuming untenable conclusions.

The writer has read with interest in the MIRROR of February 10, an article called "Aim High." Its author has attacked with wit and spirit several old saws.

No doubt there is exaggeration in—"nothing is impossible to him who wills." But this is no argument against aiming high; much less an argument to aim low.

Does aiming high spoil "good servants?" Our friend says it does and he offers in proof that "their spirit will not submit to being 'bossed.'" Notice carefully his assumption here i. e. that good service is submission to being "bossed." It is sufficient to say in answer that no true man submits willingly to being "bossed" and that a good servant never needs to be "bossed."

Aiming high, when coupled with at least a common school education which our friend grants makes the best possible servant because it makes the best possible man or woman. Edison was one of the best operators or servants the Western Union people ever had—I presume our friend will admit that his aim was not very low. It is a high aim to be the very best possible workman in your line, and to outgrow your present limitations as soon as you can fit yourself to do so. The college student or business man who works on a more indifferent principle than this seldom amounts to much.

It may or may not be aiming high, to aim at woman's rights or the Presidency. Our friend brands both as high aims.

Our friend says "the lives of great men all remind us they have made their lives sublime, but it is no assurance that we can make our lives like their's." Ah! No,—We may not make our lives exactly like their's—a man is not great, as a man, if he gives up his individualism and becomes an exact copy of some one else. But lives of great men do remind us that in our sphere we can win true greatness and sublimity.

I wonder if fame and honor from the world at large are the only foot prints on the sands of time? I wonder if time does not go on within the "native village," outside of which some names are never heard? I wonder if no sublime lives have made prints on both time and eternity, in this very village of Lewisburg whom the outside world has never known? I wonder if we are not unconsciously breathing vital influences in this very town, in which are prints left by those whose names are long since forgotten?

No! the poet did not make a mistake, he knew the depth of what he spoke.

Those who aim high may not fully reach their aim, but those who aim low will surely never rise above their own level.

SONG BOOK.

The University Song book which has been under way for nearly a year is gradually nearing completion. Three fourths of the material has already gone to press and April 1 will find it ready for distribution. This is to be no April Fool as the date might indicate. The book is a future reality. The song book will contain about thirty new songs together with certain old pieces which have claimed a place in the heart of every college man, making in toto a book (octavo form) of fifty pages more or less.

The character of the music may be indicated by the names of some of the composers: Dr. Lowry, well known to every Bucknell man, Dr. Doane, a composer of ability, Dr. Johnson of Crozer Theological Seminary, Prof. Stanley of University of Michigan and many others of ability have assisted in this work. Equally important is the assistance received from those furnishing suitable words.

The aim of the board of editors has been to secure songs which will be sung by all. How far they have succeeded in this particular, time alone can tell--they trust that some may outlive the mere novelty of their newness, but they are not so sanguine as to hope that all will do this. Some are bound to die and they shall be satisfied if a few shall remain to be a nucleus for future publications. In attempting the publication of a Bucknell Song Book, the board realizes that they lay themselves open to the criticism of incompetency. They claim no superior ability; but some one had to take the matter in hand. In presenting the Bucknell Song Book, the board feel that they have a right to claim the support of every loyal wearer of the orange and blue. They expect criticism in their work, but remember, that no selfish interests have prompted them to spend much time in the preparation of the books; every student should be willing to purchase at least one copy and thus testify as to your appreciation of the effort put forth by the editors. ATHLETICS.

The schedule of the basket ball team is as follows:

February 27, Williamsport Y. M. C. A., at Williamsport.
March 5, State, at Lewisburg.
March 12, State, at State College.
March 20, U. of P., at Philadelphia.
March 27, All Pittsburg, at Pittsburg.
March 29, Western U. of P., at Pittsburg.
March 30, Geneva College, at Beaver Falls.
March 31, Mount Union College, at Alliance.
April 1, Cleveland Y. M. C. A., at Cleveland.

BUCKNELL DEFEATS U. OF P.

A large audience saw Bucknell defeat the University of Pennsylvania basket ball team in the Gymnasium, on Saturday evening, February 6. It was an interesting game, and a clean one, there being only one foul called in the whole game. For the first seven minutes neither side had much advantage. Then, by a succession of rapid passes, the ball was handed to Weymouth who threw the first goal. After eight minutes of play, during which Bucknell's defensive work was especially good, Weymouth lifted the ball into the basket for Bucknell's second goal. In two minutes after this, her third was thrown by Bevan. The ball was in play but a short time when Weymouth again placed it in Penn's basket. The half closed with the score: Bucknell, 8; U. of P., 0.

Fifteen seconds after the second half began, Deloffu threw U. of P's first goal. The electric lights went out several times during this half, the game thus being delayed. During the intervals of light, Milligan threw a clever goal for U. of P., and Mulkie, by skillfully bouncing and rolling the ball, carried it the length of the floor and threw the most difficult goal of the game. Neither team was able to score again. The game closed with the score: Bucknell, 10; U. of P., 4. Deloffu and Stewart played well for U. of P. It would not be fair to make especial mention of any of the Bucknell players, since the play of the entire team was fast and brilliant throughout the whole game. The line-up:

U. OF P.		BUCKNELL.
Deloffu, - - - - -	attack	- - - - - - Mulkie,
Milligan, - - - - -		- - - - - - Smith.
Schrack, - - - - -	centre	- - - Weymouth.
Stewart, - - - - -	defence	- - - - Catterall,
Buckley, - - - - -		- - - - - Bevan.

Goal from field, Weymouth 3, Bevan, Mulkie. Referee, D. H. Elliott, Bucknell. Umpire, E. M. Abbot, U. of P. Time-keeper, E. W. Cober, Bucknell. Time, twenty minute halves.

It was a cause of much disappointment to all present at the game with U. of P. that the reception, which was to be held at the close of the game, was prevented by the lights going out.

Wassel has been elected captain of the second team, Warren having resigned.

The conscientious work in practice being done by the basket ball team calls for the heartiest approval. The victory over U. of P. is an earnest of what may be expected when the team makes its trip West during the Spring recess.

The prospects of a winning baseball team are bright. Captain Mulkie has eighteen men at work in the cage. Of this number, five held positions on last year's team.

Bucknell has been invited to participate in the relay races under the auspices of the University of Pennsylvania, on April 24. Dickinson, Gettysburg, Franklin and Marshall and Bucknell are classed together. The most prominent schools of every grade in the East will send teams. The results will be eagerly watched for all over the country. Let Bucknell's name appear in the list of winners. To this end every man who is able should start in training for the team, and, when the athletic director is ready to take the men in charge, should present himself as a candidate. All who are interested in Bucknell's athletic standing can help by giving their moral and financial support.

COLLEGE NOTES.

At a recent meeting of the State Board of Health Nelson F. Davis was appointed Assistant Bacteriologist.

(Dr. P. in Literature class just before calling roll) "What fools we mortals be: Allen, Ballentine, Conover, etc., etc." To whom did the quotation apply?

Dr. Perrine delivered the "Founders Day" oration at Peddie Institute, Heightstown, N. J., on Friday, February 12. In the evening he presided at the annual banquet.

The Union Signal the national organ of the W. C. T. U. in its issue of February 11, contains a clipping, from the Baptist Standard, on the subject of "prayer" by President Harris.

At the local election on Tuesday, February 16, Registrar Gretzinger was re-elected a member of the Lewisburg Town Council having been nominated on both the Republican and Democratic tickets.

On account of an insufficient supply of gas, the electric dynamo failed to furnish light in the gymnasium during the game of basket ball between U. of P. and Bucknell. The game was thus prolonged.

At the regular meeting of the Mirror Association, held February 6, the following editors were elected: Seniors, Kunkle and Sprague; Juniors, Wiltbank and Diggs; Sophomore, Nesbit; Freshman, Strayer. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: Pres., Koch; Vice Pres., Hague; Sec., C. E. Bunnell; Business Manager, Davis.

A number of the boys and girls from the University had a very enjoyable sledride to Milton on Saturday evening, February 13. They spent a very pleasant evening at the home of the Hills where they were agreeably entertained by Mrs. Leslie a missionary from Africa.

Prof. (in Physics)—"If you were gigging for a fish where would you aim?"

L— "Behind it.

Prof. — "Suppose it is a large fish what part of its body would you scrape?"

L— "Its tail."

The last issue of "The University of Chicago Record" says that Ralph Charles Henry Catterall (Bucknell '91) has been accepted as a candidate for the degree Ph. D. and Mary B. Harris (Bucknell '94) for the A. M. This means practically the examinations and the degree in the near future. Congratulations!

Dr. Perrine has introduced a noval plan for the class in Economics. The class is divided into groups, each group taking up for discussion and study some topic in economics. Each individual in the several groups will then prepare a thesis upon some phase of the question which was under discussion in their particular circle.

"The unexpected Freshman Banquet always happens." Thus soliloquized a member of the Sophomore class on February 9. "And all because we expected too little of them." Indeed such was the case. The class of '99 had solemnly vowed that the Freshmen should not get away to their banquet. They posted sentinels, watched class meetings, followed Freshmen, were guyed by the class of 1900, and yet in spite of all this the Freshmen left Lewisburg in broad day light and the Sophs knew it not. The consciousness of the surprise and chagrin of their enemies added pleasure to the feast which the Century Class enjoyed at the Hotel Haag in Milton, on the evening of February 8. The presence of the Sophs, during the evening showed very clearly that they were anxious to learn how a banquet should be conducted and for that reason it is to be regretted that they did not get near enough to the banquet hall to see or even hear anything whereby they might have profited. The banquet was declared a success in every respect by each of the forty Freshmen present and will appear in history as the first triumph of the class of 1900.

A throng of students, kitchen window, female pugilist, dish water, chicken salad, front window, clubs and defeat is the epitomized account of the Sophomore banquet held at the Cameron House, Lewisburg, on the night of February 4. The arrangements of the symposium were effected so secretly and the time and place suppressed so perfectly that the Sophomores eluded the vigilance and escaped the detection of the Freshmen, who only became aware of the feast after the completion of the second course of the menu—about 12 o'clock. Shortly after midnight a crowd of Freshmen attempted to enter the banquet hall by way of the kitchen window, but the employees of the cuisine prevented them by virtue of feminine fists and by dint of chicken salad and dish water which they threw into their faces. Then an assault was made on the front windows, but again failure resulted, owing to the efficient manner with which the proprietor and clerks handled good, stout clubs. As a final resort, a generator of H_2S was placed at the window, the person presuming that the odor would be of more avail than mere physical force to accomplish their purpose, but this device also proved futile, as it was immediately seized by one of the banqueters. It was toward morning when the gathering disbanded with the perfect assurance that the occasion could not have been more replete with merriment.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

The class of '98 has elected the following officers: President, Miss Virginia Noyes; Vice President, Miss Manetta Anderson; Secretary, Miss Edith Phillips; Treasurer, Miss Katherine Johnson.

Miss Minnie Morris, Ex-'97, is now taking the course of study at Newton Centre, Mass. Miss Morris intends to graduate from the training school in June when she will begin her work in the foreign field.

Through the kindness of Dr. Hoffa, his son Sidney of the Academy, entertained, at his home in Washingtonville, a number of his friends among whom were some of the Institute girls. The tables were loaded with the best the land affords and the guests will long remember the gracious hospitality of Dr. and Mrs. Hoffa.

The talk which Mr. Phillips gave at the regular Y. W. C. A. prayer meeting, February 9, on the prayers of Christ as recorded in the Gospel of Luke, was spiritually earnest and helpful, and gave the girls a fuller realization of what should be that "effectual fervent prayer" which "availeth much." If any thing may be judged from the zest with which the girls entered into the singing, the new books which were used for the first time, added much to the enjoyment of the meeting.

A most delightful reception was given by Mrs. Larison, Saturday, February 6, from four until six to the U. of P. and Bucknell basket ball teams. Among the tasteful decorations of the parlors and the school-room the red and blue and the orange and the blue were conspicuous. Sherbet and wafers were served by the young ladies. All evidently were loathe to leave, as many lingered until long after the tea-bell had sounded.

The Ian Maclaren meeting of the Lewisburg Alumnae Club was more than usually interesting. The program rendered was as follows:

Music	Dr. Aviraguet.
Critique on Dr. Watson	Mrs. J. T. Judd.
The teachings of Dr. Watson	Mrs. A. B. Stewart.
Music—Quartette	Misses Walls & Goddard, Messrs. Bunnell & Meeker.
Review of the Mind of the Master	Miss Katherine P. Baker.
Music—Vocal Solo	Miss Irene Walls.
Readings—Selections from Ian Maclaren	Mrs. Martha Wolfe.

The critiques were all worthy of insertion in the Forum or Review of Reviews.

ACADEMY NEWS.

Cat stealing seems to be contageous. One of our boys was recently relieved of his feline pet by some party who knows not when to respect the rights of others.

The recent drive to Washingtonville terminated in the serious disaster of losing a blanket from one of the carriages. It cannot be accounted for in any other way than that the boys were otherwise engaged at the time.

Dr. Stephens was a visitor at the Y. M. C. A. meeting on February 9, and gave a very interesting and instructive talk to the students. On February 16, Prof. Hulley had charge of the meeting and presented the need of Bible study.

The Academy was represented at the Y. M. C. A. convention at Reading by Messrs. Shields, Earl, Rowe and Ranck.

The students have commenced to take an interest in spring sports. Many of the boys are working hard in the gymnasium. It is to be hoped that we can make a good showing at the Interscholastic Meet.

The boys took advantage of the recent snow by going sleighing. A jolly party went out for a lark on Monday evening, February 15.

The "Preps" were very much incensed at the treatment of their Proctor on the night of the Freshman banquet. They turned out in full force to see that no harm befell him.

Members and ex-members of Hermania Literary Society entertained their lady friends on Friday evening, February 12. It was entitled "An Evening with Flowers." The office was prettily decorated with red and white, the society's colors. After spending some time in guessing the names of flowers, refreshments were served. All report having a pleasant time.

PERSONALS.

In view of the fact that the interest of the students and Alumni, especially, is not what it ought to be toward our college publications, we have decided to look up and make mention of the doings and whereabouts of each living member of Bucknell's Alumni and Matriculates as near as this will be possible.

A start will be made with the class of '51 and each succeeding one will be taken up in order, to the present year.

Since there is a certain necessary delay at first in correspondence, it is hoped the subscribers will not be discouraged if the first one or two issues are lacking in this department. [EDITORS.]

'51. Rev. John M. Lyons is one of the three surviving members of the first class graduated from the University. He is the only remaining minister of the class, and is still preaching, being pastor of the Baptist Church at Richland, N. J.

'61. O. W. Spratt, Esq., has been elected Treasurer of the Penna. Baptist Education Society.

'64. Rev. T. A. K. Gessler, D. D., has resigned the pastorate of the Grace Baptist Church, New York City.

Ex-'65. Thos. J. Baldrige has taken his father's practice and is not practising law in Blair county.

'66 and '65, Inst. Mrs. Judge Dean and her sister Miss Clara Bell are spending the winter in Philadelphia at the Bartean. Judge Dean is Judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

'69. Judge Martin Bell, of Hollidaysburg, is now in his fourth year as Judge of Blair Co., Pa.

'70. Rev. C. J. Hallowell has been called to supply the First Baptist Church, Duluth, Minn., until May 1.

'83. Rev. A. W. Hand, of Keene, N. H., has declined the call of the First Baptist Church of Salem, N. J., but has accepted a call to Putnam, Conn.

'84. Howard H. Baldrige is District Attorney at Omaha, Neb.

Ex-'88. Rev. P. F. Delancey, of Waynesburg, Pa. has declined a call extended to him by the Baptist Church at Wilkinsburg, Pa.

'89. Rev. Chas. A. Walker is now located at Bellwood.

Ex-'89. Rev. John Skym has succeeded in clearing the debt on the Baptist Church at Lansford.

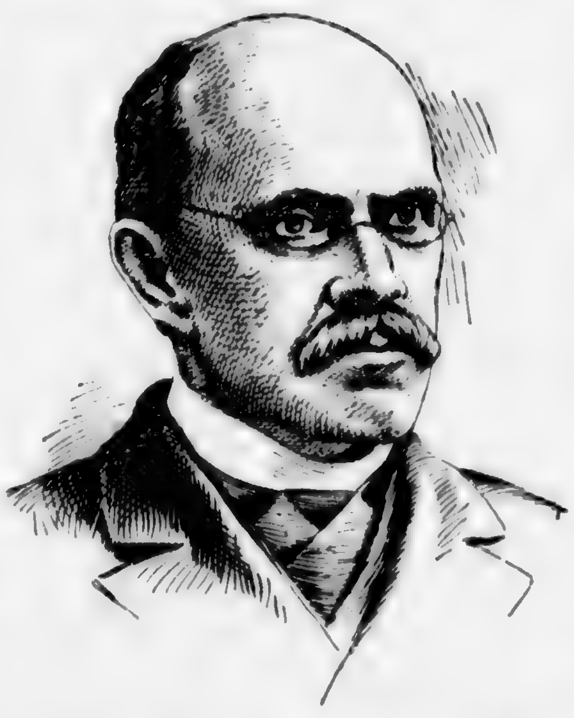
BUCKNELL MIRROR.

Vol. XVI. Lewisburg, Pa., March 10, 1897. No. 10.

DEATH OF CAPT. J. MERRILL LINN.

Captain James Merrill Linn, an honored and esteemed Alumnus of Bucknell, died suddenly at his home in Lewisburg, on Tuesday evening, Feb. 23, from paralysis of the heart. The death of Capt. Linn removes another living member from the first class, that of 1851, graduated from this institution ; the remaining members being Rev. J. M. Lyons, of Richland, N. J., and Henry Pomerene, of Philadelphia.

Capt. Linn has always maintained an intense and loyal interest in the affairs of the University. He has used his voice and pen on many occasions in behalf of Alma Mater, and he has frequently written articles for the Mirror on the early history of the University.



Mr. Linn was the third son of James Fleming and Margaret Irvin Linn, late of Lewisburg, dec'd. He was born Oct. 17, 1833, hence his age is 63 years, 4 months and 6 days. His early education was at the Lewisburg Academy. When the first session of the University commenced, in Sept., 1846, he entered what was then called the senior academic class. The next year he entered college and graduated Aug. 26, 1851, with the salutatory, being not quite eighteen years of age. Mr. Linn was a member of the Pa. Gamma Chapter of the Phi Kappa Psi, and during the early history of the chapter he took an active interest in its affairs. In 1853 he went to Lancaster to read law with James Black, a former student of his father. The same year he was appointed a tutor in Franklin and Marshall college in that city, teaching Greek and Latin. He returned to Lewisburg and was admitted to the bar in Sept., 1854. For six months he practiced in Phœnixville ; then returned to Lewisburg, and in 1858 he became a partner of his father under the firm name of J. F. & J. M. Linn. When the war broke out and the call for 75,000 troops was issued he was at a lawsuit in Snyder county. The suit came to an end at once, when he hastened home, enlisted and served as Second Lieutenant in Co. G, 4th Regt. Pa. Vol., for three months. Then he aided in recruiting a company, of which he was commissioned Captain, Co. H, 51st Regt. Pa. Vol., in which he served from Nov. 1861, until April 14, 1864, when he resigned on account of greatly impaired health. During his last enlistment he served as a staff officer a considerable part of the time, and particularly as judge advocate of the division, on account of his legal training and equipment. After his return from service it was several years before he could resume his profession. His father dying in 1869, he entered into partnership with Andrew H. Dill, which continued for ten years. The partnership then dissolved, when he practiced his profession alone. On Dec. 26, 1867, he and Mary Ellen, eldest daughter of Philip Billmyer, were married. They have one son, Philip Billmyer. Linn, Esq., who was associated with his father in the practice of the law. Surviving him are the wife and son, and his brother, Hon. John Blair Linn, of Bellefonte, and a sister, Mrs. John S. Angle, of Stafford.

A LETTER FROM KEYSTONE.

Mr. Editor:—Your request for a brief article on the main features of life at Keystone came a few days ago. The subject is a pleasant one, and yet difficult, in that you require brevity.

Geographically the Academy is situated sixteen miles North of Scranton on the main line of the D. L. & W. railroad. A branch of the Tunkhannock creek, locally called Nokomis, skirts the foot of the hill on which the buildings stand and hurries on through the boro of Factoryville, hard by the school. The Academy is placed in a grove of twenty acres and consists of a cottage dormitory for boys, a brick hall for girls, containing the general dining-room, and a large main building, containing the library, gymnasium, recitation rooms and additional dormitories for boys. All the buildings are heated by steam and supplied from an unfailing spring with the purest water.

The usual courses are given, special attention being paid to the classical, scientific and business branches. The Academy has a well stocked library and a good reflecting telescope.

Affairs of a special nature receive much attention. There are frequent entertainments at the school and in town, numerous socials, banquets and suppers. Two societies keep up a lively interest in parliamentary and library work.

The religious exercises of the school are well attended. Tuesday afternoon nearly all the students gather for services under the auspices of the Young Women's and Young Men's Christian Associations. There is a large prayer circle conveniently divided. The churches in the neighboring town are well attended on Sunday at the various services. It is a common saying among those who have been students at the Academy, that the moral influences of the school are remarkable. The towns people are noted for the purity of their lives and so the students who meet them are much benefited.

During the past few years there has been a gradual developement of athletic spirit among the students. They have supported teams in most departments of athletics. Base ball has attracted much attention every Spring when the natural grand stand, similar to that at Bucknell, is lined with spectators twice a week. Field and track work occupied one end of the ahtletic field while the base ball practice was going on at the other, so that the ground presented a lively appearance. The base ball club generally defeats the principal clubs of Wyoming County, with which there is great rivalry. Last season the Academy sent out its first athletic team. Several prizes were won in competition with the best talent of the Central New York high schools and academies. In foot ball Keystone has an enviable record—this year especially. Every game last Fall was a victory, and only once was the goal line crossed by any opposing team. The students felt much elated, for the teams had always to meet older and heavier opponents, and yet victory came. The reasons of course are easy to find. There is present among the students a great deal of true school spirit. Loyalty to the interests of the Academy, enthusiasm for all that pertains to its welfare, and a genuine desire to keep their foster mother in the front rank, all these are felt by each student and are encouraged by a devoted faculty.

AFTER FORTY YEARS.

Among our exchanges there comes to our office a wide-awake and up-to-date paper. It is published at the Capital of a neighboring State. The name of the manager of the publishing company which issues it seemed very familiar to us. The initials and name seemed like those of one known in college days, and they called up many pleasant memories of recitation room scenes, ball games, the climbing of college hill together, literarary society experiences and many other matters of forty years ago. Daily the paper has come to our sanctum, and daily we have asked the question, "wonder if this is our old school mate?"

The other day we concluded to solve the mystery and wrote the party. The reply comes back this week and says : "The same one who was in the University at Lewisburg in the fifties, and remember you very distinctly. Very glad to hear from you, and hope you are doing well."

The companionships and friendships of school days were never forgotten. Forty years ago, with the above, we met each day on the campus or in the class room. Our paths have diverged, we had lost track of each other, and yet, after all these years, a question brings the answer, and the old fire of interest shows the common touch of a fellowship formed in college life that neither distance, time nor separation can annihilate. Our old friend has worked his way up grandly. Congratulations, good cheer and best wishes are gladly tendered, not from the dear old college hill we climbed together, but from the hill of life, whose meridian height, so far as age is concerned, we have doubtless reached, and for the ascent of which we were both fitted in the same class rooms. Could we see you and the boys of '57, you and they would find that while we are beginning to wear the grey, our heart beat and hand grasp are just as strong and warm as they were when we used to meet forty years ago. The years have wrought their changes. With one or two exceptions, the presidents and professors of those days sleep their long last sleep. The dull, cold ear of death prevents many of "the boys" from hearing again the then familiar tones of "the old college bell." But could all the boys of '57 gather upon the old campus, what stories they could tell ! The flow of soul would almost make unnecessary for the time at least the feast of reason.

BUCKNELL'S MICROSCOPIST.

Recently, the subscriber has come into possession of a lot of finished material from the microscopcial laboratories of two of the oldest and richest Universities in America. The material was prepared by and under the direction of teachers of world wide reputation. The methods of these teachers were employed, and the products show the results of their methods. On careful examination this material is found to be practically written for class use. It is prepared under antiquated methods. Compared with the work turned out by Instructor Nelson F. Davis it is of no value whatever to Buckuell students. This note is written that students and friends of the University may know that they have in their midst a man who has developed a marked aptitude in microscopical tecnique and research, and who is at the present moment capable of doing work superior to that done in leading Universities. The work done in the Bucknell laboratories in Histology, Embryology and microscopical methods under the direction of Mr. Davis, compares more than favorably with that done in other Institutions.

If Instructor Davis has not been known at home, his work has been recognized at a distance. The Pennsylvania State Board of Health has made him an Assistant Bacteriologist to the Board. Michigan University has offered him the position of Assistant to the Professor of Histology, and he has been made instructor in Bacteriology at the summer school of science at Cold Spring Harbor, L. I., in the medical preparatory work. Mr. Davis has been an invaluable assistant, and students will discover when they enter the medical school, that his work and methods are not inferior to the best there offered.

G. G. GROFF.

ECHOES FROM THE INSTITUTE LITERATURE CLASS.

Walking along the highway, we may often see the street lamps burning in broad daylight. We pass them with scarcely a thought, but we will welcome their rays a few hours hence when we will not be able to take our steps with the same confidence.

Chaucer's works are like lights shining out of a dark age. Standing within the range of their radiance, we may see the customs and the character of the period.

Still, Chaucer was a man for all time. Reaching into the past for plots, he used them to express his own ideas. Improving upon the old legends, he gave them a perpetual beauty. Boccacio would never have used his own plan, originated in Decamerone, with the same success, for he was like the child who has found a valuable tool and knows not how to use it. Speaking of Chaucer, Lowell said, "Wherever he found anything directed to Goeffry Chaucer, he took it and made the most of it." A Chaucer or a Shakespeare must express a thought before we may see all there is in it.

Chaucer was one of those rare characters who touched life everywhere and spoke with confidence. He took many sayings and proved them from his own experience.

Perhaps he is at fault in not using his powers as a reformer, being contented to take life with "buxomnesse." His poem "Good Counseil" is good counsel for people of tastes like his own. It would not help every man.

The "Nonne Prestes Tale" is one of those humorous fancies which bring the sleepy man out of his dreamy consciouness with a laugh, and keep him awake with a stern warning; he must not be conceited. There are many sly foxes who can catch him, even when he is most sure of his safety, and remind him that all this world's fools are not dead yet.

In that inimitable prologue to the Canterbury Tales, Chaucer shows a knowledge of men, and women, too, which is not biased by outward appearances. He does not see the cassock and cowl and decide that they cover a priest. He understands the man immediately. With an eye that would make a lawyer's reputation, he discovers all deception. Perhaps he feels indignant, but his own inclinations, so nicely expressed—"Peyne thee not eche croked to redresse," overcome him, and he laughs in spite of himself. But his laugh does not teach us to respect the fat friar.

Chaucer can teach us more in a laugh than Dryden in a sober moment, for back of the laugh is his character.

One of the most striking qualities of Chaucer's writings is his comprehensive knowledge of human nature. His life as a soldier, ambassador, Controller of Customs and Member of Parliament, gave him the opportunity to study "all sorts and conditions of men." The gift of insight into character does not seem in the least to have saddened him. He accepts the good with the bad and faithfully describes both, only showing us by his gentle ridicule, his perception of the defects and vanities of his fellow men. He does not attempt, in an impassioned way, to right all the wrong he sees, but concludes that he will not, as he says in "Good Counseil:" "Peyne him not eche croked to redresse."

In the Prologue, we have a perfect picture of the dress and customs of the fourteenth century. With a careful pen, he draws the portrait of each pilgrim, leaving out nothing which would help to make a speaking likeness. "What a beautiful ideal of the country priest he gives in the character of the "poure Persoun!" But it is more than an ideal; it is the vivid description of the life of a heroic man whom Chaucer deeply reverenced. The knight, another fine character, personifies the type of true bravery united with gentleness and tenderness. As Victor Hugo says: "When both are sincere and good, no men so penetrate each other, as an old priest and an old soldier. At bottom the man is the same. The one has devoted himself to his country here below, the other to his country on high; that is the only difference."

And so the priest and the knight exemplify moral and physical bravery; the one in the conflict with the physical power, death; and the other with spiritual power, sin.

In the "Nonne Prestes Tale" Chaucer's delicious humor appears. Chaunticleer and Dame Pertelote are quaintly amusing. Chaucer has noted the ways of the inhabitants of the hennery. He contrives to give Chaunticleer and Dame Pertelote something of the controversial spirit attributed to husband and wife. Ascribing to these feathered folk the qualities belonging to the "lords of creation," is diverting from its very incongruity.

These three selections from Chaucer's writings give us many glimpses of the man himself —his sympathy, humor and reverence for true sincerity and simplicity.

'98 L'AGENDA.

The tenth annual edition of L'Agenda is now in course of preparation, and we are proffered the use of these columns to make our apologia (using the word with the meaning of Socrates). For no apology is needed in presenting a publication which stands alone in its opportunity to reproduce and record faithfully the events of the present year of Bucknell's active life ; for truly the days, and nights as well, are being filled with events which must not be permitted to go "unhonored and unsung."

Few of our friends, however, even among the students of the university (excepting, of course, our Senior brothers and sisters), have an adequate conception of the amount of labor required to successfully edit and distribute an edition of L'Agenda.

The board of editors, consisting of eleven members elected from the Junior class, have been actively at work for many weeks already upon their several departments. The literary editors are busy recording events of importance and common interest, and, with the aid of pen and ink, paste pot and brains, will reproduce them in striking and attractive form.

The board congratulates itself upon having as artist member Mr. F. C. Katherman, whose skill in designing and etching is amply evident in the large number of drawings already executed. To him we are therefore indebted for the excellence which we can safely promise for this feature of the book. We propose that the designing shall be wholly original, including that for the cover, and will all be done by the members of '98, except the page devoted to the Art Dept. of the Institute. This page will be designed and managed by the members of the studio, and will therefore, we are sure, be a model of taste.

But all this costs money ; '97 will affirm the statement, and our energetic business manager, Mr. H. L. Purdy, is using every effort to secure the $700 to $800 needed to publish the edition. The necessary co-operation of the student body is being heartily given, and we intend that the character of '98's annual shall prove that their confidence is not misplaced. Being aware that

"'Tis not in mortal to command success,
We will do more—deserve it !"

Some of the new departures we desire to keep secret until the book is published, others, however, we may mention at this point : In the first place, there are changes in proportion and arrangement which we think will meet with favor ; notably in the abridgement of space heretofore devoted to eating clubs, the creation of a department of religious work, and variation of details in departments of classes and fraternities ; also the amount of literary work of every appropriate style will be largely increased, and no time or effort is being spared to make the details as varied and attractive as possible.

A complete index to the respective departments and subjects will avoid the confusion which has heretofore been a source of criticism. A notice of the principal features of Bucknell's 50th anniversary commencement, including class day of '96, we think quite worthy of record.

We may not omit to add that our honored President will describe in his well known style "My Ideal Student,"—an article which will be read carefully and often by very many desiring to know and copy the safe ideal therein presented.

The work will be dedicated to the memory of the late Prof. F. W. Tustin, of the college, whose long term of earnest service, and lamented death, is fresh in the minds of many friends of the institution.

We think it wise to limit the edition sufficiently to make sure of its sale promptly. We are not unmindful, however, of the apparent unusual interest and expectancy that awaits the issue of the annual, and take pleasure in announcing May 1st as the date of the publication. This interest is indeed gratifying, and we are preparing to produce a book that will be a real satitfaction to every one who is fortunate enough to secure a copy of "L'Agenda '98."

E. H. DUTTON, Editor in Chief.

An honest man who says Yes or No, deserves to be believed ; his character swears for him.

THE SENIORS AND CLASS FIGHTS.

Shall the Seniors take a hand in class fights? This seems to be a much mooted problem in college ethics, especially when debated from the student stand-point, but when considered by the Alumni and friends of the institution the answer naturally and forcibly comes back in the shape of an emphatic "No." If the Senior class of a college is to have any share at all in a class "scrap," then it would rather be as "preventer" than as "promoter." Heretofore it has frequently been the custom to select a committee from the Senior class to act as an arbitration board to settle disputed points between the lower classes on certain occasions. But, now that class fights are "going out of style," it should behoove the Seniors to neither act as "promoters" or "arbiters," but as "preventers," when such fights are being promulgated by excitable under-classmen. This function is accorded them by reason of their position in the college community; by reason of the dignity accorded to members of the graduating class; and, by reason of the moral influence which they, as natural leaders, and as matured college men, should exert on the lower classes.

It is greatly to be regretted that certain members of the present Senior class at Bucknell, as rumored—a class known for stability, character and scholarship—encouraged the recent escapades between the Sophomore and Freshman classes. A few of the Seniors encouraged the class by word of mouth, "Just for a little fun," they said; whilst others, whose deportment during their entire college course was such that better things were expected of them, looked on and thereby gave silent encouragement.

Let the Senior classes at Bucknell, hereafter, establish the precedent and create the prestige of non-participation either by word or presence in class fights. A SUBSCRIBER.

MY FIRST BALLOT.

Probably most of the youth of the land look forward to the casting of their first vote as one of the important events in their career, when citizenship becomes a real and vital privilege.

Having arrived at that age of majority, I anticipated Nov. 2, 1896 with no little anxiety; in fact many sleepless nights were spent thinking of the coming election, and for whom and for what my first ballot should be cast; whether it would be cast for the Gold-bugs and Protection, the Silver Anarchist and Free Trade or whether the Cold Water Sentiment should flood my undeveloped political opinions and form the basis of my action.

Having come to a decision and having aired it considerably, with the necessary pass in my possession and after spending several long hours riding upon smoky and disagreeable passenger trains which form the rapid transit between Lewisburg and Honeydale, I at last arrived at my home. Dagoes, Irish and Dutch all gave me a warm welcome in terms such as these: "For the good of all the country, the farmers, the pumpkin and squash crop," and "The laboring man's salvation lies in to-morrow's election."

Spending a quiet night visiting my old retreat, Mike O'Dares' Den, early in the morning, after partaking of a light breakfast, I, along with my venerable pater, wended my way to the polls. There a conglomerate mass of voters, tax-collectors, saloon keepers and election officials viewed me, some with a beam of pleasure in their eyes, others, knowing my sentiments, with a look of disgust and disappointment.

My turn coming on, I, with a feeling of self-importance, proceeded to take the oath. When I came to the phrase "over twenty-one and under twenty-two," I fainted, excused myself, walked out and said "Damn! Why was I born a year too early? How is it that everything goes wrong? Fate decreed that I shall not vote! Shall my voice, that of an American citizen, be as naught?" Such great and momentous questions as these went fleeting through my mind, and then another, "A property owner and tax payer not to vote?" "Is it possible?" "I'll vote yet." So gathering together my tax receipts, deeds, with my pater and a lawyer, I again tried my luck. Age was set aside, and legal understanding, justice and right, were put in its place. Then a second time I took an oath, but of a different kind.

Receiving what appeared to be a newspaper, and spending about an hour in the stall deciding how to vote, I, without any more hesitation, cast my ballot. Like a young Spartan fresh from some great victory, I again went out, but this time not an oath fell from my lips, but thoughts as these went through my mind: "The potato crop is assured, the pumpkins will grow, my country is saved. A voter who has done his duty."

The rest of the day was spent in roaming about the town. As soon as darkness came on, the whole town became excited. Long before ten o'clock reports were heard, some saying "Immense majorities for McKinley !", others for Bryan, and some had the nerve to suggest that the Prohibitionists had won. These were of that fraternity of beings who had imbibed too freely in The Indian's Fire Water or the Dago's Bolinke.

Later, during the night, the result was declared favorable for McKinley, being of the opinion that Protection and Gold were the requirements of the day, I felt highly elated. My first vote had been cast on the winning side.

SIDE PLAY IN CLASS.

"To-day." began Prof., "we take up the Psalms. First as to their setting: Mr. A, "What was the condition of the people ?"

A recited, (deserves special mention.)

B tried to listen, but thoughts somehow will wander.

"The Hebrews were"—sleighing—gorgeous morn,—"A conservative people"—cold, oh no ! —"Situated near together they could easily go to Jerusalem"—

* * * * *

That was the last he heard of the Hebrews.

"Pretty fine, wonder if it will last till to-morrow night. Yes, I'll see you before class—"Enjoyed it immensely."—"Go to-morrow ? Oh do you think ?"

B awakes with a start, rubbing his eyes.

"Let up, will you."

A laughed—and so did the rest.

EXCHANGES.

The Pharetra, the publication issued by the young women of Wilson College, is neat in form and well edited. Its February number is a model.

The Perkiomen Seminary Bulletin of Feb. 20, prints extracts of Dr. Evans' oration before the Bucknell Alumni in June last. The quotation is from the MIRROR. We thank our contemporary for thus aiding us in giving a wide circulation to the points in so scholarly and instructive a production.

The present speaker of the Japan House of Representatives graduated from the Yale Law School in 1879.—Ex.

The Messenger of Richmond College contains charter sketches of Prof. H. H. Harris whose recent death has taken from the field of labor one of the most eminent and best known of Southern Baptists. These sketches are from the pens of eminent men.

Most of our exchanges are well worth reading by the student body. They help us to live and move in a wider College world.

The Villanova Monthly has a thoughtful article on the change of our National Administration. True patriotism !

The Irving Sketch-Book is one of the literary gems among our Exchanges. The young ladies who publish it know what such a periodical should be.

BONNIE GEORGE CAMPBELL.

He upon Highlands and law upon Tay,
Bonnie George Campbell rode out on a day.
Saddled and Bridled and gallant rade he ;
Home com' his horse, but never com' he.

Out come his auld mother, weeping fu' sair ;
And out com' his bonnie bride, riving her hair,

EDITORIALS.

Beginning with the present issue, Mr. W. L. Kurtz, of the Lewisburg JOURNAL, will have charge of the printing of the MIRROR for the ensuing year. Although the work of the former printer, Mr. Shamp, was very satisfactory, and it is with regret that we leave him, it is hoped and believed that the change will be for the better. New type, increased facilities, and a decrease of one-half in the time required for getting out the paper, are certainly great inducements and cannot fail to be of great advantage in making our paper fresher and more attractive.

We understand that there is a movement on foot in the school to publish a weekly paper, devoted chiefly to athletics and local news. It seems plain to us that the school cannot support two papers—a weekly and a bi-weekly; one or the other will have to go under, or perhaps both. The financial conditions are such that both cannot long exist. The chief complaint of those interested in the other paper was that news, athletic and local news especially, had to be in the hands of the printer so long before the issue came out that everything was very stale when it appeared. This was true, and to remedy it a contract was made with Mr. Kurtz by which the local and athletic columns may be held open until within two days, and if the matter is an important one, within a day and a half or less of the appearance of the issue. This certainly cannot be bettered much. Now it stands to reason that if we divide our strength and try to support two papers, one will have to succumb or else both will be hampered. Why not combine and make the one better, brighter, and more attractive? If it is thought desirable, increase the board of editors and make the MIRROR a weekly paper, but let us not divide our forces. It is fatal to the interests of one of the papers if not of both.

Before our next issue the annual gymnasium exhibition will have taken place. This is a very pleasing part of the athletic exercises at Bucknell and lends zest and interest to the work of the students during the term. The drills this year have been better than usual and more regularly attended. There has been an average of nearly sixty throughout the term. No doubt the offer of the faculty to count two terms of gymnasium work as one honor study is in a great measure responsible for the unflagging interest manifested. We are glad to see so many avail themselves of this opportunity for physical exercise, since gymnasium work is valuable, perhaps more valuable than any other form of athletic exercise, for thorough, systematic, physical development.

It is a lamentable fact that there is so little singing among the College students. It is true that once in a while a few lovers of song will break the monotony and humdrum of every day life by rendering a few selections, or that occasionally a party of friends will gather in a room, and finally, for want of something better, start some of the old familiar songs dear to the hearts and memories of everybody; but college singing, singing in which all feel at liberty and desire to join, anywhere, everywhere, in the halls, on the college steps, the campus, wherever a half dozen students meet, is practically unknown. Perhaps this is partly because there are so few distinctively college songs that we can call our own and that really appeal to our hearts and stir us with a deeper feeling of love and loyalty for our common mother; this need we hope the coming Song Book will supply. But we have the universal college songs, the songs that we have known from childhood, that have ceased to be the property of college men alone, but are dear to the hearts of young people everywhere, because they express the sentiments, the longings, the aspirations of careless, happy, hopeful youth. How often do we hear old men and those most busied with the cares of this life say the happiest and brightest memories of their college days are of the hours they spent with classmates and friends in a very abandonment of careless, happy song! Let us sing! Sing as the bird sings, beeause it cannot help it. We will never regret it.

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT.

WHEREAS, It has pleased God in His infinite wisdom to call the father of our brother Robert J. Powell, be it

RESOLVED, That we extend to our brother our heartfelt sympathy in his deep bereavement, and be it

RESOLVED, That we commend him to the care of the One who is the Father of us all. Be it further

RESOLVED, That a copy of these resolutions be inserted in the "Bucknell Mirror" and in the "Ridgway Advocate."

COLLEGE NOTES.

The father of E. L. Peck was in town on the 24th ult.

F. C. Ballentine, '99, is wearing a Phi Gamma Delta pin.

Prof. Phillips occupied the pulpit of the Baptist church on the evening of the 28th ult.

The Pi Beta Phi fraternity had their picture taken on the 26th ult., at the Ginter & Cook studio.

Monday Feb. 21, President Harris attended the gathering of College Presidents in Philadelphia.

Messrs. C. A. Weymouth and G. Livingstone-Bayard were in Lock Haven on Washington's Birthday.

B.—(Translating French) "She had the most beautiful head of hair I ever saw, she was bald headed."

Miss Eddleman of the Institute faculty occupied the professor's chair in Biblical Literature class on the 26th ult.

During the late snow, Dutton, Pearse and Morris (1900) with companions from the Institute enjoyed a sleigh (?) ride to Northumberland.

Miss Goddard, '97, Taylor, '97 and Purdy, '99, delivered addresses at a missionary meeting held in Mifflinburg on the evening of the 28th ult.

Judge William M. Ashmead, of Philadelphia, has accepted the invitation to deliver the address to the College graduating class, next commencement.

Prof. Aviragnet, instructor in French, Spanish and Italian, will again be at the Pennsylvania Chautauqua next summer, and will have charge of the Modern Languages.

The new gas engine recently put in the laboratory was furnished by the Pennsylvania Iron Works Co., Philadelphia. It is an eight horse-power engine for operating the dynamo.

Mr. Guy H. Hubbard, Brooklyn, N. Y., was the guest of the Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity on Washington's Birthday. Mr. Hubbard is the Archon of the first district of the above fraternity.

The Scranton Alumni club, of which Hon. Lemuel Ammerman is President and C. W. Dawson, Esq., Secretary, is arranging to hold a banquet at the Hotel Jermyn, Scranton, very soon.

The '97 girls of the College delightfully entertained their class brothers in the Institute parlors on the evening of Feb. 22. The '97 boys are fortunate in having such loyal and devoted class sisters.

To-morrow evening the Bucknell band, assisted by the School of Music and talent from town, will give a grand band concert and musical in Bucknell Hall. Doors open at 7 o'clock, entertainment to begin at 8. Admission 15 cents.

The following took in the Inaugural Celebration at Washington, D. C., March 4: Davis, '98, Diggs, '98, Hill, '98, Nelson, '97. Hill spent the week with his father. Davis visited his old chum Harland, Ex.-'98.

E. W. Cober, '99, captain of the foot-ball team, has been appointed director of Athletics at the Conneaut Lake Christian Culture Assembly to be held next summer at Conneaut Lake near Meadville. President Harris is one of the lecturers at this assembly.

On Tuesday evening of last week the following Y. M. C. A. officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Chas. W. Harvey; vice president, John J. Anderson; treasurer, E. C. Conover; recording secretary, Chas. E. Hankey; corresponding secretary, R. T. Wiltbank, Jr.

A large attendance is desired at the Monday evening Bible classes. It is to be hoped that all those connected with the several Bible classes, will do their utmost to so arrange their studies and other affairs, that they will not interfere with the members attending their classes. The classes meet at 9 o'clock and any-one is most cordially invited to attend any of the sessions.

The exercises on Washington's Birthday bestowed honors upon Abraham Lincoln. The address, which portrayed Lincoln's literary excellence, was given by Dr. Perrine. Mr. C. A. Lindeman read Lincoln's letter to Greely; J. R. L. Diggs his second Inaugural, and Prof. Phillips his Gettysburg speech. The orchestra by rendering the national airs inspired all with true patriotic devotion.

On Friday evening, Feb. 26, '97, the "L'Agenda" Board of '98 assembled at the home of the editor-in-chief, E. H. Dutton, at 8 p. m. The "grippe" had secured such a tight hold on G. M. Davis, that he could not be present; but the other members showed their appreciation of the repast spread before them. The board—not the "L'Agenda" Board—groaned under its weight of good things. A dainty little menu card, bound with the class colors, gave a list of the edibles. Conversation, witty and courteous, repartee, and, "Please pass the ——," occupied the moments—how many we will not say—which were not spent in satisfying the demands of appetite. When this pleasant task had been attended to, "foot-ball" and "Pillow Dex" were indulged in. Why do we relate our pleasures? It points to the perfect hospitality of the host and his mother. May they live long and read many L'Agendas!

JOINT CLASS BANQUET.

"E duobus unum" was the inscription on the card worn by the members of both the Sophomore and Freshman classes at the reception tendered the class of 1900 by '99 on the evening of March 1.

"True class spirit," said Pres. Harvey in his address of welcome, "does not consist in class fights on the campus but in earnest, conscientious work in our rooms."

Realizing that men and women, having a common purpose, should be friends, not enemies, the class of '99 has established a precedent of which it may well be proud.

The members of both classes assembled at the gymnasium at eight o'clock. Not long afterwards Pres. Harvey, of the Sophomore class, in an address of welcome made all feel that they were welcome. Pres. Morris, of the Freshman class, responded with an address which showed the good feeling which exists between the classes.

The class yells were then given by all present, after which Keen, '99, sang one of our own college songs. The Bucknell Yell next rent the air and resounded until the whole building vibrated as if in sympathy with the loyal students within its walls. The cornet solo by Weymouth, 1900, richly merited the storm of applause which compelled Mr. Weymouth to respond with another selection.

This program was followed by the grand march led by Mr. Wassell, 1900, and Miss Watkins, '99. There were about fifty couples who took part in the march, each couple consisting of a Sophomore and Freshman.

Later in the evening refreshments were served by the class of '99.

The decorations of orange and blue mingled with scarlet and gold together with the pleasant evening enjoyed by all were the result of the earnest labors of the committee of the Sophomore class, consisting of Wm. M. Warren, Miss Watkins, Miss Allen, Leroy Hall and E. C. Conover.

ATHLETICS.

On Thursday 24, the basket ball team journeyed to Williamsport and defeated the Y. M. C. A. of that city by the score of 16 to 8. A large audience, among whom were many Bucknell rooters, viewed the contest. The feature of the game was "Artie" Smith's throwing Bucknell's first goal from a very uneasy and awkward position. The passing of Bucknell's team was not as good as usual. The four posts in the middle of the floor might be sufficient reason for this.

Mulkie Smith	Attack	Sarvey Hoagland (Sims)
Weymouth	Centre	Keissling
Bevan Catterall	Defense	Lamade Harman

Goals from field: Mulkie 2, Smith 2, Weymouth 2, Bevan 2, Sarvey, Hoagland, Sims, Harman.

Referee, Salmon, Y. M. C. A.; Umpire, Garner, B. U.; Timekeeper, Golden; Time, 20 minute halves.

"Eddie" Shortell, who has pitched on the St. Mary's Lyceum team, one of the crack amateur teams of Paterson, N. J., has entered school and will try for the pitcher's box.

The game with U. of P. scheduled for March 20 has been cancelled. The Western trip, which our team was to make during the Spring recess, is also off, since several of the dates have been cancelled.

Manager Lesher announced that the base ball season will open at home with Milton and Selinsgrove. Games have been scheduled with Franklin and Marshall, Gettysburg and State. The latter plays here on May 29. Bucknell plays at State the following Saturday.

The outlook for the relay team is encouraging. Seventeen candidates have presented themselves to Captain Meeker, who says that no one shall go to Philadelphia who has not done a month's faithful training. During this month, if the weather permits, he will have them out every other day; and next month every day. The material is good, and, if the boys follow out the prescribed training program, a team will be turned out that will be a credit to old Bucknell, and that will retrieve the loss of last year.

STATE COLLEGE IS BADLY BEATEN.

Bucknell defeated State last Friday evening by the score 24 to 4. State was outplayed at all points. Bevan threw Bucknell's first goal at the very opening of the game. After this goals were thrown by Bucknell at regular intervals of two minutes, the half closing 14 to 2. The second half was more exciting, being replete with brilliant plays. For a moment State seemed to have the advantage, but a few accurate passes carried the ball to Weymouth, who dropped it in the basket. Then Smith executed a play that won a round of applause, and caused the recording of another goal. Fulton threw one for State. Bucknell threw three more, and then gave an exhibition of fancy passing which was much enjoyed by the spectators. The game closed 24 to 4.

Stevenson and Fulton played well for State, while Smith and Weymouth excelled for Bucknell. The line-up:

BUCKNELL.		STATE.
Mulkie (Capt.) Smith	Attack	Stevenson (Capt.) Fulton
Weymouth	Centre	Clinton
Bevan Catterall	Defense	Lockwood Pearce (Specher)

Goals from field, Smith 5, Weymouth 4, Bevan 2, Mulkie, Fulton 2. Fouls, Catterall, Weymouth, Stevenson, Lockwood. Umpire, Dr. S. B. Newton, U. P. '94. Referee, Mr. Garner, B. U. '99. Time, 15 minute halves.

INSTITUTE ITEMS.

Miss Margaret Montgomery made the Washington's birthday vacation very pleasant for the Misses Miller, DeWitt and Vaughn whom she entertained at her home in McEwensville.

One of the most enjoyable occasions of the term was the program meeting of the Y. W. C. A. on Sunday afternoon, February 28. The subject was "Our graduates who have become eminent in missionary work."

The program, which may be of interest, was as follows:

Singing. Scripture Reading. Prayer.
"Miss Flora M. Clymer, '93"
Miss Myra Sprague.
"Mrs Margaret Thompson Corson, '92"
Miss Jessie Wheeler.
"Mrs. Annie P. Evans Coe, '86"
Miss Edith Phillips.
"Miss Carrie M. Purdy, '84"
Mrs. Larison.
Vocal Solo,
Miss Grace Pretzman.
" Miss Sara C. Krigbaum, 72"
Miss Bertha Watkins.
"Miss Lottie McCreight, '66"
Miss Harriet Vaughan.
"Miss Florence Dysart, '65"
Miss Eliza Bell.
"Miss Mary E. V. Pardoe, '60"
Miss Grace Dewolf.
"Miss Mary W. Burhoe, '80"
Miss Mary Owens.

On the morning of February 22, the Institute girls attended chapel in Bucknell Hall. The program in honor of Lincoln and the patriotic airs as played by the orchestra were greatly enjoyed by all.

Miss Emma Patchin, ex-'94, of Patchinville, recently spent a short time with Miss Viola Pensyl.

We are sorry to say that the "Grippe" has a strong hold upon some of the members of the Institute.

What can be the colors of the class of '98, that they should wish to keep the matter secret until Soiree? Will they surprise us with the red, white and blue?

ACADEMY ITEMS.

At the recent Athletic meeting Rowe was elected manager and Young captain of the Track team.

The weather has been just right for La Grippe and quite a number of the students have been under its power.

Mr. Powell was called home by telegram on Feb. 24th. Very sad news awaited him. Before his arrival his father had passed away. We extend our deepest sympathies in his bereavement.

Many eager glances are cast by anxious eyes from the campus into that promised place where some are not permitted to enter. Patience boys. It is only thirty days. It meant forty years expectancy for the Israelites.

Sixteen members of the Third Form took part in the preliminary contest of declamation on Feb. 27.. The following members were chosen to compete for the prize: Bell, Cunningham, Davis, Elliott, MacCracken, Pitts, Slifer, Steineger and Stewart.

The close relation of College and Academy has been manifested during the past few weeks at the Y. M. C. A. meetings. Few weeks ago Prof. Hulley spoke to the students and on March 2nd Mr. Harvey presented The Student Volunteer work throughout the world. It was a very helpful and interesting meeting.

The Academy challenged Dickinson Seminary to an Interscholastic Debate. All are anxiously awaiting the reply as we are eager for the debate, feeling confident that we will stand chances of winning. Prof. Edwards has offered to defray the expenses of the debate if we win. This should be an incentive for double effort on our part.

PERSONALS.

Stearns—Bucknell. A large wedding of especial interest, which occured recently was that of Miss Margaret Crozer Bucknell and Mr. Chas. Falconer Stearns, of Providence, R. I. The bride is the eldest daughter of Mrs. Emma Ward Bucknell and the late Wm. Bucknell, well known during his lifetime for his many magnificent gifts to religious institutions, and now gratefully remembered by Bucknell University which Institution bears his name in honor of his interest manifested in the University in the time of need. Mrs. Stearns is a decendant of the Rev. Dr. William Ward, for twenty-two years Missionary to Assam. The groom is a prominent lawyer in Providence, and a member of the Rhode Island State Legislature. Mr. Stearns is an Alumnus of Amherst College and of the Harvard Law School.

'77. FOLLMER—HASSENPLUG. On the 16th of February occured the wedding of Mr. W. R. Follmer and Miss Eudora Hassenplug, at the residence of Dr. Jacob H. Hassenplug, of Phila. After a sojourn of a few days they returned to Lewisburg, to their home on East Market street. Mr. Follmer is a member of the Union County Bar and is practicing in this place.

'84. Ernest L. Tustin, Esq., a member of the Board of Trustees of the University, will leave in the Spring for a three-months trip through the West and Alaska for the health of his wife who will accompany him.

Ex.-'86. Mr. Jonathan Heaton, a member of the Board of Education of Spokane, Washington, recently acknowledged the receipt of one of our catalogues, at that place.

'88. Rev. R. B. McDanel lectured in the Tabernacle Baptist Church, Harrisburg, Pa., Feb. 12, on "How our New Testament Grew."

'92. At a recent meeting of the Chicago Baptist Ministers Conference, a paper was read on "Foot Ball." Rev. A. R. E. Wyant, pastor at Morgan Park, who was called out in the discussion, said that most of the reports in the papers about men being hurt seriously in the game are untrue. He vigorously defended the game. Mr. Wyant was for seven years a member of the foot ball elevens of Bucknell University and of the University of Chicago.

'94. Mr. E. A. Bush is a travelling salesman for the Lackawanna Lumber Co., of Scranton, Pa.

'95. R. H. Simpson is the first assistant engineer in the Maintenance of Way Department of the "Big 4" Railroad with his office at Cleveland, Ohio. Mr. Simpson attended Cornell after leaving here and was here for a few days during Commencement week two years ago.

ALBANY TEACHERS' AGENCY.

Provides Schools of All Grades with Competent Teachers.

The following extract from a letter shows what one teacher thinks of the Albany Agency:—

"My visit at West Stockbridge was very short but entirely successful, and I secured the position at a satisfactory salary. Let me in the warmest terms thank you for the interest shown me during the past summer, and believe that with me your Agency will always be first in mind—whether I am the one to seek its services or am called upon to recommend an Agency to some friend. Very truly yours, Frederick D. Hayward, Ward Hill, Mass., Aug. 30, '95."

Calls for teachers to begin work in September will begin to come in immediately after the first of January, and those who wish to secure positions should register at once.

Correspondence is invited.

VOL. XVI. LEWISBURG, PA., MARCH 25, 1897. NO. 11.

A WOMAN IN LITERATURE.

About forty-five years ago, in the far-away Island of Tasmania, a little girl was born. (Her father, Thomas Arnold, an able writer, is the second son of the great teacher of Rugby. Her mother was the daughter of an ex-governor of Tasmania.) The wee girlie's early years were not passed in her birth place, Hobart Town, but happily, at the very fountain head of learning, at Oxford, England. Her uncle, Matthew Arnold, was at that time, Prof. of Poetry at Oxford. No wonder that, reared in this stimulating intellectual centre, with inherited aptitude for literary expression, she was known, when quite a young girl, as a writer of learned essays. Not long ago, being called upon to distribute some prizes at Canning Town in connection with the Mansfield S. S. movement, she made an admirable address, from which I quote: "Much of what I have done in literature is due to the fact, that, as a young girl, I was able to feed my imagination in the shady corners of the Bodteian library at Oxford. Having a free hand there, I picked up a deal of desultory information covering a wide field; and I laid the foundation for that love of books which has become a part of my life. Especially do I set value upon the uses of biography. Dr. Jowett was wont to say that in the future instruction would be conveyed almost entirely through the medium of biography, beginning with the Life of Christ and so proceeding through all the records of great examples, left by the heroes of history as foot prints on the sands of time. Finally, I think largely through books and reading, humanity will be prepared for the foundation of that Kingdom of God upon earth, for which poets and philosophers have sighed and dreamed since Plato wrote the Republic, and St. Augustine his "City of God." When twenty one years of age, Mary Arnold became Mrs. Thomas Humphrey Ward. Her husband was at that time on the staff of the London Times, as writer on Art topics. Her country home is not far from the home of the Rothchilds, in the quaint little hamlet of Aldbury, numbering about 800 souls. This sleepy village nestles at the foot of the Chiltern Hills, and the quiet is disturbed only by the ring of the blacksmith's anvil or the occasional rattle of a cart.

You catch a glimpse of the house through the white painted lodge gates, and you approach it through an avenue of tall trees; in front is a well kept lawn. On entering the house, one is immediately impressed with the size of the hall and reception rooms; another notable feature is the prevailing lightness of tone, increased by light furnishings. On the walls are choice pictures from the old masters of the Dutch and Flemish schools, also some water colors well worthy of inspection. On the shelves are a wealth of books. From the windows one sees a beautiful country with grand old trees; peeping out from among them is Ashbridge monument, erected in memory of the Duke of Bridgewater. Should you have the good fortune to meet the gentle mistress of this quaint mansion, you will be charmed by her gracious manners, and the quiet dignity of her bearing. You would not call her a handsome woman but very winning is the merry glinting of her luminous eyes, which vary in hue, being a child-like blue when she smiles, and a soft brown when she is in deep thought, her hair is bound to break into waves though she combs it as smoothly as possible, on either side of her forehead. She is fair and of medium size. Her voice is clear, sympathetic and finely cadenced, and her conversation, couched in the choicest words, is refreshing and suggestive. She planned to visit the U. S. in 1890, being greatly interested in us, partly because of our enthusiasm over her first famous book and partly because of what her uncle Matthew Arnold had told her of us. You may be interested to hear what he wrote of us in one of his letters home:

"I do not find much real DEPTH in American life. I have seen no American yet, except Morton of Cambridge, who does not seem to desire constant publicity, and to be on the go all the day long. It is very fatiguing. I thank God it only confirms me in the desire to 'hide my life' (as the Greek philosopher recommends) as much as possible. Yet I find the people very kind, inconceivably kind."

Mrs. Humphrey Ward began her literary career by contributing to periodicals, essays on Spanish literature. Her first published book was a child's story, next a short novel "Miss Bretherton," the heroine of which, the public asserted, must be Mary Anderson, because the young woman was good, charming, handsome, a great theatrical success, but not a great actress.

In 1888 "Robert Elsmere" appeared. Her father states that she and her family were simply astounded at the sensation created by that novel. Wise and devoted counsellors, after reading the manuscript, gravely advised her not to have it printed, and it is a mystery to them, why that book became a land-mark in fiction. It has been justly said, that, in spite of its great power of passion and style, "Robert Elsmere" is scarcely more than a "tract for the times." Its immense and immediate popularity, notwithstanding its grave theme, was a sign that it was a book of the hour rather than of the centuries. Its spell lay not so much in enduring qualities, as in the passionate intensity with which it touched questions that were tormenting the minds of this generation. If you will read the North American Review for January 1889, you will find that Wm. E. Gladstone, Joseph Cook, E. E. Hale, Julia Ward Howe, and others have thoughtfully reviewed the moral problems suggested in this remarkable book, one of which is, Shall righteousness be founded upon facts of human consciousness, or upon doctrines taught by creeds and churches. One thing is certain, "If Mrs. Ward's understanding has erred, the inner sanctuary of her heart is at one with Christ."

"David Grieve," her next book, is in every way a stronger and finer piece of fiction, it gives the history of a number of persons with dramatic ease and freedom. Every portrait is distinct, not one is blurred—this shows a master touch. Mrs. Ward is a true artist by the grace of God, as well as by culture. Some critics think the key-note of this book is the power of heredity, but I think the true note is struck in these words, "It seemed to David that he had been taught of God, through natural affection, through repentance, through sorrow." Mrs. Ward teaches that life itself gives illumination to see the way homeward to our father's house. "Bessie Castrell," a short story of about 25,000 words, narrates a catastrophe in the lives of these people, coming swiftly and passing away as suddenly—forgotten by all but its victims. The story is full of bitter experience, but it is a triumph of literary art. Mrs. Ward received for serial and book rights in this story the tidy sum of $15,000, or about sixty cents a word! For her last book she received for the serial rights alone, $20,000, the largest sum ever paid for a serial. Finally we will consider her latest books, which gave to the world the grandest woman in fiction. "Dinah Morris" and "Rom-o-la" conceived with all the dramatic art of Geo. Elliott, fall far short of "Marcella Maxwell," in magnetic power for arousing what is noblest in every life she touches.

We follow with absorbing interest the development of this ideal woman, from her turbulent childhood, as told in "Marcella," until in the closing chapters of Sir George Tressady. As Lady Maxwell she is the truest earthly friend that man or woman can know. With what loving tenderness she helps the shallow, selfish Letty Tressady to rise to a better self. One is the nobler for an acquaintance with such a woman as Marcella Maxwell; and if we look at the world through her eyes we shall feel how responsible women are for present social conditions. There is doubtless no more learned woman in the world to-day than Mrs. Ward, certainly no woman who can equal her as an author. She is an example to all writers, in her painstaking revision of her works. Sir Geo. Tressady was re-written several times before it was put in print, and the "Critic" is authority for the statement, that, even after the pages were stereotyped she virtually rewrote it twice. This book reached its second edition before it was a month old. Whoever has a message to the world, will find in Mrs.

Ward a model in profound research, dignity of expression, and earnestness of purpose, but, you may say, not in BREVITY, no ; and this is why ; she considers everything that interests humanity as material for fiction, and naturally, social problems, politics, philosophy, religion, all enter into each of her models. The power of a great genius throbs in the books, —the glamour of a great imagination plays over her pages. She is in daily intercourse with the most thoughtful and cultivated people of England. She worked with Dr. Martineau and Stopford Brooke in founding the "University Extension Course" in order that the poor of London might have the best lectures on science, literature and religion. She has just succeeded in raising funds for erecting in the Bloomsbury quarter of London, a "Passamore Edwards House" after the plan of the Loynbee Hall. Like her grandfather, Dr. Arnold, she has a practical sympathy and an untiring energy in carrying out her clear convictions. No woman is so at the heart of English life and thought, or is more effectively helping to solve some of the great problems of democracy, that our republic has not reached. "Self-denial" is the law of her life, though the word never passes her lips.

MY VISION.

Once when midnight winds were beating on my home with dismal sleeting,
And the moments swiftly fleeting soothed my weary soul to rest;
With the lamplights o'er me streaming, fell my soul to restless dreaming,
In my feverish fancy, seeming lost within a wilderness.

All my soul within me trembled, for the frowning hills resembled
Titan gods in league assembled, and the night winds in the trees
Seemed like slow funeral dirges, rolling on in billowy surges,
Over wild sequestered verges in disconsolate harmonies.

All my silent dread enhancing through the gloom I saw advancing
A shade of darkness, un-entrancing through the silence moving slow ;
A shade that roamed by waters stygian, one of those who from bright regions,
Swift were hurled in shrieking legions downward in blaspheming woe.

All the burden on me pressing, and my secret sorrow guessing,
He approached me, and addressing my sad soul in this wise spoke :
"Lost one in the forest dreary, why thus wander weak and weary,
When no friend with accents cheery can thy burden lighter make.

"Why this sad and doleful sighing, why this voice in darkness crying,
Why not seek relief in dying, and the peace for which you crave ?
Then when stormclouds high are sailing, o'er the hills their vapors trailing,
Rest, while midnight winds are wailing a sad requiem o'er thy grave ;

"N'er shall loved ones hear thy greeting, all life's joys are swift and fleeting ;
E'en thy throbbing heart is beating but a death-march to the tomb."
Thus this scheming shade and craven, banished from the joys of heaven,
Black as plume of crow or raven plunged my soul in deeper gloom.

All my soul within is burning, and in bitter grief is yearning
For a dear one ne'er returning, who received my love and trust ;
But I'll be a wanderer weary, crying in the forest dreary,
None to soothe with accents cheery, ere faithless to the Good and Just.

Cease that sad and bitter longing, for the vagrant memories thronging
In thy mind are those belonging to a dead and happier day,
Cease thy spirit's doleful quaking, cease thy sad heart's inner aching—
Angel music o'er me breaking drove the shade in haste away.

O, that loving words endearing, tender, comforting and cheering,
When no gleam of hope's appearing might renew my peace destroyed.
In answer to my heart's appealing a whisper came, the Sight revealing,
Sweet, like twilight music, stealing downward from the azure void.

All my weary spirits thrilling and new faith and hope instilling,
Like the thrush's sylvan trilling seemed the whisper to my ear ;

It renewed my spirit yearning, changed to joy my bitter mourning,
And my former peace returning filled me with content most dear.

And the night wind in the larches seemed like slow majestic marches,
Ringing through the lofty arches of some gray cathedral dome;
All my pain and sorrow fleeing, joy came trembling into being,
And my eyes were blest with seeing from afar my heavenly home.

For as with prophetic vision, when I made my wise decision,
Gazed I over realms Elysian where the saints immortal be.
And my spirit heard the singing, heard the chimes celestial ringing,
And beheld bright seraphs ringing o'er the tideless crystal sea.

Banished all my ancient grieving, and the light and truth receiving,
I am trusting and believing when I cannot understand
When the sunset's golden glory falls on craggy summits hoary
Angel footfalls in the glory call to mind the better land.

O my brother are you mourning for the loved ones ne'er returning,
Is your soul within you yearning for the dear ones passed from earth?
While the hours are swiftly flying is your soul in sadness sighing,
Gazing on the embers dying as they glow upon the hearth?

O, if blest with spirit hearing where no ray of light's appearing
Many loving words endearing might we hear in accents low;
We might hear the thrilling chorus of our loved ones gone before us
In the ether breaking o'er us in the midnight of our woe.

MT. PLEASANT LETTER.

Mr. Editor Mirror:

In complying with your request of a recent date, I am at a loss to know the scope allowed me in speaking of the conjoint interests of the Institure and Bucknell. Academy life is much the same everywhere, and altogether uninteresting to the man who has been through it all, so that I much fear I shall tax the patience of many of your readers with facts which are of interest only to those who have both schools at heart. However, I shall aim to speak very briefly of Bucknell's interest here in general without dwelling upon details. And I may say by way of further introduction, and in anticipation of what follows that at no time previous to this has so much attention in this section been directed to Bucknell and her successes.

For many years there has been an interchange of students and teachers between the Institute and Bucknell which has knit the two together in a way not otherwise possible. With the Institute we have come to couple Bucknell as a matter of course, unquestionably to the advantage of both. The feeling of affiliation has turned the attention of many to Bucknell and have kept students who have entered its halls in touch with all the interests of the Institute. In consequence, a fellow-feeling has grown up, rather than sprung up, between the two schools which will not wither so long as their mutual confidence remains unshaken. This is as it should be. Diversified interests engender feelings of dissatisfaction and disunion fatal to the best results in a school of this kind which draws from all classes of people.

It is not to be supposed, however, that the Institute can turn over to Bucknell or to any Baptist college all her college aspirants. Though itself denominational, like most schools, it draws from many denominations, and the more because no school of its kind competes with it in its vicinity. It has always had and has now representations in most of the colleges of the State and in a few of other States. But there is a growing tendency, as it seems, to look upon Bucknell as a college, and not alone as a Baptist college open to Baptist students—a tendency which may culminate in a more or less complete breaking down of the denominational barrier, and in a recognition of superior advantages over denominational preference so strong in this section. Nevertheless, it is at least safe to say that nearly nine-tenths of all Baptist students enter Bucknell not so much through the influence of adherents as by reason of its own prevailing influence over this section, and its marked progress within recent years as well as its convenient location. And at present we have several promising students who are looking forward to Bucknell as the college of their own choice, regardless of any existing conditions which might have influence. As for anything further, it would be much the same with us as with any school similarly situated. The claims of Bucknell are ever before us, not thrust upon us, but silently, and unostentatiously asserted in numerous ways. Upon our reading tables, for instance, may be found the MIRROR, copies of the L'Agenda, Views of Buildings and Grounds, and a neatly bound Catalogue. From time to time may be seen in our daily press accounts of athletic victories and an occasional Waterloo, and that austere body "The Faculty and Other Officers," engage our respectful attention through various channels. Our interest, doubly strengthened by bonds of denomination, and by sameness of purpose, is not likely to die out when each year gives new cause for growth. What the Institute promises Bucknell is the best it can give—the best prepared students under the circumstances, the best influence it can exert in its sphere, and its continued best wishes. Sincerely,

F. W. JACKSON.

A LETTER FROM BURMA.

[Through the kindness of Prof. Phillips we are enabled to give to our readers a brief extract of a letter from Dr. Elton S. Corson who, with his wife, sailed for Burma from America last December. Dr. Corson is a graduate of the University of the class of '92. Mrs. Corson a graduate of the Institute of the class of '92.]

RANGOON RIVER
JANUARY 27, '97.

MY DEAR LLEWELLYN:

We are now lying at anchor, the voyage nearly ended......We left Liverpool on the staunch ship Burma Dec. 21......There were but eleven in the company......We had a good supply of standard novels and other books and were content to walk and read for the first few days, but wanted to change, so various games were introduced .....We had worship on board on Sundays and were much benefited..... After a few days we sighted Portugal and ran along the shore watching the villages with their churches and nunneries.

Then Gibralter was the topic of conversation......Morocco soon appeared in the darkness with its street lights......The next morning revealed the Sierras of Spain snowcapped and reflected in a glassy sea as smooth as any lake and reflecting the deep blue of a fathomless abyss.......The next day found us on the classical Mare Magnum where the fleets of Rome and Carthage once ruled supreme . .. But we are bound for Malta and wondering what we shall see at classical Melitus. We approach the island in the gray mists of the morning and the hills and fortresses were ablaze in the sunlight while cool and crisp the sea breezes blew across the deck......We dropped anchor in a bay surrounded with fortress crowned hills......The ship was surrounded by gaily painted gondolas and a jargon of voices tried to bargain with us to carry us ashore......At the quay cabmen and guides fusiladed us, but we determined to go alone. .....We ascended a series of stairs to reach the main portion of the city where we saw the Governor's palace, closed on account of its being a legal holiday. Beautiful courts surrounded the palace and a band was playing martial airs......Malta with its 75,000 people and 4,590 priests is the ancient seat of the Knights of St. John. We went to the cathedral where the Archbishop was to officiate. We saw him enter with a large retinue of priests. They went inside the altar and the show began the chant which one of the party likened to a load of calves bawling.......The church dates its foundation back to the time of the Crusades. On the exterior it is far from attractive, but once inside you see the work of the ancient masters, frescoing by Raphael and a long painting of the beheading of John the Baptist, rare mosaics and castings of coats of arms......St. Paul was wrecked on an adjoining island ......The Maltans are typical beggars.

Next we steam away for Port Said. The muddy water apprises us that we are approaching the Nile mouths. We had hoped to find a typical oriental city but French engineers had constructed the plan and instituted the style of the buildings...... This place depends upon the traffic through the canal for its maintenance. Having several hours we went ashore, walked to the post office and several English shops, and then rode to the Arab Quarters where we saw the sons of Ishmael much as their father begat them. The Mohammedan mosque was the centre of attraction. With sandals on our feet we entered the sacred precints, where the dim religious light revealed the devotees sitting and standing with their anxious faces toward Mecca.

We come to the ship and soon passed on through the canal...... From Suez we steamed out upon the Red Sea...... We saw Mt. Sinai in the distance and of course passed over where the Jews crossed. We saw Mocha, and doubted much if such a barren region could produce so much celebrated coffee. I was told that not more than a ship load is sent from there a year... ..On the Indian Ocean great schools of flying fish skimmed over the water, some falling on the deck...... A few days brought us to Ceylon, a bright gem in the ocean, green from shore to hill tops, palms waving their tressy frondes in the sea breezes, pogodas towering above the hill tops, very beautiful to look upon "and only man is vile." After six days we sighted the low lands of Burma...... We had a splendid reception at Rangoon. We are now pleasantly situated at Taungoo, 166 miles from Rangoon. Fraternally Yours,

ELTON S. CORSON.

COLLEGE SPIRIT.

College spirit of the right kind is a good thing.

There is a kind of spirit existing which is called by the frivolous and unthoughtful student College Spirit. Were it the criterion by which College Spirit in general is judged, it would reflect badly upon student life in the Institution. This spirit is a great hinderance to the development of true College Spirit. It is manifested in several ways:

First, in the so-called class spirit as exhibited in class fights, which are a result of encroaching upon the rights of other classes.

According to this standard, the student who does not possess such spirit, and in consequence does not put forth every effort to make things as unpleasant as possible for his fellow student, is not a man, but lacks courage and manly spirit.

This so called manly spirit finds expression in waylaying a fellow student, in taking him by force, in binding him as though guilty of some great crime, in depriving him of all rights to act according to his own desires or judgments, and in decorating another in such a manner as would be suitable to an American Indian or some other wild, uncivilized being.

This gentlemanly spirit is further manifested in encroaching upon the rights of railroad companies, (as was done by certain students when they boarded the train for Milton without paying their fare) in encroaching upon the rights of business men and property owners, by destroying property and forcing an entrance into private apartments. If such things were done under other circumstances, the offenders would be dealt with as housebreakers and thieves; but, because they are the expression of class-spirit they are admissable, even justifiable.

This spirit, when judged by the standard of true ethics, is condemned. According to our moral laws we are duty bound to love our fellow-men. A child in a family is under obligation to love its brother because he is his brother. We are all members of one great family, and are under obligation to love all men as our brothers.

Such College Spirit is further condemned by the fact that it exerts an evil influence upon the younger element connected with the Institution. It arouses in them a spirit of antagonism, of pugnaciousness and of rowdyism. Furthermore, it counteracts to a great extent the refining influence of education upon the intellect, morals and manners.

The argument advanced in favor of this so-called college spirit is: that it develops in a man that spirit necessary to meet the difficulties of life. It is a blessing that most students do not think thus.

EDITORIALS.

The action of the Freshmen, Sophomores and Juniors in playing inter-class games of basket ball in order to reduce the debt of the Athletic Association is a very commendable one. Despite the strenuous efforts that have been put forth to lessen it, the Association is still badly in debt. The hearty support of every member of the entire school is needed to relieve the burden. Will you do your share towards it?

The basket ball season closed very auspiciously. Our team is to be congratulated on its efficient and faithful work. Beginning the season almost under the ban of the Executive Board as far as financial matters go, they have more than fulfilled our most sanguine expectations, our wildest dreams. Of the five games they have played, one with Danville Y. M. C. A., two with State College, one with the University of Pennsylvania, and one with Williamsport Y. M. C. A., they have suffered defeat but once. All honor and praise to our victorious team!

Commencing with the present issue, a series of articles will appear from time to time on Woman in the various spheres of Literature, Music, History and Art. This series, written by prominent women, promises to be very interesting and instructive. The first, "A Woman in Literature," by Mrs. Larison, is well worthy of the attention and careful perusal of everyone.

Several new electives have been offered for next term. Among these a much needed course in Elocution has finally been added to the list. This course is especially valuable to those who expect to engage in public speaking to some extent, yet do not intend to take a course in a professional school, or if they do, have not the time nor opportunity to attend to the matter there. The medical preparatory department has been strengthened by the addition of a course in Materia Medica and one in Bacteriology. Also an elective in Comparative Philology is now offered to the Seniors for the first time. These branches are all important and are deserving of a place in the already extensive Curriculum.

Since another paper, The Orange and Blue, devoted almost exclusively to athletics and local news, is being published weekly by the students, it has been deemed expedient and advisable to change the character of our paper to some extent. Heretofore the MIRROR has tried to touch college life on all sides, to be a faithful reflector of all the doings of the University. Now, since we have another paper devoted to matters of local interest, the policy of the MIRROR will be to give more attention to matters that are of interest to the Alumni, for to them, more than ever before, it will have to look for support. The local column will be a mere calendar of events, briefly stated. The number of editors in the literary and personal departments will be doubled, especial stress being placed upon these two departments. The others will remain the same. It is hoped that the MIRROR may interest and meet the needs of the students through its literary productions, which will be of the highest possible degree of merit, and that it may appeal to the Alumni through its personal columns especially. As the number of the Alumni increases each year, some common bond is needed to draw all hearts into closer touch with each other, a closer brotherhood, and to keep alive in every breast a pure and warm love for old Bucknell. This mission the MIRROR hopes to fulfill.

ALUMNI NOTES.

'51. By the death of J. Merrill Linn, Esq., Rev. S. M. Lyons of Richland, N. J., who was mentioned in our last issue, and Prof. Henry Pomerene of Philadelphia are the only surviving members of the first class graduated from the University. Prof. Pomerene is a Professor of Music at 2813 N. 11th St., Philadelphia, Pa. Rev. Lyons now the oldest Alumnus is still in active service, though seventy years of age, and in a letter to the editor recently, expressed the hope that he might stand on the "Hill" again in 1901, the 50th year from his graduation.

'52. The Rev. A. J. Hoy, formerly of N. Cramer Hill, N. J., is now living at 221 W. Johnson St., Germantown, Pa.

'52. Dr. Geo. J. McLeod is a prosperous physician of West Philadelphia.

'52. Rev. Amos B. Still retired from the ministry several years ago and is now living on East Market St., Danville, Pa.

Ex-'52. Mr. John A. Grier was one of three young men who left college at the beginning of the Senior year. Mr. Grier served as third assistant engineer in the United States Navy for ten years, including 1860–1865. Some years later he began a term of nearly ten more as an employe in the Mint, at Philadelphia. He gained quite a reputation as a speaker and writer during the "late campaign" through a little book entitled "Our Silver Coinage." Mr. Grier has been engaged in mechanical pursuits for some time, with an office at 1436 Monadnock Building, Chicago, Illinois.

'53. Rev. J. Spencer Kennard is now located in Pittsburgh.

'54. Mr. Edwin R. Peckens, who is Asst. Supt. in the Coal Dept. of the D. & H. Canal Co., at Plymouth and who has general supervision over five of the company's breakers there, replied to inquiries most pleasantly and enclosed the amount of a year's subscription.

'54. Of the Class of '54, five of whom are now living, probably the one best known among the friends of Bucknell is Dr. Robert Lowry, of Plainfield, N. J. Dr. Lowry came to Lewisburg at a time when all the classes were held in the old Baptist church and fifteen years after graduation he again returned to assume the double duties of pastor and teacher of Rhetoric in the University, which position he held for a period of six years. It has been his custom to attend the Annual Commencements since that time and he hopes to be present again this year.

'55. Mr. Alfred Hayes continues to practice law at this place.

Dr. Geo. A. Peltz, an earnest friend of the University, associate pastor of Grace Temple, Broad and Berks Sts., Phila., in a few words expresses exactly the sentiment at Bucknell when he says, "A serious fault in all things at Bucknell has been the new generation, which seems to ignore the old. The first students of the institution should not be permitted to drift away. The tide of time does that fast enough. If the early work at Lewisburg, and the workers too, can be recognized more fully, it will win many a friend and helper."

'57. Mr. J. A. Seiler is reported to be doing well in the produce business, at 8th and Vine Sts., Phila.

'72. Rev. J. H. Chambers, pastor of the First Baptist Church of West Chester, has resigned his position and has taken up his abode for the present in Philadelphia.

'85. A number of articles have appeared in recent numbers of the Commonwealth written by Rev. Samuel Z. Batten, pastor of the Baptist Church of Morristown, N. J.

'88. Rev. F. H. Senft is at the head of the Christian Alliance organization of Penna.

The American Baptist Publication Society has published a volume entitled "Christianity and Prosperity," written by Dr. A. E. Waffle, formerly professor of Rhetoric in our institution.

'93. Mr. E. M. Heim, who has been pursuing post-graduate work at the University of Chicago for several years, appeared in the Journal of Political Economy of March in a review of Keasbey's "Nicarauga Canal and the Monroe Doctrine." Mr. Heim is at present making a "little visit" at Bucknell.

'95. Ezra Allen, who has been an instructor at Perkiomen Seminary for a year or more, is expecting to spend the Easter vacation with his sister in Lewisburg.

'96. Rev. E. R. Powell, pastor of the Laporte and Eaglesmere churches, has accepted a call to the church at Rock Run.

NOTES FROM THE COLLEGE WORLD.

While Johns Hopkins University is closing its doors to women, it is cheering to quote from Brown and White the following: "A women's gymnasium, to cost $50,000, will soon be built at the University of Michigan."

Apropos to the above it may be interesting to know that of the 8175 medical students in the University of Paris, 154 are women; also that, in 1891, Mr. Washington Duke gave $85,000 to Trinity College, Durham, N. C., and that recently he offered the same institution $100,000 more provided it opens its doors to women." The quotation is from The Teacher.

A professor of systematic theology, being unable to meet his classes on account of illness, posted the following notice: "The Seniors may keep on through 'Purgatory,' and the middle class may continue the 'Descent' through Hell," until further notice.—Ex. from St. John's Collegian.

The University of Berlin, the largest in the Christian world, has 8343 students. About one fourth of these students are Americans. The Stetson Collegian. Excluding the University of Paris?—[Ed.]

The Teacher is a welcome visitor. We are glad to number it among our exchanges. Its articles are of a true educational character, and up to date. It seems a real addition to our school literature. In its "notes on persons and things" there is given an amount of information, with respect to the college world, that is found probably in no other one journal. [Ed.]

Will our esteemed contemporary, The St. Johns Collegian, please kindly suggest the kind and character of the matter that should be found in a fortnightly publication? The answer will probably help many college papers, provided it defines "literary matter."—[Ed].

There are a few of the exchange editors of our contemporaries who seem to think they know more about what ought to go into other college papers than those who edit them.—The Thielensian. Good.—Ed.

The public schools of the country furnish four-fifths of the students at Cornell.

UNIVERSITY ITEMS.

COLLEGE.

The attention of all the students of the University is called to the visit of Mr. Chas. T. Studd who will spend April 3d and 4th at Bucknell in the interests of Y. M. C. A. work and the cause of Missions. Mr. Studd is a graduate of Cambridge University, Eng., and is widely known as the champion cricketer of England and as the leader of the famous Cambridge Band which received such widespread notice some years ago. Mr. Studd will give most of his time during his stay here to private interviews. Besides a few other open meetings Mr. Studd will speak in the Baptist church on Sunday, April 4.

On Sunday April 11, Dr. Barnes, of Pittsburg will deliver the annual sermon before the Christian Associations of the University. On Monday evening following, he will lecture in Bucknell Hall. The lecture will be free. Pres. Harris will preach in Dr. Barnes' church on the same Sunday.

A very interesting and instructive lecture was given before the Chemical and Physical Society on Thursday p. m. Feb. 18, on the subject of "Polarized Light." The lecture was illustrated by an electric Polariscope.

The Junior Debate was held in Bucknell Hall on Friday evening, Feb. 19. Messrs. Anderson, Diggs, Dutton and Forrester were chosen for the final debate.

Owing to unexpected delays the Song Book Board wish to announce that the University Song Books will not be ready for distribution before April 10, '97.

Instructor Davis will have a class in Bacteriology next term. A high-power Bausch and Lumb microscope has been secured for the use of the class.

On Saturday evening, Feb. 13, the annual contest in elocution between the ladies of the Sophomore and Freshman classes took place in Bucknell Hall.

The College Literary Societies gave their first Annual Reception in Tustin Gymnasium on Thursday evening, February 18.

Registrar Gretzinger recently made a ten days trip through the lumber and oil region in the interest of the University.

The University band gave a concert in Bucknell Hall on the evening of the 11th inst.

Every one should read Mrs. Larison's article on "A Woman in Literature."

INSTITUTE.

The March meeting of the Alumnæ Club was an occasion of especial interest owing to the presence of Mrs. Horace Brock, President of the Women's Federation of Clubs of Penna.

The program rendered was as follows :

Welcome to Mrs. Brock by the President,
MRS. W. C. GRETZINGER.
Music. Orchestra.
A Woman in Music,
MISS SARA VANGUNDY.
A Woman in History—"Colonial Period,"
MISS ANNIE EVANS.

Refreshments.

On Tuesday evening March sixteenth, Dr. Lincoln Hulley read some beautiful selections from Burns, for the benefit of the Literature class, in the Institute parlors. A number of friends of the class were also present. We are very grateful to Dr. Hulley for this literary treat.

The prize essay contest for the members of the Senior and Fourth Year Classes took place Friday morning, March nineteenth. The subject for the Seniors was the Deserted Village and for the Fourth Years, scenes from The Courtship of Miles Standish.

Miss Emma Kunkle, '96, who has been ill with typhoid fever, has left the hospital and is at her home in Newberry. During her convalescence, she expects to pay a visit to her friends in Lewisburg.

The School of Music will furnish a large contingent to the teaching force at Mt. Gretna during the summer of '97. Dr. Aviragnet, Miss Aiken and Mr. Brown Martin have accepted engagements.

Mrs. Larison has the itinerary ready for the party of Bucknell girls who will accompany her to the Capital. The party will leave Lewisburg by the Penna. railway March twenty-fifth.

Miss Anna Pensyl, Class '93, spent Sunday, March fourteenth, with her sister at the Institute.

ACADEMY.

Hermenia elected the following officers to serve during the spring term : Pres., Dewitt ; Vice Pres., Ayars ; Sec'y., Riemer ; Treas., Cunningham ; First Critic, Jacquemin ; Second Critic, Burpee ; Censor, Senn ; Sergeant at Arms, Sherbondy.

The officers for Adelphia for the spring term are as follows : Pres., Alexander ; Vice Pres., Pitts ; Sec'y., Stephens ; Treas., I. S. Hoffa ; First Critic, M. Davis ; Second Critic, Thomas ; Chaplain, Skinner ; Sergeant at Arms, Wolfe.

The following have been elected officers of the Y. M. C. A. for the ensuing year : President, James McCrackan ; Vice President, David Pitts ; Rec. Sec'y, T. A. Sherbondy ; Cor. Sec'y, L. R. Rank ; Treas. J. N. Evans.

Through the kindness of Mr. and Mrs Whitman the Hermenia Literary Society enjoyed a pleasant evening on March

ATHLETICS.

The Gymnasium Exhibition given on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 20, showed that effective work has been done by the instructors, Messrs. Bunnell and Cober.

The Sophomore Class holds the championship in Basket Ball having defeated the Juniors 17 to 7 and the Freshmen in two games which resulted with the following scores: 14 to 8 and 12 to 10.

STATE COLLEGE WINS.

The basket ball team was beaten at State College on Saturday evening last by the score 10-7. Weymouth being ill, Mulkie played centre. Because of the rearrangement of the men, they were unable to execute the system of play that they have practiced all season. Considering the disadvantage, they made a creditable showing.

THE LINE UP.

BUCKNELL MIRROR.

Vol. XVI. Lewisburg, Pa., April 10, 1897. No. 12.

A COLONIAL LADY, MARGARET WINTHROP.

Dr. H. L. Wayland has, in one of his inimitable after dinner speeches before the New England society, expressed the hope that there may one day be Pilgrim Mothers' celebrations which shall outnumber the gatherings of those who now meet to honor the memory of the Pilgrim Fathers, adding that these worthy matrons have an especial claim upon the consideration in view of the fact that they had to endure the Pilgrim Fathers in addition to all else that fell to their lot.

Alice Morse Earle, in her "Colonial Dames and Good Wives," describes a group of these colonial women who lived neighbors to each other in Boston and says the dame of highest degree and perhaps the most beautiful personally in this little group was Margaret Tyndal Winthrop, the "loving, faythful yoke-fellow" of Governor John Winthrop.

Margaret Tyndal's home had been in sunny Essex in England, and down the narrow byways and lanes of this sunny Essex, there rode one September day, over two centuries and a-half ago, an English gentleman a-courting. He was not a gay and gallant cavalier, but a grave Puritan lawyer and country squire. The widowed Lady Anne Tyndal looked with much favor upon John Winthrop's courtship of her daughter Margaret.

Early in the progress of the courtship, a love-letter was written to Margaret Tyndal, not by her lover, but by her lover's father, Adam Winthrop. In quaint expression he faithfully promises that his son would be a "kinde and lovinge husbande" and Margaret would be "haypye in matchinge" with him.

Mrs. Earle quotes portions of John Winthrop's letters to Margaret to show their remarkable Biblical wording so characteristic of the man and the times. Margaret said of one of these letters that it served as a sermon to her.

We must pass over the coming of Margaret Tyndal to the old manor-house, the home of John Winthrop, how his profession and office kept him much time in London, the letters exchanged between them which have been several times printed, and the struggle undergone by John Winthrop in making his final decision to come to the new colony. There was one sad element in this important decision, Margaret Winthrop must be left for a time in England. The tears still stain the sad and loving letter which he sent to her after the parting.

But the weary time of separation passed and Margaret Winthrop came to her home in the new, strange land. For the arrival of his wife and oldest son, John Winthrop, Jr., the governor's journal says: "We kept a day of Thanksgiving at Boston."

On the main street in Boston, now Washington St., near the site of the Old South Church, was the home of Margaret Winthrop. The tract of land came to be known as "The Green," the choice in this matter being undoubtedly determined by the spring of water that bubbled up and overflowed just to the north of the spot on which was to be the home. In a certain deed it is described as "that my lott or parcel of land in Boston aforesaid called 'The Greene' lying by the Springe." We can imagine Margaret Winthrop taking pail in hand to go down to fill it from the spring that still flows under the basement of the new Post Office. The house was fairly commodious, for we read of large gatherings being held in it. It stood until Revolutionary times, occupied later by the Old South Church as a parsonage, and its fate was to be destroyed later for firewood by British soldiers, as was the row of fine buttonwoods that skirted the street.

Margaret Winthrop, known as the "Governor's Lady," was happy in her Boston home, for here she "could most glorify God and enjoy the presence of her dearest friends."

Around the Governor's house as a centre revolved the the town, almost the colony,—it was the original "hub." I cannot believe Margaret Winthrop was ever lonely; she was far more in danger of nervous exhaustion from over-excitement, not the excitement of anything like modern social life, but a life crowded with a series of interesting, novel incidents. The courts met in her house ; we would like to tell of the trial and sentence pronounced upon Samuel Gorton. Foreign visitors came there, among them Sir Harry Vane. Indian ambassadors there held meetings and sent tribute of wampum and scalps, and Indian Sachems came with their squaws to visit. Foreign ships came in at the foot of the street, sometimes bringing strange gifts, once a "fair sedan chair worth £50," was presented to the Winthrops which had been sent by the Viceroy of Mexico to a sister and captured in the West Indies by pirates. The church was under her very eyes, and, also, the stocks and the whipping-post.

On the spot where now stands "The Old Corner Book-Store," so near a neighbor to Madam Winthrop that their pitchers were filled at the same spring, lived Anne Hutchison. We have no word to tell of Madam Winthrop's personal feeling towards Anne Hutchison ; perhaps they were intimate friends during her first year in Boston when she was respected and loved by all.

An exciting event in Margaret Winthrop's life was the visit of La Tour, the French governor of Acadia, who landed right in the Winthrop's garden, and the still more surprising visit, a few days later, of Madam La Tour, his young wife, who flashed upon the chill New England scene like a brilliant tropical bird. And soon afterward came D'Aulnay, a rival governor of Acadia to whom to appease his fancied injuries the famous sedan chair was given, as the Winthrop's said "it was of no use to us."

No portrait or description of the "Governor's Lady" exists, and the only references to her personal appearance are as "a very gracious woman" with "sweet face" and "lovely countenance." It was given to Margaret Winthrop to endure in her fifty-six years of life a far wider and deeper range of emotions and experience than has fallen to the lot of many women. A sheltered girlhood was rudely shocked by the murder of her father ; she was parted from her beloved husband by an unknown ocean ; she bravely faced and endured that venturous voyage herself, and was brought thither "through the swelling seas, through perills of pyrate, tempests, leakes, fires, rocks and starvings." She was saddened by the death of children, and had to bear that rending of a a mother's heart, the burial of a child at sea ; she experienced entire loss of fortune, yet her life was a happy one.

She ever displayed traits of character and disposition that were most noble and beautiful and render her fit to stand as the emblem of one of the purest types of womanhood,—the Puritan wife and mother. This type belongs to an existence that has forever passed from this earth, but it has an immortal soul which speaks to us teaching the lesson of Margaret Winthrop's life, not the spiritual lesson of her trusting piety and affection, but a lesson which is far more urgent to-day, a regard of the beauty in woman's life of home-loving, home-keeping and home-influencing and a consideration of the true dignity which comes from simplicity of living.

Annie Evans.

2 − 1 + 2 = 3.

A man had been run over and gentle friends were carrying him into a neighboring drug store. A crowd tried to force its way in, out of curiosity, but the clerk stood guard while the druggist and a few others were trying to make the man comfortable behind the dispensing case.

A policeman had summoned an ambulance, whose bell was now heard clanging to clear the track. It dashed up to where the crowd had congregated and the white-coated surgeon and his assistant, with the Red Cross Society's emblem upon their arms, hurried into the drug store where the injured man lay. The car wheels had run over the man's left leg and his trousers were soaked with blood ; taking a pair of of scissors from the instrument-case which his assistant carried, the surgeon split up the trouser leg and proceeded to sop up the blood with absorbent cotton. As he worked he told his assistant to fill a hyperdermic and give the sufferer an opiate, for the wound was a painful one. Finally the surgeon finds the artery, which he ligatures and then the veins. Now the stretcher is brought in from the ambulance and the man being placed carefully upon it is carried out.

On its way to the Hospital the ambulance drives slower and does not leave the cart-track till the Hospital gates are reached. The gates swing open and the ambulance drives up to the door, where the man still upon the stretcher is carried in, placed upon the elevator and taken up to the receiving ward. Here a careful examination is made and it is found amputation would be necessary.

This was on Monday and the surgical clinic was not to be held till Wednesday, so the man was put to bed for a two days' rest. The quiet, high-ceilinged room seemed strange; he looked to either side and found men in beds like his own; he looked across the room and saw a long row of similar beds, and a number above each. So he looked above his own and found he was number 20. Supper time came and all were fed; some had substantial suppers, but his was only broth. The night was long and he could not sleep. At about three o'clock in the morning he saw the nurse go to the patient in number 15 and then hurry from the room, to return shortly with the physician. They took two white muslin screens from a closet and placed them around the bed. Our friend in number 20 did not know what this meant, but could easily guess, and when, several hours later, two assistants went behind the screens with a stretcher and came forth with a sheeted body upon it, then his guess was verified and he knew the man from number 15 was being carried to the dead-house. The screens were taken away, the bed was made up anew, and there was now a vacancy in the accident ward.

Next morning after breakfast these same screens were brought out and placed around the bed of each patient and he was bathed. The house surgeon came into the ward and, going up to the little table between 19 and 20 took up 20's temperature chart and went over it with the nurse. Then he told the man in 20, in a very kindly way, that it had been found necessary to amputate his limb and the operation would be performed the next morning. The man groaned and tears involuntarily came to his eyes. At dinner-time they gave him a scant allowance of broth, and at supper time the allowance was lessened.

Tuesday was visitors' day at the Hospital, but the man in 20 had no friends, and it only made him sad to see the wives, sisters and children of the other patients come in with cheering smiles. As he lay there with closed eyes thinking of the sorrow which had deprived him of all his beloved ones he heard a voice, gentle, as in a dream, saying: "Won't you have this orange"? He opened his eyes and saw the sweet face of the girl who had come to see the young fellow in 21. He knew the nurse would not allow him to eat it, but he took it and said he would save it till after the operation. At the word "operation" a look of pain came upon the girl's face, but it quickly changed to a tender glow of compassion as she said: "May our Loving Father guide you through," and turned to her young husband.

That night the man slept, but awoke early in the morning with a dread of the impending operation. At breakfast time the nurse came and told him with a smile he could not have anything till after the operation, for the ether would probably make him sick. At 9 o'clock two young surgeons in white coats came in and had the screens put around 20, then they carefully washed the skin around the wound and told him to be ready to be taken to the operating theatre in about an hour. At a quarter of 10 a rolling cot was brought to his bed and he was carefully placed upon it and wheeled away to the anesthetizing chamber, where the anesthetist greeted him kindly and said: "I am going to take everything from you but life." He then placed a towel wet with ether over the patient's nose and mouth. The room seemed to swim round, going faster and faster, till there was a slow uprising and a sudden fall, and the patient knew no more.

In the operating theatre the amputation was very successfully performed. Early in the afternoon our patient, now back in number 20, opened his eyes and said: "Oh! don't do it to-day," then looked around to see who had heard him; the man in 21 was smiling at him and said: "Good for you, old man, you'll pull through." The nurse who had been watching at the foot of the bed lest he disturb the bandages now came up and took his temperature with her little clinic thermometer.

Our patient became stronger and finally solid food was allowed him. The only breaks in the monotony of the long weeks of his recovery were visitors' days, at which times he watched the door as expectantly as the man in 21, for he knew the young wife would have a cheerful greeting in store for him. At night time, as he lay awake staring at the single lamp on the nurse's table, he would trace geometric figures upon his upper sheet with his right great toe and try to imagine himself tracing similar ones with his left great toe.

One day they brought a rolling chair to his cot and helping him into it guided him as he wheeled to a window overlooking the Hospital grounds. Every day now he would get into his chair and wheel away to a table where he rolled bandages for the use of the surgeons. As he was becoming much stronger, one day he was brought a pair of crutches and took a lesson in their use with the nurse behind him to steady his steps. He rapidly gained proficiency in their use and finally there came forth from the Hospital on three legs the man who, weeks before, had gone in with only two.

NOLI SPE.

A ROMANCE OF THE GYM.

They were loitering idly along the cinder-path that runs from the Chapel to the Laboratory,—a Sophomore and a Freshman. There was nothing very antagonistic in their attitude to each other, however, and one might have supposed that they were loyal members of the same class. That was a characteristic of Bentley students. Class-spirit existed only in a crowd.

"Do you know," he said, carefully avoiding the pronouns of the first and second persons, "the Sophs and Freshies are getting over their stupor and actually show some spirit. What do you think of last night?"

"What about last night?" she said evasively.

"The storming of the Gym," he answered.

"I don't think," she said.

"Why not?"

She did not answer immediately. They had stopped at the bridge and were leaning against the low wall.

"I lost by it," she said, after pondering a little.

"Lost?" he echoed. "How do you mean?"

"A friend of mine was in the besieged party. He had a—a—something of mine, and lost it. He came around this morning in dust and ashes and said he must have lost it in the Gym., as he had it when he went in and missed it just before he started for Millville."

He looked down quickly at her hand.

"It was your ring," he said.

"I don't know why you should conclude that," she said confusedly, hiding her hand.

He smiled and then they walked on.

"If I should find it, what would you do?" he asked.

"Make you give it to me, of course."

"But if I didn't want to?"

"Report you to your class and they'd make you."

"Think so?" he asked. "Let's wait and see."

Then they came to the parting of the ways, and, following a Bentley custom, he touched his hat gingerly, as it had been a hat of iron, and walked on. He was thinking rather profoundly of a little ring hidden in some crevice of the Gym. floor.

"The hound! The hound!" he said between his teeth. "I'd like to know who he is and I'd teach him to wear a girl's ring and lose it for her!"

The scene was a bright one, for the electric light made night day in the old Gym. Music, addresses, conversation and refreshments, all lent their several and peculiar charms to the peacemaking between the rival classes. There was a great deal of fuss made over this hatchet. To judge by the proceedings, one might think it was loved and honored and they were sorry to bury it; but the general merriment contradicted such an idea.

During the first part of the evening our two friends saw little of each other. He was silent and abstracted. Five separate times in the last week had he searched the Gym. through for the lost trinket, and five separate times had he left the building, vowing vengeance on "the hound." And now, from time to time, he might be seen peering into this or that corner and turning away disappointed.

About the middle of the evening he gave a little start and was on the point of yelling "Eureka!" but checked himself. He stooped down and picked up a tiny gold circlet.

"It'll take more than the class to make me," he said.

He was her partner in the grand march that followed and kept trying to pluck up courage to speak of his find. Finally he said in a low voice:

"If I give you your ring, will you wear it always for me,—or until I can find you another?"

She was paralyzed with surprise.

"You crazy child!" was all she could say just then, but a moment later the idea seemed neither appalling nor unreasonable.

"Will you?" he asked once more.

"On one condition," she said in a low tone. "You must keep it secret all through our stay at Bentley. Do you agree?"

Of course he said yes, and, at a moment when everybody's attention was providentially turned elsewhere, he slipped the ring on the same finger which a few weeks previous it had left.

"Remember," he said, "it is for me and not for that hound that lost it."

"Perhaps," she said, "if I don't forget."

The Freshman and the Sophomore walked home hand in hand that night, for it was dark as Egypt; and besides, there wasn't a little bit of hard feeling after the interment of the hatchet and why shouldn't they go hand in hand?

If you should ask any one at Bentley about it, he or she would laugh you to scorn; for our friends are very clever and haven't breathed it to a living soul, except—perhaps—to the chronicler of these events. A. L. H.

A REVERIE.

One cold winter's evening when the wind was howling around the street corners and snarling down the chimneys with that mournful, moaning sound that makes one thankful for home and shelter, I sat in my bachelor apartments before a bright, blazing fire. Everything about the room wore an air of coziness and good cheer. At my left, contentedly dozing on a rug and basking in the genial warmth, lay the sole companion of my joys and sorrows, my old Tabby. Seated in a comfortable arm-chair with my feet perched upon the fender, quite satisfied with myself and the world, I gazed for a long time into the fire, watching the little pieces of wood as they fly crackling to one side of the hearth and then, separated from the parent stem, gradually become charred and finally go out—forever. As I gazed into the dying embers, while the fire burned lower, my fancy began to wander, my head to nod. I was asleep.

Once more I am a boy, a joyous, happy boy. Once more I am playing with my brother and sister in heedless, infant sport, cared for and loved by a tender mother and a kind, gentle father, Then there comes darkness—a blank. They tell me I have been sick. When I ask for my brother and sister, for my father and mother, I am told they have gone away. Anxiously I wait, as the days go by, for them to come again; but they never come. I am left alone.

Then comes youth with its dreams of fame and glory, high resolves and lofty ambitions. Fired with a high ideal, I resolved to carve for myself an illustrious name, and sacrifice my all on the altar of my God and my country.

Now I am seventeen, a young man, attending school away from home. The home ties have been partially, painfully broken and the great future looms up before me. Now for the first time I meet her. She is a very modest, bright little girl and she inspires in me new hopes, new doubts, new fears. I cannot bear to see her smile at any one else but me. I am entranced by her purity, her modesty, her grace. I could fight that baker's boy for presuming to speak to her when she comes to the gate to give her order for the day because her mother is an invalid. I spend long hours in wondering if she loves me. I hope, I fear. I cannot study. I dream of her. I am beginning to worship the ground she walks on. I dare to hope for a fire to break out in her home so that I can rush in, rescue her from the flames, be a hero in her sight, and, as she faints in my arms, hear her confess that she loves me. She is my idol.

Now I am a man, comfortably situated,—and with a good position. One day at the house of a friend, I meet Mary, gentle, sweet, winning Mary. We seem mutually attracted to each other. We spend many pleasant hours together. As the days go by, we see each other very often, and a pure, warm affection for each other springs up in our hearts. How different from the wild, extravagant dreams of youth! I do not care to be a hero now, for I would not want Mary in any danger. I want to be a true man and worthy of her. As we know each other better, we seem to need each other and our lives seem to be growing closer together each day. Our tastes, our desires, our hopes are one. I ask her to join her life to mine.

Years have passed, happy, fleeting years, full of work, of joy, and of happiness. Mary has been a true helpmeet to me, planning for and advising me in all that that has concerned my life and my business. One child has been born to us, a bright baby girl, the pride of both our hearts. Life has been very happy for us. Now I hear the mother's footstep on stair outside the door, singing a gentle lullaby to her sleeping child. She enters the room, comes over to me, and, bending over me with a face full of tenderness and devotion, lays in my arms the empress of both our hearts, our own little Margaret. I take the sleeping child and, in the warmth of my affection, I clasp it to my heart. But dear me! in my fervency I have clasped her too tight. A murmur comes from those parted lips. I feel a tingling sensation in my finger as the mother gently pinches me for not being more tender with our child. Then I awoke.

As the fire burned lower and the embers died out one by one, Tabby, who has tired of her position on the rug, thought she would exchange it for her favorite one on my lap. In my dream I have mistaken her for my child and pressed her to my breast. Not accustomed to such usage, she has remonstrated at first by a gentle "mew" and then, finding that of no avail, has set her teeth and closes, cannibal-like, into my finger. All my dreams have vanished. I am again John Jones, the Bachelor.

THE FEVER'S CAPTIVE.

With pen in hand though prostrate still,
I'll now describe my recent ill;
Although now free from piercing pain,
All but distracted is my brain;
My body feeble, weak my nerve,
My tongue alone, my force-reserve;
And like unto the Sylvan dell
When tempests rage and torrents swell,
And boulder tumbling from the ledge
Lay crumbled near the water's edge,
When ash and elm, oak and pine
Like whipstocks to the storm incline
With mad tornado's sweeping train:—
Thus raging fever racked my brain.
Then seething, foaming, tossing wild,
Now calm and helpless as a child.
Or like the grass which low is lain
Completely drenched with summer rain,
Until the sun with mantle spread
Invites the blade to raise its head,
Then lifts the burden, dries the stain
And gives it strength to stand again.
'Twas thus dame Hunger came at last
And bade me break unwilling fast;
I then complied with all my greed
And filled "the gaps of human need."

Be thorough in every study. Passing over a field of study has been compared to conquering a country. If you thoroughly conquer everything that you meet you will pass on from victory to victory; but if you leave here and there a fort or a garrison unsubdued you will soon have an army hanging on your rear and your ground will soon need reconquering. Never pass over a single thing without understanding all that can be known about it.—From Sheldon's "World Studies."

EDITORIALS.

Spring has come. The birds, the green grass, the budding trees, betoken its approach and mark its advent. And with it comes the busiest, the liveliest, the pleasantest term of the year. As all nature seems to spring forth in renewed life and activity, so she endows her children with new zeal and energy to carry out the plans they have formed for further advancement, further growth. Let us then not be slow to improve the moments, as they pass, for they are precious. For some this is the last term of preparation for their entry into and struggle in the greater and broader world-life. A few short weeks and their school days are ended—forever. We should, therefore, be careful to employ to the best advantage the few weeks that remain of this year of preparation for future work, future study, future usefulness. We cannot be too careful of how we spend our time.

It has been suggested and thought advisable to devote a page or so in the coming issues of the MIRROR to a brief review of the educational career of our various Professors, embracing their academic or preparatory training, the time and place of their college career, their course of study and the degree to which it led, where they have taught, the degrees subsequently received, the time they became members of the College Faculty, subjects taught, books published, travels abroad and anything of interest regarding their strictly educational and scholastic career. The editors hope to make this biography of our Professors both interesting and instructive, and to make it a valuable contribution to the already published history of our growing University.

A special and valuable feature of the MIRROR in the future will be a list of the best and most authoritative articles on the subjects taught in the different departments as they appear in the papers and magazines from time to time. This list will be as nearly as possible, complete, and will give, of all the mass of material that appears, only such articles as are really worthy of consideration, and deserve the attention of the student who is interested in a further pursuit of any special branch. The references will cover all the subjects taught by the various Professors and will be especially valuable to those who wish to specialize in some particular line, as well as to those who desire to keep abreast of the times along several or all lines, yet have not the time to read all that appears on every subject, to sift the material, take the good, reject the bad. This list of references will be, it is hoped, valuable both to the student and to the graduate, a complete index as nearly as possible of the best and worthiest that is appearing in current literature on the problems and subjects that are taught in the college curriculum and that perplex and interest the graduate mind. The first list will appear in the next issue and will be followed by similar lists in the last issue of each month.

EDITORIAL NOTE.

Much as we desire to have the articles, contributed by friends and patrons of the MIRROR, appear free from typographical errors, we nevertheless find ourselves unable to keep them out. Any and all errors due to oversight or carelessness on the part of the proof reader will always be acknowledged and rectified in the issues that follow if our friends will kindly call our attention to them. We are fully as much grieved at serious errors as the composer of the production in which the errors are found. We therefore take pleasure in rectifying the typographical errors found in the article entitled "A Woman in Literature" in the March 25 issue: in proper names, Bodtein for Bodlein; Rothchilds for Rothschilds; Morton for Norton; Castrell for Costrell; Lonybee for Tonybee. On page 116 in the second column, line eleven, the word printed these should be three. A little below the middle of the same column, after the words Sir George Tressady a period is placed, and the next word is printed with a capital,—"As", when it should have been "as" with a comma before it. On page 117, first column, line seven, the word printed models should be novels.

ALUMNI NOTES.

'52. Mr. Virgil M. Blanding, of Rock Island, Ill., has for many years past been engaged in Railway Construction. At present he is Secretary and Treasurer of the Davenport and Rock Island Bridge, Railway and Terminal Company. This bridge, when completed, will be the second over the Mississippi between the cities of Rock Island and Davenport.

Ex-'52. Through information misinterpreted we said in our last issue that Mr. John A. Grier served as a 3rd Assistant Engineer in the U. S. Navy for over ten years. As is well known to his many friends in Pennsylvania, he was regularly promoted from grade to grade by competitive examinations, receiving a commission in the early part of the late war as Chief Engineer. At the termination of the war, he resigned his commission for private life. As Chief Engineer he served on two of our largest and most powerful vessels during the war—the New Ironsides and the U. S. Frigate Powhatan. Mr. Grier has presented his little book, "Our Silver Coinage" to the Bucknell Library since our last issue.

Ex-'53. Rev. C. C. Bitting is living at 1625 Diamond Street, Phila.

Ex-'53. Rev. Joseph N. Folwell, now nearly 70 years of age, is pastor of the Emanuel Baptist church, of Camden, N. J. This church was founded by him three years ago.

'54. Rev. Chas. M. Deitz is now located at Frenchtown, N. J., where he has been pastor of the Baptist church for two years.

'55. Mr. Henry I. Budd, who is extensively engaged in farming near Mt. Holly, N. J., is also State Commissioner of Public Roads with an office in Trenton. "He has for a number of years acted as President for the Burlington County Agricultural Society, Mount Holly, Lumberton and Medford Railroad, Vice-President, Trustee and Curator of the Burlington County Lyceum of History and Natural Sciences, Secretary of the Burlington County Board of Agriculture, Secretary of the New Jersey Horticultural Society, also a member of other state, county, historical, literary and agricultural organizations." "Mr. Budd was, on the 21st of May, 1895, appointed by Governor Mertz to his present position, to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Edward Burrough, and in 1896 he was reappointed by Governor Griggs for a full term of three years." His salary is $1500 a year.

'55. Dr. Chas. H. Malcom is now in his third year at St. Stephens College, Annandale-on-Hudson, N. Y. He is Professor of History and English Literature. For some time previous to his coming to St. Stephens he was Corresponding Secretary of the American Church Building Fund, with his office in New York.

'56. Mr. George W. Fries, a Mifflinburg boy in his college days, is now editor of the Friendship Register, of Friendship, N. Y. He was President of the Board of Education of that place for two years.

'56. Mr. John A. Gundy is still engaged in agricultural pursuits on his farm a mile below town.

'56. Rev. John R. Shanafelt resides in Lawrence, Kansas. He was recently incapacitated for his regular duties by a stroke of apoplexy which has left him almost helpless.

'58. Major Thomas Chamberlin has an office at 424 Walnut Street, Phila. For the last twelve years he has been Secretary of the Teutonia Fire Insurance Co. of that city. His title was received for active service during the Civil War in which he gained great prominence as a brave soldier. Major Chamberlin is well remembered in this town as an eloquent orator by several addresses he delivered here on different occasions.

'59. Mr. O. P. Chamberlin, a prominent lawyer of Flemington, N. J., among other noteworthy state and county offices was appointed Supreme Court Commissioner by the Supreme Court of New Jersey on Feb. 17, 1887.

Ex-'62. W. S. Shallenberger has been nominated by President McKinley for the position of Second Assistant Postmaster General.

'84. Rev. A. W. Hand has become pastor of the church at Putnam, Conn.

'88. Rev. W. H. Clipman, of Harrisburg, has been for several weeks in Phila., under treatment for his eyes. He has been a guest of his class brother, Rev. R. B. McDanel, of Oak Lane.

'94. Raymond J. Davis, at the same time while pursuing his course at Crozer Theological Seminary, is pastor of the Angora Baptist Church in Philadelphia.

'96. T. L. Josephs has returned from his visit to England and made his appearance not long since in the town of his college days.

'96. Albert W. Johnson has removed from his former home, New Berlin, and is now residing in Lewisburg.

Ex-'96. A. H. Catterall, M. D., has opened an office at 3100 Cottage Ave., Chicago.

Uniontown, Pa., March 24. "Assistant District Attorney W. E. Crow and Miss Ada Curry were married here to-day by Rev. Dr. H. F. King. They left immediately on an extended wedding trip, and on their return will go to housekeeping on Wilson Avenue. Mr. Crow was formerly a newspaper man in Pittsburg, and later of this place. He was admitted to practice law a year ago and was soon appointed assistant district attorney, which position he now holds. Miss Curry is a graduate of the female department of Bucknell University."—(Pittsburg Times.)

UNIVERSITY ITEMS.

COLLEGE.

Wager, 1900, now has the oversight of the Laboratory.

L. H. Burge, '98, has been made assistant to Prof. Owens.

The Mandolin and Guitar Club gave a recital in Bucknell Hall on Thursday evening, the 8th inst.

Because of the shortness of the vacation an unusually large number of students remained in town during that time.

Chas. S. Studd, Cambridge '84, spent Saturday and Sunday with us at Bucknell delivering several addresses in the interest of Missions.

The graduates of Bucknell Institute will not read their essays this year at graduation, but an address will be delivered by some prominent speaker instead.

The following have been chosen for the Junior Exhibition: Davis, Fithian, Lauderbaugh, Lindemann, Miss Rodgers, Miss Slifer, Stober, Wiltbank and Cooke.

The base-ball diamond was prepared for use during vacation and we may soon expect to see practice games which will enable us to form some idea of the strength of our team.

Dr. Harris delivered the opening lecture of the term on Monday the 5th inst. His subject was "Moral Pathfinders." Among those mentioned as such were: Socrates, Paul, Regulus, and Washington. He laid great stress on the necessity of honesty, truth and righteousness if one would be successful.

The lecture course which will be given for the benefit of the Athletic Association consists of the following: James Whitcomb Riley by Dr. Lincoln Hulley on April 22, Venezuela, Illustrated, by Col. Geo. Nox McCain of the Phila. Press, on April 29th and Some Proverbs, not Solomon's, by Dr. Enoch Perrine on May 6th.

The Literary Societies have elected the following officers for the ensuing term: Theta Alpha: Pres., Fithian; Vice Pres., Meserve; Sec., Conover; Treas., DeWitt; Critic, Collins; Censor, Huntzberger, Curator, Diggs. Euepia: Pres. Kunkle; Vice Pres., Rawlinson; Sec., Bell; Critic, Smith; Treas., Todd; Sergeant-at-Arms, Calvin.

A life size cast of Julius Cæsar has been presented to the University by J. Ackerman Coles, M. D., and sister, of Scotch Plains, N. J. It is the only one of the kind in America being an exact copy of the one in the Louvre, Paris. The cast was presented in memory of Abraham Coles, M. D., Ph. D. LL. D., an honorary Alumnus of the University.

At a meeting of the Muncy Alumni Association held recently at Williamsport the toast "The University in the Scheme of Popular Education," was responded to by Dr. Lincoln Hulley. Prof. W. W. Kelchner, '86, Principal of the Williamsport High School, spoke on "The High School in the Scheme of Popular Education." Eight graduates of Muncy Normal are now attending Bucknell, namely: C. D. Koch, G. T. Ritter, A. A. Smith, D. H. Robbins, H. F. Stabler and E. Reed.

INSTITUTE.

A new piano has recently been put in room B for the benefit of the school of music.

We hope to give in the next issue some notes on the recent visit of the Bucknell girls to the National Capitol.

We learn that L'Agenda will be out by May first and we are eagerly waiting its appearance. A number of the Institute girls have contributed to its columns.

We are very sorry that our welcome could not be extended to all at the opening of the term, April first, but only a faithful few were prompt in returning. However at this date all are here but one.

The Mandolin and Guitar Club, under the direction of J. Brown Martin, gave a delightful serenade to the young ladies of the Institute, in the Study Hall, on the evening of April 5th. Listening to the

> "Notes with many a winding bout
> Of linked sweetness long drawn out"

one easily understands why this "L'Allegro" Club was so popular.

ACADEMY.

Mr. Gordon Forster has changed his place of residence and is now living at the Academy.

During vacation a few of the boys remained in town. Consult Mr. Alan Cunningham concerning the pleasant time we had. We think his account would be very enjoyable.

A new feature of Adelphia's last meeting was the Shakesperian Reading by the members with the Introduction by Prof. Phillips. This proved to be very interesting and profitable to all.

We are glad to welcome a former student, Mr. M. L. Anthony and also the new students, Messrs. G. M. Fehr, J. E. Parker, J. A. Haines, C. N. Steinenger, W. N. Lorenze, E. J. Shortell, and W. E. Mannuel.

BASE BALL.

The first game of the season is with Milton this afternoon.

It is likely that a game will be arranged with the Carlisle Indians to be played here.

It is hoped every student will show his interest in the team by attending all the home games. The success of the team abroad will depend much upon the encouragement they receive at home.

VOL. XVI. LEWISBURG, PA., APRIL 25, 1897. NO. 13.

WOMAN IN MUSIC.

Under existing circumstances it seems expedient to eulogize woman. A program concerning women, prepared by women, and for the purpose of encouraging women to greater effort along various lines of development had perhaps better suppress the dark or discouraging side of the question. In the relation of woman to music this is not difficult, for her position is unquestioned. Here she is no innovation. It is not by elbowing or by doubtful achievement that she has been acknowledged in the world of music. This science is sexless,—this art the only one taught by the angels who combine grace and strength in their being. In some manifestations of this art, however, it is only present day conditions that render woman a competitor with man. Though the legend goes that a woman invented that most soulful of instruments, the organ, it is but recently that she has played it with skill and strength equal to man's. A similar change in popular opinion is noticeable in regard to the use of many wind instruments requiring force of lungs. It is easy to foretell what revolutions in regard to such questions will accompany the new physical education of woman. Then, too, in this woman's age, woman has become a valued teacher. As pianist, violinist, and orchestra leader she is winning a place for herself with something of the struggle she has found necessary in other arts when in competition with men, who, whatever else they have or have not, have possession.

It is in the realm of song, however, that woman is pre-eminent. There she finds her own, or song finds its own—a faithful medium, an earthly voice for heavenly truth, and woman has been the world's most blessed messenger when she has with clearness and accuracy interpreted such truth for men. It has come as lullaby or as war cry, as song of victory when the Lord triumphed gloriously and horse and rider were thrown into the sea or as song of praise when her soul hath magnified the Lord and her spirit hath rejoiced in God her Saviour. Wherever men have struggled her voice has inspired, wherever they have triumphed it has heralded in song the victory of truth and peace.

Many women who have devoted their lives to song as a profession, and who have sung perhaps not because they were compelled but because it was a paying business, have nevertheless been hailed as benefactors of the world and crowned with highest honors.

By her power over the heart we hold Jenny Lind, the Swedish nightingale, highest in our praise. Her biography is an household possession, so we need not recount it but attempt to find in her individuality the secret of her power. First to be considered is the marvellous instrument, her voice, rare both by its range and its sweetness. Then she made the most of it by closest application. She was master of her art,—"The greatest artist I have ever known" were Mendelssohn's words of her. This voice she regarded as a gift, one she must put to sacred uses, so she never degraded her art. Her singing was a noble consecration. Does not the secret of all this lie in her entire womanliness, so that the most distinguished praise that can be rendered her is to say that she was a rarely endowed woman conscious of the sacredness of her gift? This has been the object of using Jenny Lind's name—to prove her the fullest development of the age in her art, and to suggest something further,—perhaps to make a modest prediction for the future. While this paper has greatly claimed an exalted place for woman as an interpreter it has wisely been silent upon her rank in the creative realm. We look in vain for women's names to rank with the world's great composers. It does seem a little strange that, if women are to be composers, there have not been any in the past; but are there not parallels enough in other spheres to make it fair to state that even genius is a development, and that after awhile, perhaps after a few centuries, when women grow accustomed to the greatness that seems to be thrust upon them these days, this also may be granted to them ?

Then, too, may we not hope devoutly for another development—that when this queen of composers be granted the earth that still rarer gift may be hers,—power to rule her own life by the glorious harmonies she creates.

MISS SARA VAN GUNDY.

JOHN HOWARD HARRIS, PH. D., LL.D., PRESIDENT.

John Howard Harris was born in Indiana county, Pa., April 24, 1847. His early years were spent on a farm. During the years from 1860 to 1865 he prepared for college at Mechanicsburg Academy. His studies here, however, were interrupted, for at the age of fifteen he taught his first class in school, and in the following year he enlisted and served as a private in the Second Battalion, U. S. Volunteers, in West Virginia. Afterwards he served as a sergeant in Company H, 206th Pa. Volunteers, in front of Richmond, from August, 1864, until the fall of the city. The incidents attending the fall of Richmond and the impressions of the event are now embodied in a lecture which has elicited great interest and much favorable comment. During these seventeen months of service in the army, he continued his studies and completed his preparatory course.

In 1865 he entered the University at Lewisburg and graduated in 1869 with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. He had intended to study law, but while at college he became a member of the Baptist church and at the close of his course had decided to study for the ministry.

In 1869 the Baptists of Northeastern Pennsylvania purposed to establish an academy, to be located at Factoryville, and to be known as Keystone Academy. Dr. Harris was offered and accepted the position of principal of a school which had yet to be created,—a position which he held from 1869 to 1889. The school was opened, with sixteen pupils, in the basement of the Baptist church at Factoryville. When Dr. Harris resigned, twenty years afterward, he left an Academy second to none in the state, with several hundred pupils, a large faculty, and with three large buildings situated on a campus of about twenty-five acres. In all this work, the principal of the school was the guiding spirit, and it is not too much to say that Keystone Academy is the work of Dr. Harris. The position gave him a thorough training and experience in the administration of a school, as well as constant contact with men interested in education. It was therefore eminently fitting that he should have been selected, in 1889, to the presidency of Bucknell ; nor have the friends of the institution been disappointed.

In 1872 he was ordained to the ministry. In addition to his duties as principal he was pastor of the Factoryville Baptist Church from 1880 to 1889.

In 1883 Lafayette College conferred upon him the degree of Ph. D. ; and in 1891 he received the degree of LL. D. from Dickinson College and from Colgate University.

These are, in brief, some of the main facts of his life ; but they do not portray the man nor his greatest and most lasting work. His greatest glory will always be the lasting influence he has exerted upon young men. Whenever his former students meet they speak of him with affection and admiration, and always with the utmost trust and confidence in him, and with the admission that no greater influence than his ever entered their lives.

E. M. H.

FREEMAN LOOMIS, A. M. PH. D.

PROFESSOR OF MODERN LANGUAGES AND LITERATURE.

Dr. Freeman Loomis, senior professor in Bucknell, was born in Waterville, Me., May 21, 1844. His father, J. R. Loomis, LL. D., for twenty years the honored president of Bucknell University, came to Lewisburg about four years after the founding of the institution. The name of Freeman Loomis is enrolled among the students of the Academy two years later. And as he has always sustained a close relationship to the University ever since, we may safely conclude that no one has been for so long a time intimately acquainted or associated with the work and progress of the University at Lewisburg.

He continued at the Academy through his course of preparatory study; and during this time was admitted to the fellowship of the Lewisburg Baptist church. His baptism occurred April 10, 1859, the pastor, Rev. S. H. Mirick, officiating.

He was admitted to the college in 1862. His preparation had been thorough and enabled him to hold his own with such brilliant classmates as Charles S. Wolfe and Alfred Taylor, afterwards trustees of the University, the latter his intimate friend.

Soon after entering college he joined the Theta Alpha literary society and throughout his course was an active and leading member. He was also initiated into the Phi Kappa Psi Greek letter fraternity.

Upon completing the usual four years classical course he was graduated in 1866, being awarded the Salutatory address, the second honors of his class. Upon that occasion, in addition to the Latin address, he delivered a noteworthy oration on Theodore Parker.

A Theological department under Professor Curtis, having a two years course of study, had been established in the University in 1854; upon leaving college he passed at once to this course and was graduated from it in 1868. While pursuing his Theological studies and for two years after, or until he went to Europe, he held the responsible office of Superintendent of the Lewisburg Baptist Sunday School, which post he filled with singular acceptability.

In 1868 the board of trustees elected Professor Loomis Principal of the Academy, with Norman Ball and Miss Nettie Dunham as assistants. The following year the classical preparatory department became distinct from the Academy and Professor Loomis was placed at the head of the Classical Preparatory. This position he held for ten years or until 1879, at which date the Academy and preparatory school were again united.

In 1870 Professor Loomis was granted leave of absence to pursue his studies abroad. In carrying out his plans he entered the University at Berlin; and we find his name enrolled in the catalogues 1870 72, under the head of Students in Philosophy.

At this time "King Frederick William's University" was reduced in attendance more than one-half by the fierce struggle in which France and Germany were contending for supremacy. Politics and war were then every-day themes, and Professor Loomis in the spirit of the times wrote home some interesting and valuable letters for publication. We remember reading his vivid descriptions of "the First German Reichstag," with Count Moultke, Prince Bismarck, and Emperor William, the creator of United Germany, in attendance. We were not less interested in his letters describing the "Festivities at Berlin," when the victorious German army was reviewed with imposing ceremonies at the capital,—the idea being carried out of giving to the victorious warriors the honor of an official reception.

Subsequently Professor Loomis occupied himself for some time in the city of Paris in the study of the French language and its literature.

During his absence in Europe, in 1871, the trustees of the University at Lewisburg elected him to the chair of Modern Languages. Up to this date the modern languages had constituted no part of the college curriculum. The entire linguistic training, other than English, had been confined to the ancient classics. Accordingly the return of Professor Loomis from Europe marked a considerable expansion in the courses of the University,

He re-entered upon his work at Lewisburg in the fall of 1872, as Principal of the Classical Preparatory; and at the same time began to organize the new department of Modern Languages.

His previous experience as a teacher, his studies at the famed University of Fichte and Hegel, of Neander and Rose and Eucke, his residence for two years at this centre of Germanic scholarship affording as it did unusual opportunities for collateral culture, and a subsequent visit to Paris, enabled Professor Loomis to bring to the work of instruction in the new department of Modern Languages very superior qualifications.

Since 1879 his work has been confined to his department in college; his instruction has been faithfully given; and his elective courses have been deservedly popular.

Professor Loomis has spent his life at Lewisburg; his best services have been given to the University, which has conferred upon him the degrees of A. B. in '66, of B. D. in '68, of A. M. in '69, and of Ph. D. in '89. In the various movements for the improvement of the University grounds, and in the numerous efforts to increase the endowment fund, no Alumnus has contributed more liberally of his means than Professor Loomis.

AWAKENING.

While winds, their fury spread abroad,
  And raging torrents rush along,
There wakes beneath the heaving sod,
  The notes of universal song.

Throughout cold winter's cruel night,
  Beneath their shroud of freezing snows,
The dormant bulbs have nestled tight
  And gathered strength in sweet repose.

But now the robin's warbling notes
  Are calling them to break their sleep;
To cast aside their heavy coats;
  From every nook and dell to peep.

Sweet flowers! lift your welcome heads!
  Your fragrance spread o'er all this land!
And ye shall be in your own beds
  Protected by the mortal hand!

BUCKNELL ALUMNAE CLUB.

The Bucknell Alumnæ Club of Philadelphia met on Monday, March 29, at the Foulke and Long Institute. Twenty-eight were present. The luncheon, which is usually supplied by a caterer, was prepared and served by the girls in the senior class of the Foulke and Long Institute. Never had the tables been more tastefully arranged, and never has the luncheon been better prepared or more daintily served. All were delighted with the work of the girls and felt like congratulating most heartily the teachers whose instruction has made possible such good results.

We were glad for the opportunity of allowing our members to see what a splendid work the Foulke and Long Institute is doing.

After luncheon was served Mrs. Spratt, the President of the Club, referred to a few matters of business and then introduced the subject for discussion: "Resolved, that the intellectual culture of women does not increase the sum of human happiness."

Before opening the discussion, however, Mrs. Spratt read a paper on "India, the Paradise for Housekeepers," written by Mrs. R. M. Luther, a physician in Newark. Mrs. Luther was to have been our guest and to have read the paper herself. Since she was unable to be present it was thought fitting to read the paper, though it did not bear directly on our subject, and we were exceedingly glad for a glimpse of life in India through the eyes of one who had really experienced its delights and difficulties. The paper was written in a very clever way and was thoroughly enjoyed.

The discussion of the subject chosen for the meeting followed immediately. Mrs. T. S. Scott opened the discussion, arguing for the affirmative. She was supported by Mrs. Tustin and Mrs. Cobb. Mrs. Sütter and Mrs. Stubbs discussed the negative side of the question.

The following are some of the arguments given in support of the affirmative:

1. Intellectual culture of women breeds discontent. An intellectual woman has ambitions which very often cannot be realized. Domestic life offers no opportunities for satisfying her desires. Home duties are irksome and she seeks enjoyment and gratification elsewhere. In her relations with other women this discontent is evident. The intellectually-cultured woman withdraws from the society of women whom she does not consider her equals or superiors intellectually. She avoids the society of those who are no advantage to her intellectually.

2. Intellectual culture makes women critical. Into art, music, literature, religion the intellectual woman brings her criticisms, and what she once was able to appreciate now fails to attract her.

3. Intellectual culture often comes at the expense of heart-culture. A woman whose desires are for mental culture more than anything else seeks intellectual friendships of the heart. Having exhausted what is accessible to her in the mind of another she loses all interest in this person and their relations cease. Such a woman gives her time to mind-training, forgetting the need of heart-culture.

4. Intellectual culture is often obtained at the cost of woman's personal charms, which are her greatest power.

The following fact was stated in support of the argument:

Among the Yaro nation, a people of Asia, the women are supreme. They woo the men, they control the affairs of the home and nation; property descends through them, and in everything they are dominant, but—note the sequel—they are the very ugliest women on the face of the earth. The dreadful example is probably enough to make the average woman seek for diminution of brain rather than enlargement.

Some of the arguments for the negative were these:

1. The intellectual culture of women is an advantage to those in the home. The women of to-day who are not intellectnally cultured find themselves unable to be a help to their sons and daughters who have had higher educations. Many of the girls of to-day have grown away from their mothers because these mothers are not interested in the same lines of thought and work. There is not as much sympathy between cultured daughters and their mothers as there might be if the women who are mothers had greater intellectual culture. The girls of the future will have greater advantages along this line than those of to-day have had. They will have mothers who can sympathize with them intellectually as well as in other ways, and the value of this cannot be overestimated.

2. The intellectual culture of women fits them for positions of greater usefulness outside of the home. There is a growing demand for women as teachers in these days. Unless a woman has had the advantage of higher education she cannot now fill a desirable position in any school. The majority of schools want collegebred women on their faculties.

3. The intellectual culture of women tends to command sincerity. When women have the most culture men are more open and sincere. By the side of an uncultured woman a man finds it necessary to avoid saying anything beyond the narrow range of her information lest he make her uncomfartable. He is obliged to be cautious, and sometimes is insincere in expressing himself. With a woman of culture equal to his own he has no cause for apprehension, and he is himself.

An interesting discussion of the arguments given followed the more formal debate. The topic seemed to have been well chosen for all manifested great interest in its discussion. We have found our meetings to be so much more helpful, since we've adopted the plan of having subjects which admit of a discussion. If the interest continues to increase in the ratio in which it has begun we will look forward to having many delightful meetings.

VOICE FROM A STREAM.

I stood beside a stream one day;
It seemed to say:
"My child, hast thou at last come home?"
Unseen a gnome
Appeared to guard the rippling brook
From secret nook.
O'er head the sun in sapphire sky,
Shone clear and high
Against the jagged rocky hill
So grand and still;
Here oft I climbed in youthful days
To hear sweet lays
That echoed from each clift and scar
Along the bar.
Green-briers were close enwreathed o'erhead,
In tangled spread,
To screen the sylvan nymph's abode.
Their viewless road
Inwound among the blooming trees.
I saw the bees
Collecting sweets from scented flow'rs,
Where petal show'rs
Were bathed in a familiar spring.
With silv'ry ring
It gushes from the slimy earth
In joyous mirth.
Through fens and ferns it roll'd along
With ceaseless song;
It kept refresh'd a mossy bank
On which I sank
To dream of days that now are o'er
For ever more.

EDITORIALS.

Unfortunately we go to press a few hours before the result of the relay races at the University of Pennsylvania meet can be known. But whether our team wins or loses they shall have our sympathy and hearty support. They have trained well and faithfully and deserve a well-merited victory.

The annual reception of Dr. and Mrs. Harris to the Senior classes of the College and Institute is one of the most pleasureable and most anticipated social events of the year. There, enjoying the privileges and pleasures of social intercourse, the two classes stand united,—perhaps for the last time. This reception is merely another cord that binds the hearts of all in a more common sympathy, a more fervent love for old Bucknell.

A great deal of interest is being manifested in tennis, the courts having been put into better condition than ever before. The boys have worked hard in leveling them down, rolling them, and putting up an excellent system of wire netting, so that they present a more pleasing appearance than formerly. Every fine afternoon they are in constant demand, and even then they are scarcely able to accommodate all those who desire to play. A Tennis Association has been formed for the purpose of promoting an interest in Collegiate and Inter-Collegiate tennis, and this Association is to have full control of all tournaments played on the home grounds. All this points toward a successful season and an excellent tournament.

To the class of '97 belongs the credit of originating and successfully carrying out the plan of publishing a really good, neat and attractive College Song Book. The editors have worked faithfully in securing the music, and the names of such men as Drs. Doane, Lowry, Johnson, Wood and Whitman, Profs. Stanley of Michigay, Manchester of Keystone, etc., among its contributors are a sufficient guarantee of its excellence. It contains seventy-three pages has thirty-eight songs, all entirely original except five, and is neatly bound in a serviceable cover. The book comes up to the most sanguine expectations of the friends and members of the class, and all connected with it deserve hearty praise for their efficient and successful efforts.

It is with feelings of regret that we learn of the resignation of Mrs. Larison from the Principalship of the Institute. During her entire career as Preceptress she has always been held in the highest respect and esteem among the students, and her influence, which is great, has always been for the pure and true, a higher, better, more exalted standard of manhood and womanhood. Many a boy and girl will never forget the kind, motherly face of Mrs. Larison, or some word, look, or tone of hers that made life better, brighter, more worth the living. It seems a pity to lose one who has been so useful, so energetic; but she has abundantly earned a well-merited rest from her arduous labors, and as she goes forth we bid her "God speed."

The prospect for a victorious and successful season in baseball has been seldom, if ever, brighter than at the present. The diamond has been put in good condition, an abundance of fairly good material is at hand, a series of practice games either against the second team or neighboring local teams has been and is being played to give the men practice and confidence, and we have a pitcher who, to say the least, thoroughly understands his business and is in every respect first-class. Mr. Shortell's former record in baseball is an enviable one. We have every reason to believe that during the coming season he will fully sustain his former reputation, and even add greatly to his laurels. His coaching and management of the men on the field are of a high order. All that is needed to make our team able to compete successfully with those of other colleges of like standing, is thorough, systematic training. This they must have.

ALUMNI NOTES.

'59. The class of '59, after thirty-eight years, is still unbroken, its six members all living, Prof. H. L. Atkinson, Dr. W. H. Finn, Rev. Thos. P. Coulston, all of Phila., O. P. Chamberlin, Esq., of Flemington, N. J., Rev. A. J. Furman, of Indiana, Pa., and Rev. A. D. Hawn, of Delaware. Ohio.

Rev. Thos. P. Coulston, D. D., is living at 1120 Ogden St., Phila., having retired from his pastorate some time ago.

Dr. Finn is a prominent and well-to-do physician living at 627 N. 10th St., Phila.

Rev. A. J. Furman, on leaving Lewisburg, became pastor of the Baptist Church at Lock Haven. At the end of two years he resigned to enter the army as Chaplain of the Regt. P. R. V. C. During part of his term of service he served as postmaster of the regiment and while doing so noticed that a great deal of obscene literature was coming through the mails. At the request of the Postmaster General at Washington, with whom he afterward conferred, he prepared a statement of the facts as he saw them. A postal law was promulgated immediately authorizing the postmasters to send to Washington any matter suspected of such a nature, and there it was destroyed This law is still in existence.

'60. Mr. C. V. Gundy is now conducting a Home School for girls and boys at his residence on Sixth street.

'60. Mr. William A. Marr is practicing law at Ashland, Pa.

'60. Hon. Simon P. Wolverton, who served two terms as State Senator of Pennsylvania and one as Representative at Washington, is practicing law in Sunbury. He is now holding the office of Attorney for the Reading Railroad Company.

Ex-'60. Rev. Geo. W. Folwell, who has completed five years' ministry at South Broad St. Baptist Church, Phila., has had printed his anniversary sermon, which shows largely increased and substantial gains in membership and benevolence in the church.

Ex-'60. Arthur Malcom, Esq., has been elected Treasurer of the Baptist Orphanage, Phila.

Ex-'60. Mr. Franklin C. Derr has held the position of teacher in the public schools of Danville, Pa., for a number of years.

'61. Rev. Dr. T. M. Shanafelt is Superintendent of Missions for South Dakota and lives at Huron, S. D. He is author and compiler of Biographical Sketches of Four Hundred Michigan Baptist Ministers. He is also the author of a Baptist History of South Dakota.

'62. Mr. Thos. K. Jones is Vice President and Executive Officer of the National Safe Deposit Savings and Trust Company of Washton, D. C. He graduated from the Columbia Law School in 1868. From 1865 to 1872 he was Accountant in the U. S. Treasury, from 1872 to 1884 he was Cashier of the National Savings Bank, Washington, D. C., and from '84 to '92 was Manager of the New York Branch American Baptist Education Society. In 1892 he entered upon the office he now holds.

'62. Mr. D. Bright Miller is President of the Lewisburg National Bank. He was for a number of years President of the School Board of this place and since the death of David M. Reber has been acting Cashier of the above bank.

'62. Mr. David M. Nesbit is living at College Station, Md. He has for a number of years been a member of the firm of D. M. Nesbit & Co., which operates a large planing mill in East Lewisburg.

'62. Rev. W. H. Conard, D. D., Secretary of the Pennsylvania Baptist State Mission Society is now in his seventeenth year of service in State Mission work. In these years the denomination has made very considerable progress in Pennsylvania. In 1880 there were 568 Baptist churches in the State with a membership of 64,572. In 1896 there were 709 churches and 103,308 members. There are seven counties yet where Baptists are not represented.

'62. Arrangements are being made to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the Mantua Baptist church of Phila,, of which church Rev. J. S. Walker, D. D. has been the only pastor.

'62. By the death of Rev. T. Doughty Miller D., D., who, for almost 33 years was pastor of the First African Baptist Church of Phila., Dr. Walker becomes the senior Baptist pastor of the city.

'68. A paper entitled "The Latest Word on Christian Journalism" was read by the Rev. J. Sexton James, D. D., editor of the Commonwealth, before the Philadelphia Ministers Conference, on the 12th inst.

'71 & '91. W. R. Patton and A. Lincoln Moore have articles in the "Commonwealth" for the 17th inst.

'72. John Ballentine, Ph. D., is principal of the Clarion State Normal School.

'88. Daniel M. Jones preached at the Milton Baptist Church on Sunday, April 18.

Ex-88. Rev. A. W. Hodder is president of the New York Baptist Ministers Conference.

CUPID VS. BUCKNELL. '89. On April 15th, occurred the wedding of Rev. William C. Leinbach, of Chester Springs, to Miss Clara Clark, of Lancaster. The ceremony was performed at the home of the bride's grandparents Mr. and Mrs. William Neider.

There are forty-five graduates of Bucknell who are members of the Philadelphia Conference of Baptist ministers.

Bucknell in Pennsylvania Legislature: House of Representatives, W. L. Nesbit. '60, Ward R. Bliss, '74, J. J. Philips and C. W. Herman, '85. Senate: Hon. W. H. Hyde, of Ridgeway, who was a former student.

EXCHANGES.

"The Power of Music" is the title of a worthy and commendable article in the April issue of The College Folio.

Teacher : "In what direction does the Danube flow ?"

Rachel : "Crooked."—The College Folio.

The Sorosis, published by the young women of the Pennsylvania College, at Pittsburg, is attractive in matter and form—above the average in literary merit.

The Muhlenberg, April number, contained an article entitled "The Silent Wrestlings of Joel Simmons" which shows careful attention. It teaches a beautiful lesson and reflects great credit upon its author.

From an editorial in The Thielensein we glean the fact that the novel plan of having the recitations begin at seven o'clock in the morning has been proposed at Thiel College. This plan is to go into effect during the Spring term.

The April number of The College Mercury contains a very able essay on "The Religious Sentiments of Robert Burns, as expressed in his Poems." The production is worthy of note and shows great care and labor on the part of its author. It would make a fitting introduction to the study of Burns.

"CHE(E)CKMATED.

In the parlor all alone,
They were playing chess ;
He was shy, she was not
That I must confess.
He was speaking of the game,
"Can I mate you Bess ?"
She said, "This is so sudden,
But I suppose I must say—Yes !"

UNIVERSITY NOTES.

COLLEGE.

Dr. Harris tendered a reception to the Senior Class on Friday evening, April 23.

The Athletic Association will hold a fair and festival on May 29th and 30th.

Dr. Aviragnet is delivering a course of lectures on music in Bucknell Hall on each Saturday morning.

A Tennis Association has been organized with the view of promoting inter-class and inter-collegiate tournaments.

Dr. Hulley has been invited to deliver the oration at the quarterly banquet of the Maryland Baptist Social Union in May.

Dr. Perrine delivered an address on Shakespeare's Julius Cæsar before the Theta Alpha Literary Society last Friday evening.

Dr. Hulley delivered a lecture on James Whitcomb Riley on Thursday evening, April 22, under the auspices of the Athletic Association.

The Alumni expect to continue "The Twilight Concert," inaugurated during last year's Commencement week. This year a stand will be erected on the hillside for this purpose.

The University Song Books arrived on Friday morning. The edition consists of 500 copies. They will be found for sale at the two book stores where all who wish can secure a copy for 50 cents.

Dr. L. C. Barnes, of Pittsburgh, preached the sermon before the Christian Associtaions on Sunday morning, April 11. He also delivered a lecture in Bucknell Hall on Monday evening—his subject being, "The Temptations and Joys of a Bishop."

The following well known men have been secured as Commencement orators : Oration before the Literary Societies—President Whitman of Columbian University ; Oration before the Society of the Alumni—Albert Foster, D. D. ; Poem, George Whitman, D. D. ; Address to the Graduating Class of the College—Hon. William N. Ashman, LL. D. ; Miss Myra Reynolds, Ph. D., of Chicago, will deliver the address before the Institute Class.

INSTITUTE.

The regular Y. M. C. A. prayer meeting was led on Tuesday evening, April thirteenth, by Principal Edwards and it was an occasion not soon to be forgotten. We wish that we might frequently have such a spiritual treat.

We want to extend our earnest sympathy to Miss Bessie Freas, of the Class of '95, in her recent great loss in the death of her father, and also to Miss Margaret Montgomery, who was called home last week on account of the death of her brother.

ATHLETICS.

BUCKNELL VS. MILTON.—The base ball season was opened by a game with Milton on April 10. Though the weather was raw and only six innings were played, still it was possible to get a line on the team in general, and Shortell in particular. The team played together well, while Shortell's work in the box was excellent. Score :

Bucknell, ... 2 1 0 5 0 * —8
Milton .... 0 0 0 1 0 0 —1

WATSONTOWN DEFEATED.—Bucknell had no trouble in defeating Watsontown on the 17th. The latter played a loose fielding game, and could not solve Shortell's delivery, twelve of them being struck out. Score was : Bucknell 24, Watsontown, 9. Bucknell plays the Milton Professionals at Milton, May 12.

VOL. XVI. LEWISBURG, PA., MAY 10, 1897. No. 14.

TWO KINDS OF PHILOSOPHY.

Chill your longings, quiet your desires,
Chide your soul for its burning heart fires;
Brook no feeling, pleasure or pain,
Let them not touch you—they strive in vain.

Be a stoic: let Father Time
Paint all the past with mem'ries sublime;
View these pictures, see in them naught:
Live by the rule of cold, logic thought.

Be it Christmas, frown on its mirth,
Its "Glory to God" and "Peace on earth,"
Children happy, joyful and gay,
Be thou still feelingless on that day.

Be not cheerful and be not sad,
If others are happy, be not glad;
Care for no one, neither for foes;
Joyed by no pleasures, pained by no woes.

Hearty feeling, genuine soul,
Having strong yearnings under control;
Touched by sorrow, trouble and pain:
Such careful lives are not lived in vain.

Thrilled with nature's melody sweet—
Songsters above you, brooks at your feet:
Let your soul-life uplifted be
Towards God who made both flowers and thee.

Is it folly for us to love,
That which the infinite God above
When he had finished, "saw it was good,"
As he viewed it all from where he stood?

Are we to crush all sentiment,
And with food and raiment be content?
Shall no breath of higher things,
Float into being on zephyr wings?

Why was this world of nature made?
What is the use of sunshine and shade?
Is there any reason for trees?
For meadows of flowers, for sands, for seas?

It is not folly for us to love
That which the infinite God above,
When he had finished "saw it was good,"
As he viewed it all from where he stood.

There's good in all that God has made;
There's reason in the sunshine and shade;
There's wisdom in each tiny flower,
E'en though it fades in a single hour.

VINCKNT B. FISK.

REV. JOSEPH GREEN MILES.

The subject of the following brief sketch, although not an alumnus of Bucknell, nevertheless had a very close connection with the University from its very beginning. His services rendered in behalf of the school in its early days deserve at least this quiet and brief recognition.

Joseph Green Miles was born at Milesburg, Pa., Dec. 2, 1817. He spent several years in school at Haddington and when its doors were closed he spent several years more at Denison University, Granville, Ohio. After leaving Denison he decided to enter the ministry and was accordingly ordained at Milesburg in 1841. He was converted at West Chester at 17 years of age.

His connection with the University at Lewisburg began in 1845. He was one of the committee of five appointed to consider the advisability and prospects of founding a Baptist school. His labors relative to the accepted plan of the committee were zealous and unremitting, spending much time in presenting the enterprise to the Baptists of the State, and in raising funds. He is catalogued a member of the Board of Curators during the years 1857–'63. From 1863–'66 he was an industrious and prominent member of the Board of Trustees.

During the war he collected funds in connection with his pastoral labors for the maintenance of the University. His services were earnestly sought for as chaplain in the army by Gen. Gregg. He was, however, detained from going to the front by his friends for good reasons. After his official connection with the school was severed he still continued to his death a firm friend and active supporter of the University.

His ministry was a long and successful one, covering over 55 years. During that time he held twenty or more pastorates. He was beloved by all who knew him. His counsel was eagerly sought in all matters of difficulty in church circles. A friend of the poor, his loss is widely felt. His grave and reverential bearing never failed to win the respect of friend or foe. True to his mission until death, he leaves his record behind engraved on the memories of a host of widely scattered acquaintances. He fell asleep at his home in White Deer Valley, Nov. 18, 1896.

GEORGE G. GROFF, M. D., LL. D.

George G. Groff was born on "Welsh Tract," near Valley Forge, Chester conuty, Pa., April 5, 1851. He was educated in the public schools, Freemont Seminary, Norristown, Pa., also West Chester Normal School, Michigan University, Long Island College Hospital and University of Leipzig.

He prepared to enter the Junior class of Brown University at Freemont Seminary in 1870. Received the degrees of B. A. from the State Normal School at West Chester in 1875, M. D. from the Long Island College Hospital in 1877, M. A. from Lafayette College in 1882, and in 1885 LL. D. from Judson College.

He taught in the public schools three years and in West Chester S. N. S. two years, was Laboratory Assistant at the University of Michigan one year and has been at Bucknell University since 1879.

Dr. Groff has held the following prominent State and County positions: Coroner of Union county 6 years, Assistant Surgeon of the National Guard of Pennsylvania 4 years, member and Sanitarian of the State Board of Agriculture 10 years, and of the State Board of Health 11 years, and Entomological Expert of State Board of Agriculture. He has also been editor of the publications of the State Board of Health since its organization, as well as author of numerous charts and note-books for use to students He is the regular correspondent of the New York Independent.

Dr. Groff has introduced the following branches of study into Bucknell and with them laboratory methods of instruction: Biology, Zoology, Analytical and Quantitative and Physical Chemistry, Toxicology, Human and Comparative Anatomy, Animal and Vegetable Histology, Embryology and Sanitary Science. He was also the originator of the system of Lectures for class instruction, which is a prominent feature of the course.

Before he became professor the Science Work in Bucknell was limited to General Chemistry two terms, Geology one term, Physiology one term, Botany 6 weeks.

Ex-President David J. Hill has said that Dr. Groff is the Father of Coeducation at Bucknell University, he having at once begun to agitate in favor of the movement on becoming a member of the Faculty.

He became a member of the Great Valley Baptist Church in 1869.

WILLIAM CYRUS BARTOL, A. M., PH. D.

William Cyrus Bartol, professor of mathematics and astronomy in Bucknell University, was born in Huntingdon, Pa., November 24, 1847. He prepared for college in the public schools of his native town and entered the University at Lewisburg in the fall of 1868, graduated with honor in 1872, with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. The class of 1872, numbering twenty-one, was the largest that had been graduated from the University up to that time. As a class they have been loyal to their Alma Mater, and at their reunions which have been held regularly at intervals of five years since their graduation, Dr. Bartol has never failed to be present.

During his college course, Dr. Bartol was known as a thorough and conscientious student, who had, however, a surplus of time and energy to devote to athletics and social interests. Base-ball was at that time the all-absorbing attraction of the college world. The 'Varsity team was named the "Olympians" and rarely fine was the record they made. Dr. Bartol was one of their best players, having been for one season captain of the team.

He was an active member of Theta Alpha Literary Society, in which he held office as censor and president. On the staff of the College Herald, he served both as business manager and editor. He was also a member of the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity.

During a series of marvelous revival services held early in the year 1869, he, with many other students of the University, among whom was President Harris, was converted and joined the Baptist Church. Since his return to Lewisburg as a member of the faculty, he has been actively identified with the work of the church, which he has served as trustee for fourteen years and as deacon for three years.

After his graduation, he entered immediately upon his life-work as an educator. During the early years of his teaching, he gained experience in varied phases of school work, being successively instructor in mathematics in the Lime Rock academy, Connecticut; principal of the high school at Centre Hall, Pennsylvania; Superintendent of the common schools in Union Grove, Wisconsin ; principal of the Huntingdon academy, Pennsylvania; and instructor in mathematics in the Pennsylvania State Normal School at Mansfield. While teaching at Mansfield, he was frequently called upon to address teachers' institutes upon methods of teaching mathematics. Having become by this time well and favorably known to the educational world, it is not surprising that he was offered almost simultaneously positions in three different institutions. He accepted the call to the chair of mathematics in his Alma Mater and entered upon his duties in 1881.

When the Bucknell Observatory was built, Dr. Bartol superintended the construction and equipment. In addition to his arduous duties as a teacher, he finds time to write occasional articles for the press, has assisted in the revision of the mathematical works of Dr. French, published by Harper and Brothers, and has himself written a text-book on Solid Geometry, published by Leach, Shewell and Sanborn. In June, 1895, the degree of Doctor of Philosophy was conferred on him by Adrian College, Michigan.

On April 13, 1874, Dr. Bartol married Miss Belle Africa, of Huntingdon, Pa. They have had four children—three daughters and one son. His oldest daughter Mary is now studying Greek and modern languages in the graduate department of the University of Michigan. His second daughter, Belle, graduated from Bucknell Institute in 1896.

There is no other professor on the faculty more deeply and unselfishly interested in everything that concerns the happiness and welfare of the students. He has contributed generously to the Endowment Fund and is confidently appealed to by the Athletic Association and other organizations, whenever it is in his power to give them practical assistance of any kind. By intimate personal contact with his pupils in his home and on the campus, as well as in the class-room, he has won their respect and love.

WILLIAM GUNDY OWENS, A. M.,

PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY AND PHYSICS.

William Gundy Owens was born on a farm near Lewisburg, May 14th, 1858. On his mother's side he comes from the hearty Gundy stock, from whom he inherits a ruggedness and degree of good health so characteristic of that family. His father is Capt. John A. Owens, of Lewisburg.

He received his rudimentary education in the public schools of Pittsburg and Allegheny. In 1874 he entered the preparatory department of the old University at Lewisburg. In 1876 he was matriculated in the Freshman Class of the University, pursuing the classical course, and at the end of which, in 1880, he received his Bachelor's degree. Three years later he was awarded the Master's degree in Course. After graduation, he became an instructor in the University Academy, a position which he filled with great acceptability until 1885. During these years of practical experience in teaching, Prof. Owens was not idle. He was continually broadening out and developing his education along scientific lines, either by personal investigation or under private instruction. During the summer of 1885, he took a special course in Chemistry at Harvard. On August 18th, of the same summer, he married Miss F. Jeanette Waffle, who previous to that time had been an efficient teacher in the Institute.

Owing to the increasing attendance the board of trustees in 1885 created the position of adjunct professor of Natural Science, and called Prof. Owens to the place which he held during 1885 and 1886. In 1887 the Chair of Chemistry and Physics was established and Prof. Owens was made the professor of that department, a position which he has held since.

Prof. Owens has thus far given his entire active life to his Alma Mater. In 1889 he took the summer Semester at the University of Berlin, and also visited a number of Laboratories abroad for the purpose of securing ideas for the new Bucknell Laboratory, the plans for which were then under discussion.

Prof. Owens has always been loyal to all interests at Bucknell. He was a member of the Euepia literary society and the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity. It was under the guidance of his master hand that the department of Chemistry at Bucknell has attained to-day the place that it relatively holds, not only for the amount, thoroughness and character of the work, but for the completeness of the course. It is a signal fact that a student after having taken a course of chemistry at Bucknell, is so fully equipped in that department that his work is recognized and accepted by the great medical schools of the community.

Prof. Owens, by his great energy and careful management, has added much to the material equipment of his department. Naturally a genius, he has constructed a vast amount of experimental apparatus, representing hundreds of dollars, and for the time spent upon its construction he has not exacted a single dollar from the institution in the way of recompense.

He is a man endowed with a personality of firmness and at the same time possesses an element of kindness. He is a strong man among young men and wields a powerful influence for good over those who come under his instruction.

LINCOLN HULLEY, A. M., PH. D.

PROFESSOR OF HISTORY AND HEBREW.

Lincoln Hulley was born May 3, 1865, near Camden, N. J. His educational career has been marked and his strides forward very pronounced. While quite young his parents moved to Chester, Pa., where Lincoln attended school, graduating from the high school at a very early age as valedictorian of his class. Soon after he entered Keystone Academy, pursued with distinction the classical course, and graduated with highest honors. In 1884 he entered Bucknell, where he kept up his unbroken record for scholastic attainment, winning seven out of the nine prizes awarded to his class. After graduating at Bucknell he secured a scholarship at Harvard, spent one year there specializing in philosophy, and graduated in '90 with the degree of Bachelor of Arts. In the fall of '90, in which year he was ordained to the ministry, he returned to Bucknell, where he taught for three years in the Academy and Institute.

In the summer of '91 he studied Hebrew at Chautauqua under Dr. Harper, then of Yale, and won the admiration and firm friendship of that gentleman. In '92, when Dr. Harper became President of the University of Chicago, Professor Hulley accepted a fellowship in Semitic languanges at that institution. While in Chicago he was elected to the chair of Hebrew and Biblical Literature at Bucknell, a position which he accepted.

During a part of and since '94 he has taken charge of the Department of History in addition to his Hebrew and Biblical Literature.

In 1895 he was invited to become a member of The Jerusalem Council, an organization consisting of seventy or more of the foremost biblical students of our country.

During the summer vacations since '93 he has presided over, lectured at, and taught in various summer schools, such as Lakeside, Ohio, and Mt. Eagle, Tenn.

During the present year, in addition to his class-room work, he has filled the pulpit of the Immanuel Tabernacle in Baltimore with marked success.

During the coming summer vacation Dr. and Mrs. Hulley intend to go abroad in the interest of history, and to spend three weeks in London, three in Paris and three in Berlin.

This sketch has been concerned entirely with Dr. Hulley's educational career. Not that he has no other sides, for he is a kind husband, a loving father, an earnest christian, a true man.

FLOWER FANCIES.

Long ago there lived happily together in a woody dell a family of Dog Tooth Violets. They were a happy little group. The winds fanned their fair faces in the heat of noon, and hushed them to sleep with tender lullabies as the sun slowly sank in the West. All day long the bees and ants with an occasional beetle or butterfly worked busily around them. Contentment gave each little blossom a confiding nod to the world at large. But, one day, I remember it was just after that diligent little Wren had flown by with a delicious morsel for her clamoring brood, a dashing Butterfly came flitting down the meadow. He was as splendent as the rainbow. Dew drops seemed to have crystallized on his graceful wings. As he coquetted from flower to flower, the glory of this "imprisoned rainbow" burst upon our happy family in their quiet home. Lo! The wonderful vision was coming towards them! Such honor was seldom bestowed on such shy little sisters. Each cast gentle glances toward the gay intruder. He floated over the little group in indecision. Poising himself in princely survey, with a flutter of his wings, he alighted on the meekest and most unobtrusive. With fond caresses he woed her. At such preference the others looked amazed; but, in the main, were kind-hearted enough to rejoice in their gentle sister's good fortune. But one, the largest and most brilliant, tossed her head in assumed indifference, and with an angry look at the happy pair turned her back upon them. We regret anger and jealousy in our flower friends. But, nevertheless, jealous she was, for the attention she thought was hers by right. Feasting on these evil thoughts her delicate petals turned a darker yellow in her rage. Our little friend revealed her passion in her face.

Now it so chanced that as Dashing Spray (such we will call our butterfly friend) came merrily down towards his fate,—an old crumpy professor was out seeking for what he could find. With spectacles resting lightly on the tip of his nose, his damp hair escaping in unruly locks from his broad farmer's hat, he made a comical picture—especially in his frantic endeavors to ensnare in his mosquito net the meadow butterflies, or as crouched before some favorite flower he loved. Now it happened that the old professor perceiving in Dashing Spray a rare addition to his collection, invaded stealthily the mossy sanctum. As his eye chanced upon our little friend, with a loud exclamation, he fell on his knees in wonderment and rejoicing before the haughty Violet.

"Tis different,"—he cried, "Eureka! I have discovered a new variety! My name shall be added to the roll of Fame. See! Is it not a deeper yellow, is not the flower poised with a more haughty grace!", and he carefully loosened the mould from about her tiny rootlets. Our envious sister has found an admirer! Her anger and rebellion have resulted in her being tenderly carried away in the professor's botanizing case, to be talked of, gazed upon, and mayhaps, loved. But, is she as happy as when living contentedly in her little dell, happy in the home cluster? Adder's Tongue they christened her, our once gentle little Violet! How she spurned herself! How she writhed under the slur implied. Never has she regained her old-time gayety. The soul of the flower wasted away when anger and resentment entered. Her sister Violets still bloom, side by side, in their little dell, the same bees hum, and sing them to sleep, the same gorgeous butterflies cheer them, but—there is a gulf between the two. They are still the modest Dog tooth Violets, kith and kin, but she is now the Adder's Tongue. E. M. B. '98.

ATLANTIC CITY—ITS PLEASURES AND HOTELS.

We have received from the General Passenger Department of the Philadelphia and Reading Railway a neatly arranged Booklet descriptive of Atlantic City, containing a complete list of the Hotels, their location, rates, etc., and showing several illustrations of seaside scenes, and also telling some of the manifold advantages which make "The Royal Reading Route" the favorite line of travel to the sea.

Copies can be obtained by sending a two-cent stamp to Mr. Edson J. Weeks, General Passenger Agent, Reading Terminal, Philadelphia.

EDITORIALS.

Class Day will be observed this year as heretofore, and the class hope to make these, perhaps the most novel and interesting of the commencement exercises, rival, if not excel, in originality and charm those of all preceding years. They have in view a very entertaining and novel program, and will spare no time nor labor to make it a success. They intend to devote a whole day, as near as possible, to strictly Class Day exercises. and to make that day, the last on which they will ever be together as students and friends, a fitting memorial of the class of '97.

The Song Book published by the class of '97 is being favorably received on all sides. It is gratifying to the Board of Editors to know that they have succeeded in meeting the expectation of the students and alumni. Competent judges are expressing their favorable opinions. To be sure the book is not perfect; this was not expected by the Board. Neither will any considerate persons pronounce the book a failure because of errors or defects. It is hoped that the songs will soon become familiar to all and that there may ring out nightly on the evening air the sweet sound of melodious voices.

A very commendable plan is to be put into execution during the coming vacation by Dr. and Mrs. Hulley. They are to go abroad in the interest of history and spend three weeks each in the cities—London, Paris and Berlin. This reminds us of the plan that is pursued in some of our leading universities, that of giving to the professors a Sabbatical year, one year in every seven in which they may travel, study abroad, or do anything that will make them better teachers, better thinkers, better men. No one doubts the wisdom of this plan where it can be carried out, and would that this might be done at Bucknell.

One of the most important athletic victories of the year was gained by our relay team on April 24th, at the University of Pennsylvania Inter-collegiate Relay Races,—important because it opens up to Bucknell a wider field, a broader horizon, a larger scope for more extended athletic advancement and progress. This is a comparatively new branch of sport at Bucknell. Base ball is as old as the college, foot ball has attained is ripe maturity, tennis is a child of many summers, but field sports are in their infancy. We hope that the impetus gained from this victory will bring these most exciting and pleasurable sports into a more prominent place in the athletic world of Bucknell. Each one of the four runners received as a prize a neat and tasty gold watch, and in addition to these the team as a whole received a splendid banner as a trophy of their victory.

Lewisburg is a quaint and beautiful town. Her fine old trees and shaded walks, her antique bridges of stone, and the Susquehanna's fair expanse lying at her feet, all appeal to the aesthetic within us. The country on every side of the town stretches away into hills of peaceful blue; and everywhere the eye is enticed by the exquisite forms of natural beauty it beholds. And when one has left the dear old town, rich in the memories of halcyon days—how he longs to vivify again the dreamy scenes of the past. This is the experience of those who have spent a few short years here and then have gone forth. You can prevent this mournful longing. You can carry vivid pictures of these happy days with you. Have you seen "Labor Omnia Vincit," "The Old Home Farm," "Engine 390," "Old Bruin" and "Golden Days" at "The Cabinet"? Have you asked Mr. Fisk to show you his fine collection of views of all the interesting scenes in and about Lewisburg? Don't wait another day without giving your eyes this treat.

ALUMNI NOTES.

'58. Mr. Elisha Rittenhouse, of Asbury Park, N. J., in reply to correspondence states that after about 8 years of teaching in different parts of N. J., he was compelled to engage in outside employment on account of his health. He spent some time as a travelling agent, at building, contracting, house decorating, etc. He says: "I still feel an interest in the University and have aided some men to get their education there."

'58. Immediately on graduating Mr. Jesse Dean Cooper and his classmate Mr. Milton Opp, who has died some time since, started for the South. They took charge of the High School at Moulton, Ala. After teaching a session there Opp returned to Pennsylvania and Cooper to Chapel Hill, Tenn. He entered the army at that time and fought the remaining four years in some of the greatest and most severe battles of the war, coming out finally without injury. In 1869 he was married and accepted the position of Principal in the High School at Centreville, Ala. Being the owner of a cotton plantation he turned his entire attention to farming thereafter. In 1878–9 he was elected State Representative. In conclusion he says,—"I have lost all traces of my classmates and know nothing of their doings in life. A little sketch of the life of each one would be a most interesting document to me." It is the aim of the Board that it may be possible for each one of the Alumni to obtain just such a "document."

'59. Dr. Abraham DeHart Hawn, the last named member of this class, was born and reared in the vicinity of Lewisburg. He was licensed and ordained to the ministry of the Presbyterian Church the same year of his graduation. For the first twenty years of his ministry he occupied pulpits in Shamokin, Williamsport and Zanesville, Ohio, and for the last eighteen has been in his present pastorate at Delaware, Ohio. His church has a membership of six hundred and the town is the seat of Ohio Wesleyan University, one of the largest of Methodist Institutions. Dr. Hawn has been five times a delegate to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and in 1896 was a delegate from that body to the Pan Presbyterian Council which met in Glasgow, Scotland. At the close of the Council he spent some time in travel in England and the Continent. In June 1883 he received the honorary degree of D. D. from his Alma Mater and in 1884 was elected Moderator of the Synod of Ohio and its sessions in Cincinnati. Since his licensure in June, 1859, he has been continually engaged in the work of the Gospel ministry and will this year complete thirty-eight years of successful labor.

'63. Rev. Henry C. Monroe is now in his second year as pastor of the Baptist churches of Moreland and White Hall, Pa.

'63. Rev. W. W. Winten, who is pastor of a small church at Corwith, Iowa, after graduation here attended Rochester University and graduated there in 1866 as A. B. In 1868 he graduated in theology and in 1872 as D. D. S. at the Penna. College of Dental Surgery. For eleven years thereafter he practiced dentistry in Philadelphia, at the same time supplying destitute missions and churches. He still practices in his profession and attends to his duties as a pastor as well.

'63. Rev. Dr. Owen P. Eaches, of Hightstown, N. J., who has been Secretary of the New Jersey Baptist Education Board for the past 55 years, taught one year in college after coming home from the army. Many or all of this class received their diplomas in this way upon their return from the war. He was ordained at Nicetown, Phila., in 1866. He is now finishing his 27th year in the pastorate at Hightstown. Dr. Eaches is a member of the Boards of Crozer Seminary and Peddie Institute.

'63. Rev. W. W. Case, of Rutherford, N. J., was ordained a Baptist minister at Berwick, Pa., Nov. 5, 1863. Dr. J. R. Loomis preached the Ordination Sermon. He became Chaplain of the 195th Penna. Volunteers in 1864 and served until mustered out in the fall of that year. For more than ten years he was pastor at Hamilton Square, N. J., the home of Mr. E. C. Conover, of great renown in Athletic circles at Bucknell. During his pastorate of twelve years at Holmdel, N. J., a parsonage and chapel were built and the church edifice remodeled at an expense of $14,000. He is now Secretary of the Education Committee of the Board of Corporators of Peddie Institute on which board he has served the greater part of eighteen to twenty years. Rev. Case has three daughters. One of whom is a graduate of the Woman's Art School of New York and another is a medical student in the Woman's Medical College of that city.

Ex-'63. Rev. David Spencer, D. D., is editor of the Morris Journal, Dover, N. J. In a letter to the Registrar, Dr. Spencer says—"I have about recovered my health, but I have not regained fully the old grip and courage, and, perhaps never shall again, but I do not murmur, my old love for the University abides, and I rejoice in its prosperity."

'64. Prof. Robert A. Townsend was admitted to the Lancaster County Bar in 1867, after graduating three years before, with the highest honors of his class. The same year he became a professor in the Lancaster High School. He later held the following positions,—at Winchester, Tenn., Professor of Mathematics; in Mary Sharp College, Professor of Languages; at Ghent College, Ghent, Ky.; Principal in the High School and Superintendent of city schools at Vincennes, Ind., and Professor of Languages in the Reading High School where he is now located.

Ex-'64. Mr. A. K. Marr is a practicing lawyer in Shamokin, Pa.

At a meeting of the board of Managers of the General Alumni Association of the College, the annual tax was levied upon all the Alumni. The tax this year is one dollar per caput and it is hoped that there will be a general response to the treasurer's call for the same, inasmuch as the Association has made a more liberal donation than usual this year toward securing a band of note to furnish the Commencement music.

The Madisonensis gives us some spicy and pleasing poems under "Colgate Verse." Seven beautiful poems on one page! This is worth noting. The long drawn-out effort at verse-making is not popular in college journalism.

The Hackettstonian for April has two good articles, one on the "Majesty of Laws" and the other on "Lincoln." We do not agree that Lincoln's place, however, is second to that of Washington. No name is dearer to Americans of the true type than that of Lincoln.

"Ye Olden Days," in The Washington Jeffersonian for April is interesting. Few colleges can point with more pride to alumni who have won greater fame in the realms of theology, politics and statesmanship than Dr. Cuyler, Senator Quay and Hon. James G. Blaine respectively.

"Recollections of an Old Boy," by Josiah Ryland, A. B., one of the two members who composed the first class to graduate from Richmond College, is one of the best and most interesting articles in the April exchanges. It is, in fact, a brief history of the college. P. S. Hensen, D. D., LL. D., was the lone classmate of Mr. Ryland when they completed their course in 1849. Dr. Hensen is pastor of the First Baptist Church in Chicago.

UNIVERSITY ITEMS.

COLLEGE.

Prof. Martin delivered an address before Euepia Literary Society on last Friday evening.

The contest in elocution by the pupils of the Institute was held in Bucknell Hall last Saturday evening.

Dr. Aviragnet will give a cantata on the 3rd of June for the benefit of the Christian Associations of the University.

The University will have five thousand Commencement programs printed and will issue thirty-five hundred invitations.

The Soiree of the Fourth Year Class of the Institute was held in Bucknell Hall on Saturday evening, May 1st.

Field-day will be held on May 29. Besides the awarding of the MIRROR cup it is probable that prizes will be awarded to the winners of each event.

W. C. Gretzinger will deliver the address at the McEwensville Academy Commencement on June 11th. J. Brown Martin will have charge of the music.

Dr. Perrine's Lecture, "Some Proverbs not Solomons," which is the last of the popular Lecture Course will be delivered on May 24, in Bucknell Hall.

Dr. Hulley has obtained leave of absence from the school of Hebrew and English Bible at Lakeside, Ohio, and with Mrs. Hulley will spend the summer in Europe in the interest of history.

Either the Ringold Band of Reading or the Third Brigade Band of Pottsville will be secured to furnish music during Commencement week. Two twilight concerts will be given instead of one, as formerly.

Prof. Consor, Principal of the Public Schools of Sunbury, as a guest at the Laboratory, on Friday evening April 3d, witnessed several interesting and successful experiments in the construction of Lantern Slides.

It is expected that steps will soon be taken with a view of putting down a quarter of a mile cinder track on the campus. It seems absolutely essential now for the proper development of running that a track should be built. This is especially true since the University now holds two first place pennants.

Dr. Hulley delivered an address at the twenty-fifth anniversary of Hon. Joshua Levering's Sunday School on Sunday, May 2; on Monday morning he addressed the Baltimore Conference of ministers and in the evening delivered an oration before the Maryland Baptist's Social Union at their quarterly banquet.

A festival and entertainment will be given in Tustin Gymnasium May 28 and 29 for the benefit of the Athletic Association. Refreshments will be served and amusements of all descriptions indulged in. It is urged that all interested in Athletics will lend a helping hand. The following ladies have been chosen as an auxiliary to the finance committee: Representing the ladies of town—Mrs. Wm. Leiser and Miss Kelly; College girls A. A.—Miss Hartley; Institute Faculty—Misses Bell and Armitage; Institute—Misses Batten and O'Donnell.

INSTITUTE.

Miss Marion Crary, of Sheffield, a former student, has been visiting friends in the Institute.

The Senior Class of the Institute will render the "House of Martha," dramatized, on June 17 and 18 in Bucknell Hall.

Miss Rebecca Leibensperger, of Allenwood, came to the Institute on Thursday, May 6th, to visit her friend Miss Marguerite Miller.

Mr. J. Colin Vaughan who has lived for the last six years in California and Arizona recently spent several days with his sister, Miss Elspeth Vaughan.

The elocutionary contest, which was held in Bucknell Hall, Saturday evening, May eighth, did credit to all who took part and to the instructor, Miss Armitage. The contestants were Misses Elizabeth Rossiter, Gertrude Ross, Mabel E. Batten, Isabelle Schweier, N. May Lochman, Elspeth Vaughan, Margaret Runyan, Charlotte Shields and Clara Slifer.

At the regular meeting of the Y. W. C. A. on Tuesday evening, May 4th, the annual election of officers was held. The following have been elected for the ensuing year: President, Miss Anna Rodgers; Vice President, Miss Edith Phillips; Recording Secretary, Miss Myra Sprague; Corresponding Secretary, Miss Jessie Wheeler, Treasurer, Miss Alicia Zierden.

The Soiree of the Class of '98 on Saturday May first, was greatly enjoyed by all who attended. The platform was tastefully decorated with easy chairs and palms while on the wall hung the class banner of pink roses, the figures '98 being in silver. The literary exercises were fully up to the standard established in previous years. Literature for Young People was the subject of the evening's entertainment. The authors considered were Wordsworth, Ripling, Riley, Whittier, Mrs. Ewing, Field, Lewis Carroll, Kingsley, Mrs. Browning, and Hawthorne. While Miss Moses, in her essay on Lewis Carroll told the story of "Alice in Wonderland", four little people acted out the story in pantomine, affording a pleasing surprise.

ACADEMY.

Principal Edwards will receive the members of the Fourth Form the evening of May 20th.

ATHLETICS.

BUCKNELL WINS THE RELAY.

On the 28th, Bucknell lost to Lafayette at Easton, by the score 9–0.

The base ball team was defeated at Williamsport by the Y. M. C. A. of that place on April 24. Score: Y. M. C. A. 9; Bucknell 8.

The relay race participated in by Bucknell, Gettysburg, Dickinson and Franklin and Marshall on April 24, at Franklin Field, was won by Bucknell in 3.42 1-5. Meeker, who ran the first lap, finished second; Riemer and Conover finished third in the second and third laps, and Pearse, in the last lap, jumped to the front winning easily from Gettysburg.

Bucknell vs. Danville.—Bucknell won easily from Danville on the 8th. Danville played a very good game and it looked like a victory for them at the end of the first inning, but from that time on they could not hit Shortell's curves. Bucknell played excellent ball. Shortell's pitching being the feature of the game, striking out eleven men. Umpire, Eichholtz. Score:

Danville,	2	0	1	0	0	0	0	0	0— 3
Bucknell,	2	4	0	5	1	1	4	3	*—20

BUCKNELL MIRROR.

Vol. XVI. Lewisburg, Pa., May 25, 1897. No. 15.

QUOTATION.

Enoch Perrine, A. M., Litt. D.

"The next best thing to being witty one's self is to be able to quote from another's wit."

A. The value of an apt quotation. It shows the writer's (1) taste, (2) accuracy; and (3) reenforces his thought by the power of a great name whose form of expression is supposed to be well-nigh faultless.

B. The essentials of an apt quotation. (1) Accuracy. A writer's form of expression is his own—he can sell nothing but the right to use it. When one buys a copy of Shakspere, he may use the words just as he finds them. He may not alter them, any more than he may add an arm to the Venus of Melos or obliterate the warts from Cromwell's portrait. Every expression worth quoting is a work of fine art—the child of the artist's brain. Over it he has supreme jurisdiction. He may alter it the better to suit his judgment; but when once sent forth, neither bungler nor superior artist has the right to change it. One may make another and a better if he can and pleases; but this is not his to meddle with any more than is the chaste lily his that he should paint it. Those who have tinkered the church's hymns to fit their own dogmas—how can they escape the scorn of all honest folk?

These are the ethical and æsthetic sides to the matter, but there is a practical side as well. When one quotes incorrectly, he shows haste or slovenliness or vagueness in his work—and people are less willing to trust his thinking. Moreover, those who know will lament and perhaps resent the barbarous deed—he has put a fly in the ointment whose savor was so sweet to them. Cherishing indignation, they will lose the force of or miss altogether his thought, if he have any. An old friend of theirs has been maltreated—dressed up in toggery that saddens and mayhap disgusts them. Milton says:

"and the dull swain
Treads on it daily with his clouted shoon";

but Burke quotes: "and the rude swain Treads on it daily with his clouted shoon." A slight mistake, to be sure, but sufficient to lessen its power with those who know the original, causing the judicious to grieve that Burke could or would commit the crime. St. Paul says: "carried about by every wind of doctrine"; but Burke says: "blown about by every wind of fashionable doctrine"—and we feel that even if there be not an inaccurate quotation, Burke would better have thrown his thought into some mould less like that we know so well. Shakspere says: "as broad and general as the casing air"; but Burke says: "as broad and general as the air"—and here there is as much grief for the omission of a word as in the former case there was for the insertion of one.

And yet mere accuracy in quoting the words of an author is an easy and of itself by no means a profitable task. One may quote another's words and at the same time misquote his thought. Men say: "Brevity is the soul of wit"—and they mean that the witty man is brief in his sentences, that you cannot be both "lengthy" and witty, that wit is short, sharp, epigrammatic. But when talkative and tedious old Polonius says that "brevity is the soul of wit," he uses the word wit in its etymological sense of knowledge, information, deriving it from the Anglo-Saxon word witan, to know. He is trying to tell the queen that Hamlet is mad, merely conveying information to her. And instead of saying: "Your son is suffering from mental hallucination," he bluntly blurts out: "Your noble son is mad." He seems to understand, for once at least, that the use of many words may hide the meaning, and that the "plain" fact is more easily comprehended when expressed by the fewest words possible. And he is right. But one readily sees that in almost every case Polonius is misquoted—his words are used, his thought missed. Hence when used in this way, the quotation grates harshly upon the ears of those who know their Shakspere—they have their doubts about the writer's ability or trustworthiness—while those who know nothing of Shakspere are either misled or not led at all, and in either case there is a miserable business.

Nevertheless, one may quote accurately the words and thoughts of an author, and yet really misquote after all. Another reflects upon your character and in hot indignation you exclaim:

"Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
But he that filches from me my good name
Robs me of that which not enriches him
And makes me poor indeed."

That is fine! But when you remember who says it—Iago, "this hellish villain," the "Spartan dog, More fell than anguish, hunger or the sea"—and that he said it while like a demi-devil he was ensnaring the soul and body of the great-hearted Othello, then you say: "Is the Devil quoting Scripture again? Have we another Iago on our hands?" The force of the quotation is lessened, since good words must come from the lips of a good man or else the heart is taken out of them. If one makes the point that a bad man may speak good words to hide his villainy, he does well to quote Iago; but if he is merely hurling back the slurs upon his own good name, he has no business with the words Iago, "this damned villain" and "pernicious caitiff" as Othello called him and had good reason for believing him to be.

FRANK ERNEST ROCKWOOD, A. M.

PROFESSOR OF THE LATIN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE.

The subject of this sketch, Frank Ernest Rockwood, is a native of New England. He was prepared for college at Dean Academy, Franklin, Mass., and was graduated from Brown University in 1874, with the degree of Bachelor of Arts, at which time he delivered the Latin salutatory. In 1877 he received the degree of Master of Arts from his Alma Mater. In 1885 he pursued graduate studies under Prof. Lindsay, of Boston University, and in 1888 he went abroad and spent some time in study in Leipsic and in Berlin. He had the legal profession in view and to this end he spent one year in his brother's law office in Providence, R. I. Teaching being more to his inclination he abandoned his preparation for the law and became an instructor in South Jersey Institute, Bridgeton, N. J. Here Prof. Rockwood spent nearly ten years teaching Latin and Mathematics. In 1885 he was elected to the chair of Latin in Bucknell University.

Since Prof. Rockwood has been at Bucknell he has spent much time in writing, and as a result has given to the educational world two of the finest Latin text books now used in American colleges. His first production was "Selections from Velleius," which he edited in 1893, and which was put out by Leach, Shewell and Sanborn. This book has had an unprecedented sale and is now being used extensively in the best colleges. In 1894 Prof. Rockwood edited "Cicero de Senectute," published by the American Book Company. This publication has been given more than usual attention by text-book reviewers, and has brought to Prof. Rockwood a great reputation as a scholarly Latinist.

Prof. Rockwood is a member of the Delta Kappa Epsilon Fraternity and of the Phi Beta Kappa Society. He is also a distinguished member of the American Dialect Society and the American Philological Association.

Although not an Alumnus of the University, Prof. Rockwood is intensely interested in all that pertains to the welfare of the University. He has been exceedingly interested in the improvement of the library and has been of no little assistance in aiding the development of this department. But above all things, Prof. Rockwood has given his greatest attention to Athletics. He has done more to make Bucknell an athletic institution than any one person now connected with it. He has given his time, his money and we might say his "undivided attention" to the development of Athletics at this institution.

Prof. Rockwood not only commands the respect of the students for the solidity and character of his work in the class room, but he has won their admiration for his unalloyed interest in their sports. He is a model of accuracy and precision; and his fondness for good, clean college sports, has given to him the friendship of the entire undergraduate body.

ENOCH PERRINE, A. M., LITT. D.

JOHN PRICE CROZER PROFESSOR OF RHETORIC AND ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Enoch Perrine was born at Hightstown, N. J., Nov. 18th, 1853. He was prepared for college at Alexander's Classical Institute and at Peddie Institute, graduating from the latter institution in 1870. He was graduated from Brown University in 1874, and received the degree of A. M. from that institution in 1882. In 1875–76 he was the editor of the daily True American, published at Trenton. N. J. In 1877 he studied law, which he relinquished to help establish and edit Seaside, a paper printed at Manasquan, N. J. This was in 1878, and in 1879 he was chosen to conduct the Latin Department in Peddie Institute, a position which he filled until 1886, when he was called to the chair of Rhetoric and Literature in Bucknell University. Whilst in college he was always known as a great student of Literature and Political Economy. He spent much of his time in writing and served several terms as editor and finally as editor-in-chief of the Brunonian, a college publication of very high grade. Dr. Perrine is a member of the Delta Phi Fraternity.

Outside of his class room work at Bucknell, Dr. Perrine is known as a writer and speaker of great ability. He has lectured and preached in the most prominent places in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, having been licensed to preach by the Lewisburg Baptist Church. In 1887 and 1888 he was one of the lecturers at the Seaside Assembly held at Avon, N. J. He was also one of the lecturers in the University extension course. Dr. Perrine's literary, historical and economical addresses are known for the fine rhetorical finish and literary merit which characterize all of his productions, either uttered or written.

In 1882 Prof. Perrine was the recipient of the honorary degree of Doctor of Literature from Gettysburg College. He is president of the Alumni Association of Peddie Institute; and has delivered orations on scholastic occasions at Peddie Institute, South Jersey Institute, Keystone Academy, Maryland College and Gettysburg College. Dr. Perrine has written very largely for the various publications of the Baptist denomination and is a regular contributor to the American University Magazine.

Dr. Perrine's greatest achievement has been the building up of the department of Rhetoric and Literature at Bucknell until to-day it ranks with the best. The popularity of this department is attested by the large classes that greet him each day and by the large numbers of students who take elective work with him or select "honor" work under his direction.

Among the new subjects introduced by Dr. Perrine at Bucknell might be mentioned English Oratory, Advanced Composition, English Versification, Anglo-Saxon, Shakspere, and Lectures on the Essay and the Oration. He has also developed "honor" work in Chaucer, Milton's Paradise Lost, Skeat's Specimens of English Literature, Skeat's Piers the Plowman and The Ormulum and The Ancren Riwle.

Dr. Perrine's experience in journalism fitted him peculiarly for the position he now occupies, for the correction of essays and orations is by no means a small part of his work at Bucknell. He is a friend of the boys and his advice is often sought by students needing the confidence and wisdom and judgment of a teacher.

THOMAS FRANKLIN HAMBLIN, A. M.

NEW JERSEY PROFESSOR OF THE GREEK LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE.

Thomas Franklin Hamblin was born near Winona, Minnesota, December 4, 1856. His father was a Baptist minister, but, after a few years preaching was compelled, on account of heart trouble, to give up his chosen profession and enter into business. Prof. Hamblin had the first part of his preparation for college at Groveland Seminary, Wasioga, Minn., and the later part at Cedar Valley Seminary, Osage, Iowa.

Previous to his entering college he taught two years in the common schools of his native State, Minn. Hamlin Garland, the author of a number of short stories, including a serial on the life of General U. S. Grant, published in the current numbers of McClure's Magazine, was one of his pupils.

At the age of sixteen he was admitted into the fellowship of the First Baptist Church, of Wasioga, Minn. He is a man strong in his conviction and a staunch advocate of the right.

In the fall of 1876 he was entered as a classical student in the freshman class of Colgate University (then Madison University) and was graduated in 1880 with the degree of A. B. In course of time he received the degree of A. M. from the same University. While a student at Colgate he took an active interest in college athletics and was the founder of "Field Day" which has been observed there ever since. He was also the original proposer and one of the organizers of the New York State Intercollegiate Base Ball League. The first convention in its interests was held at Syracuse, New York, during the winter of 1879. He is still a strong advocate of pure college athletics.

Immediately after graduation in 1880, he was elected Professor of Latin and History by the trustees of Des Moines College, Des Moines, Iowa. This position he held with marked success for two years. For the next five years he held a similar position in the Ottawa University, Ottawa, Kansas. While there he spent the greater part of his vacation in traveling through the State representing the University. He was successful in securing for it many friends and much financial aid. He resigned this position to travel in Europe and the greater part of 1887 was spent abroad. He visited and spent several weeks each in London, Berlin, Florence, Rome and Paris. This was a valuable year of sightseeing and study.

In 1888 he was elected Instructor of Greek and Science in Bucknell Academy and in connection with this work he gave instruction in elocution.

In 1892, upon the resignation of Professor C. F. Castle, Ph. D., he was elected Professor of Greek Language and Literature. This position he now holds. His work is characterized by thoroughness and by kindness. Each student is made to feel that he has a personal interest in him and his work. He is the student's friend and the students are all his friends.

WILLIAM E. MARTIN, A. M.

PROFESSOR OF LOGIC AND ANTHROPOLOGY.

William E. Martin was born in Saltsburg, Pa., May 15, 1848. He attended the Academy in the town of his birth, afterwards entered the Junior class in the University at Lewisburg.

While in college he was a member of the Euepia Literary Society. He graduated from the University with the class of 1871, receiving the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Three years later (1874) the University conferred the Master's degree upon him.

In the university year 1869–1870, the Academy was divided into the "Classical Preparatory" and the "English Academy." During his senior year Prof. Martin was assistant in the Academic department, and during '71–'72 assistant in the Preparatory department. In 1873 he became principal of the Academy, and finally, in the year '78–'79, the Preparatory department being united with the Academy, Prof. Martin was appointed Principal of the now one Academic department, which position he held until 1894.

In the year 1887 he was elected chairman of the Gymnasium Committee, which had for its object the procuring of funds for the erection of a suitable structure for gymnasium purposes. The excellent work of the committee is evidenced by the dedication of the present structure in 1890.

In 1894 Prof. Martin was elected Professor of Logic and Anthropology in the Collegiate Department of the University, and in the same year was appointed Librarian. Under the Professor's supervision the library has made great strides forward, which is indicated by the fact that whereas in '94–'95 there were only upwards of 13,000 volumes, in '95–'96 there were 16,000 volumes.

Prof. Martin is a member of the First Baptist Church of Lewisburg, of which he has been the clerk since 1883.

His longtime connection with the University and his great interest in her advancement and prosperity, both point to the fact that Bucknell has no closer friend than Prof. Martin.

MIDSUMMER MADNESS.

A boy on his vacation went
  To regions cool and shady,
By woodland stream he pitched his tent,
  Great show of fishing made he.
A girl her summer outing took
  Down by the dashing ocean,
In certain quiet little nook,
  Just suited to her notion.

Yet, strange to say, that girl and boy,
  In their month apiece vacation,
Took very little joy,
  Got small exhilaration.
The boy among the pines re*pined*,
  The girl sighed by the sea*side*;
"O were she only here!" he whined,
  While "All is lonely!" she cried.

When re-united were the pair
  Who'd suffered separation,
They vowed henceforth thro' life to share
  Both work and recreation,
Now live they in a little cot
  On means that scarce would board one,
Their former outings pleased them not,
  But now they can't afford one! O. M. W.

ALBERT BURNS STEWART, A. M.

INSTRUCTOR IN MATHEMATICS.

Albert Burns Stewart was born at Ridley, Pa., Jan. 9, 1851. He received his elementary education in the Public Schools of Ridley and Chester Academy.

He entered Bucknell preparatory department in 1870 and completed the course in about one year and a half. He entered the Freshman class of the college in 1872 and was graduated in 1876, receiving the degree of A. B. Three years later the degree of Master of Arts was conferred on him. Since his graduation Prof. Stewart has spent two years at Chautauqua, N. Y., studying languages and attended the Lehigh summer school one year where he studied Civil Engineering and Geodetic Surveying.

Immediately after his graduation Prof. Stewart began to teach. His first year was spent in the public schools of Delaware Co., Pa., the next, in Doylestown Seminary. In May 1878 he was elected County Superintendent of Delaware County, which, it may be interesting to note, stands at the head of the list in Penna. both in regard to the average length of term and the salary paid to teachers. He was twice re-elected to this position defeating the opposing candidates by overwhelming majorities. During his term of office his salary was increased until in was three-hundred dollars beyond the limit fixed by law. While Co. Supt. he published a map of Del. Co., giving the boroughs, townihips and school districts, to be used in teaching local geography. During the years 1887–88 he had charge of the Mathematical department of Pierce's Business College, Phila., Pa. In the fall of 1888 he became the teacher of Mathematics and Latin in Bucknell Academy. In 1892 he was made instructor of Mathematics in the College giving up his work in Latin in the Academy. Since he has had charge of the Mathematics in Bucknell Academy, he has had the requirements for admission to college increased.

While Prof. Stewart's work as an educator has been marked with success we would also mention his work in the Sunday Schools with which he has been connected as being worthy of our attention. He has been Superintendent of Springfield, Prospect Hill, Montandon, and Lewisburg Baptist Sunday Schools. His work at Prospect Hill was particularly successful, the outgrowth of his work there being a church with 160 members and a property worth $15,000.

During his work as Superintendent of the Lewisburg Baptist Sunday School the room has been entirely refitted and over one hundred pupils have become members of the church. Thus he has been enabled to help many spiritually and morally as well as mentally and he has won the respect and esteem of all those with whom he has come in contact.

EDITORIALS.

Several months ago The Orange and Blue first began to make its weekly visits among us and to claim a share of our attention and consideration. Since it has proved its right to exist by the commendable manner in which it has supplied a need of the students for purely local news concerning the doings in our college world, and since the MIRROR has made no official recognition of it in the past, the MIRROR Board desire to extend to their co-worker their hearty symyathy and interest in the movement The Orange and Blue has inaugurated. The paper is bright, full of news and items of interest to the student body, and unusually free from typographical errors and other objectionable features. It has proved its right to exist, and marks a distinct advance toward a higher standard of journalism among the students of our college. All honor to The Orange and Blue.

The tennis tournaments bid fair to be of more than usual interest this year. The number of entries is large, the courts are in good condition, and the players have practiced faithfully. The handicap tournament just being played is a new feature in tennis at Bucknell and has aroused considerable interest. Heretofore it has been found difficult to induce the poorer players to enter the tournaments at all, because they knew they stood no earthly chance of winning and would be beaten in the first game. To put all players on an equality, as near as possible, and to give the poorer players a chance of winning when matched against the more skilled, the handicap tournament has been held. In some cases the superior player has been handicapped three points each game when matched against a new beginner. This has proved very satisfactory and has created a much greater interest in tennis among expert and novice alike. The regular tournament for the championship of the college is to be held after the conclusion of the handicap, and will doubtless prove very close and exciting.

We regret that we have to speak of a very common practice of some of the students, which practice moreover is very discouraging and exasperating to the teacher, if he notices it, and very detrimental to the student himself, that of studying in one class for the recitation in another. Next to "getting up the point" for recitation behind some one else's back or a convenient row of seats, this is harmful to the student who practices it, although it may not have the same disastrous moral effects on his character as the former. It is not so much an insult to the Professor as it is an injury to the student himself. It is cutting off his nose to spite his face and he does not accomplish either end, for he not only can pay no attention to and therefore gets no good from the lesson that is being recited, but he cannot half study, since he has to keep a pretty close watch upon the Professor to see that he is not caught at it. If he would spend the same amount of effort in studying at the proper time that he does in trying to elude that Professor's eye, how much he could accomplish! It would be productive of far better results to the student and a source of satisfaction to the Professors, if such an one would take a day off now and then, get the lessons out on time, and then pay strict attention to the business in hand. Such a practice as studying in class is exasperating in the extreme to the Professor and is harmful mainly to the student himself, but indirectly to the whole class.

ALUMNI NOTES.

'51. Rev. J. M. Lyons has become an inmate of the Nugent Home for aged Baptist ministers, in Germantown.

'53. Rev. J. Spencer Kennard, D. D., has returned from a six months tour in Italy. He has made a special study of the religions and political conditions there, and expects to give the result of his observation in newspaper articles and lectures.

'55. On April 30th, 1897 occurred the death of Joseph B. Burchinal, at Gans, Pa. Mr. Burchinal was 66 years of age at the time of his death.

'63. William J. Wolverton holds a position as teacher in the public schools of Lock Haven. Prof. Wolverton for a number of years was principal of the Lock Haven Schools, but on account of his hearing having become very much impaired through an attack of the Grip he was compelled to resign his position for a less responsible one. His hearing is now slowly improving.

'64. Rev. T. A. K. Gessler, D. D., has closed his pastorate with the Grace Baptist Church of New York City, which at a social given before its uniting with the 23rd St. Church, presented Dr. Gessler with a $1000 check, an onyx and gold cabinet and three beautiful vases.

'65. Rev. H. B. Garner is pastor of the Baptist Church at Downingtown, Pa.

'65. Dr. John B. Probasco is a prominent physician of Plainfield, N. J.

'66. Rev. John A. Hutson, who is now located at Allegheny, Pa,, rendered valuable services to Rev. J. V. Stratton, of Scottdale, Pa., during a series of special services being held at that place.

'66. Dr. Freeman Loomis has resumed his duties at the "Hill" again, after a two weeks absence from his classes. He met with a very serious accident, in the shape of a stubborn hemorrhage which resulted from having several teeth extracted.

'67. Rev. Webster R. Maul, to whom the Mirror is indebted for some very interesting Alumni Notes in and around New York City and Brooklyn, is pastor in charge of the Second Baptist church of Brooklyn.

'67. Mr. David E. Rue is one of the most influential men in educational circles in Hoboken, N. J. He has a life lease on the schools, public and normal, of that city. His wife is remembered by many in Lewisburg as Miss Maggie Yoder.

Ex-'67. Mr. Leon B. Wolfe is one of the members of the Central Electric and Foundry Company, of this place.

'68. Dr. Sexton R. James and Dr. Leroy Stephens and their works are too well known to the friends of Bucknell, to require any further comments here.

'69. Hon. Martin Bell, of Holidaysburg, is at present Judge of Blair County, and is in demand in other districts than his own on the bench.

'69. Andrew A. Leiser is one of the most prominent and popular lawyers at the Union County Bar.

Ex-'69. Matthew R. Calvin, Esq., is practicing law in Hollidaysburg, Blair Co., Pa.

'71. Rev U. S. Holt is stated supply for the Baptist Church at Philipsburg, Pa. His address is Bellwood.

'71. Rev. John Humpstone, D. D., has been elected Vice President of the Baptist Church Extension Society of Brooklyn, N. Y.

'71. Rev. James Rainey has resigned the pastorate at Lacyville, Pa., and will make his home at Tunkhannock.

'72. Rev. J. H. Chambers is pastor of the new Olivet Baptist Church, of West Chester, Pa., formed by the withdrawal of 112 members from the First Church.

Ex-'72. Rev. J. W. Putnan recently resigned the pastorate of the Trinity Baptist Church, New York City, but yielding to the urgent solicitations of the people he will remain. It is the intention of the church to sell the present property and build in a more desirable location.

'83. The Ledger for May 20, contains a cut of Rev. Spencer B. Meeser, Pastor of the First Baptist Church on Salem Square, Worcester, Mass.

'85. The Baptist church of Burlington, N. J., during the four years and a half of the pastorate of Rev. J. M. Hare, has received 202;—151 by baptism. The membership is now 600.

'87. Howard L. Calder, Esq., of Harrisburg, was recently elected Grand Commander of the Knights of Malta Lodge, which convened at Sunbury, May 11, 12, 13.

'88. Dr. Lincoln Hulley gave an address on the "Psalms" before the Baltimore Ministers Conference on Monday, May 3.

'88. W. H. Clipman, pastor of the Tabernacle church, Harrisburg, is preaching a series of sermons on "The Old Book."

Truman L. Purdy, Ex-'89, and George Deppen, '93, have recently been admitted to the Northumberland County Bar, and are fitting up offices in Sunbury.

'91. Rev. A. Lincoln Moore, pastor of the Spruce Street Baptist Church in Phila., has had conferred on him the degree Doctor of Divinity, by the Regents of the American Temperance University.

'92. Prof. Chas. Grant Shaffer, A. M., has charge of the department of Latin at the State Normal School, Natchitoches, La.

'94. C. F. McMann, pastor of the First Baptist Church, of Lancaster, graduated from the Reformed Theological Seminary at Lancaster on the 13th.

'95. Married at the Passyunk Ave. Baptist Church, by Rev. H. B. Harper, Rev. Franklin I. Sigmund, of Ebensburg, Pa., and Miss Anna McDonald.

'96. H. T. Colestock, who has been attending Hamilton Theological Seminary, has been awarded a scholarship in the Divinity School of the University of Chicago.

EXCHANGES.

The current issue of the periodical of Ursinus College is the work of young women. It is up to the standard and deserves commendation.

B.—"I see by the posters that F., the tragedian, travels under his wife's management."

D.—"So do most men, only they don't advertise it."—Ex.

"Visions of the far East," concluded in the May numbers of The Campus, is a creditable production. It is rich in suggestions on social development.

Our Dumb Animals is one of the best of our exchanges. It, more than any other paper, represents a distinctively humane work. Every college student should know of this work and share in it.

The Mountaineer deserves a place among worthy college periodicals. Its last issue has a portrait of President Allen, a fit representative of the intellectual and spiritual life of that well-known Maryland college.

Lafayette's team has defeated U. P., and Yale at base ball. This victorious nine also met Princeton's team on Wednesday, the 12th. Her most worthy victory was that won in the debate, May 3, with Lehigh University. Congratulations.

"And you asked her father for her hand!"

"Yes. He said I must be an idiot to think of it."

"What did you reply?"

"I told him that of course he knew his own family better than I did, but I would take the chances."—Our Dumb Animals.

Many poems in current issues of college papers seem to lack unity of thought and purpose. A good poem should be free from such blemishes. The best poems must be free from them. The most unfortunate poet is he whose idea of poetry is a medley of thoughts. Thus most poems in these papers are "long." They would be shorter if they possessed more "unity," and had a "definite aim."

Our sister journals will bear with us in urging that no one of them neglect the exchanges. The Folio made an appeal in a late issue for this popular and instructive department. Editorial boards cannot disregard the popularity of the exchanges without injury to their papers. This department serves as an index whence the busy student may learn what periodicals contain matter which they should first read.

"Meditation," in the same issue, is a well-written poem, suggestive of the attitude of Olymnia, but a little to melancholy for these days of cheering hope. Many will rightly reject the third and fourth lines in the third stanza. The fourth stanza is obscure. We would hardly speak of the body as having or not having hope. We cannot thus speak of the immortal soul. Love is a ruling passion of the soul. Is it also locked in death's embrace?

UNIVERSITY ITEMS.

COLLEGE.

The Seniors are rejoicing because recitations in Theism are over.

The Senior banquet was held at the Cameron House on Friday evening, May 21.

None should fail to read the article on the first page of this issue by Dr. Perrine.

The Ringgold Band, of Reading, will furnish the music during Commencement week.

The Junior Exhibition in Oratory was held in Bucknell Hall on Friday evening, May 21.

Mrs. Larison tendered the Senior class of the College a reception on Tuesday evening, May 25.

A Northfield meeting will be held in Bucknell Hall, on Thursday evening, May 27, at 7 o'clock.

Dr. Lincoln Hulley delivered the address to the class at the High School Commencement, of Emporium, Pa., on Thursday evening, May 13.

Dr. Perrine delivered his lecture, "Some Proverbs, Not Solomon's," which was the last of the Popular Lecture Course, in Bucknell Hall, last Monday evening.

A fine concert was given in Bucknell Hall, on Thursday evening, May 20. The music was rendered by two male quartettes, a mixed quartette and a male chorus and was selected from the Bucknell Song Book.

Every Alumnus should purchase a copy of the University Song Book. It contains a number of pieces suited especially for class reunions and alumni meetings which were composed by Drs. E. H. Johnson and W. H. Doane. Copies can be had by writing to E. C. Kunkle. Price 50 cents per copy. By mail 5 cents extra.

INSTITUTE.

Prof. Hamblin led the Y. M. C. A. prayer-meeting on Tuesday evening, May 18.

On May 13 and 20 a large number of Institute girls greatly enjoyed the hospitality of Mrs. Harris and Mrs. Edwards at the Fourth Form reception.

On the evenings of May 17 and 18 the members of the Senior class, assisted by Messrs. Clement. Geary, Hall and N. F. Davis, presented "The House of Martha," as arranged by Miss Armitage, from the novel of Frank Stockton. The class is to be congratulated upon their success.

ACADEMY.

On Saturday, May 15, the "bachelors" and "bachelor maids" held a picnic at Blue Hill.

Principal Edwards occupied the pulpit of the Presbyterian church, Sunday May 16th.

The Fourth Form were tendered receptions on May 13 and 20 by Mrs. Harris and Mrs. Edwards respectively.

The class of '97 have received their Commencement invitations and are now busy sending them to their friends.

The Fourth Form class will have eleven graduates, seven in the Classical course and four in the Scientific course.

Principal Edwards, Prof. Phillips and John Evans attended the convention of Welsh Baptists, held at Mahanoy City, May 22 and 23.

ATHLETICS.

Bucknell defeated Gettysburg in an interesting game on Monday, 17th. The game was postponed from Friday, it having rained on that day. The score :

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	R	H	E
Bucknell	2	0	0	0	5	0	2	0	–	9	9	5
Gettysburg	0	0	0	3	0	3	0	0	0	6	9	5

On Wednesday, 12th, Bucknell was defeated at Milton by the league team of that town. The game was close and well played. The score:

	1	2	3	4	5	5	7	8	9	R	H	E
Milton	0	0	0	2	0	0	0	3	0	5	5	4
Bucknell	1	0	1	1	0	0	0	0	–	3	5	2

Our team was revenged on the following Wednesday when they defeated Milton on the campus. Shortell pitched a good game, the team fielded well. Conover and Grim made good catches in the outfield. The score :

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	R	H	E
Bucknell	4	0	1	2	0	0	0	0	–	7	11	0
Milton	1	0	0	0	1	1	0	0	0	3	7	2

Bucknell journeyed to Selinsgrove on Saturday last and defeated the local team. Shortell pitched great ball. The score :

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	R	H	E
Bucknell	1	0	0	0	2	1	2	0	0--	6	7	2
Selinsgrove	0	0	0	1	0	0	0	0	0—	1	5	5

The Annual Field Day in athletics will be be observed on the campus, on Saturday, May 29.

TENNIS.

The handicap tournament opened on Saturday, 15th. The games played up to date are :

Kaufman Sprague	won by Kauffman.
Phillips Weymouth	won by Weymouth.

QUOTATION.

ENOCH PERRINE, A. M., LITT. D.

[Concluded.]

Besides Accuracy, an apt quotation should be of the

(2) PROPER LENGTH. Not too short, else not enough be given to fortify one's position,—vagueness, abruptness and looseness of style being the result. Not too long, else the main thought will drag and the style become dull. One quotes to maintain in some way his point ; but rarely do the thoughts of two people run exactly parallel for any length of time, and generally he who uses a long quotation will find that he has introduced not only material that helps his thought along but very much of different effect, the reader being greatly tempted to turn aside into new and pleasant paths that have been suggested to him and are in no wise connected with the point of departure. For this reason it is hazardous to quote Lowell of all our writers in English. You think your quotation is apt—merely that and nothing more. You find that Lowell's lines are crowded with suggestion and your reader has gone off in many directions from which you cannot coax him back. One would better err in being too short than too long. A "lengthy" prose quotation may be used with less disaster than one in verse, since the involved sentences, the multiplicity and rapidity of figures generally employed in verse, will be more likely to confuse the mind. A little gem flashing in appropriate setting, not a blazing carbuncle that might throw even the High Priest's breastplate into the shade—this is the effect of an apt quotation.

(3) NOT TOO FAMILIAR. A quotation to produce its proper effect as such must be familiar. The reader is glad to see one of his treasures used in this way, is pleased to be thus complimented by the writer and accepts the more surely his proposition. Should the quotation, however, be too familiar, since it has been used by everybody and for all purposes time out of mind, it will fall flat like the same old clown in the same old circus with the same old jokes. How meaningless many patriotic expressions have become—"great and glorious republic," "the land of the free and the home of the brave" and the like ! No matter how fine these expressions were in their young days, like the current coin of the realm their definiteness and force disappear with constant using. The pity of it is that unlike coin they cannot be called in and recoined. One sometimes feels that even "the best laid schemes" of Burns and "the ignorance is bliss" of Gray and the "flat, stale and unprofitable" world of Hamlet have really done their work and should now be retired on a pension equal in each instance to that one Dr. Johnson received for his great influence in literature. Men sigh when they meet them and the effect is like that to which Pope alludes, speaking of the rhymers in his day :

"Where'er you find the 'cooling western breeze',
In the next line it 'whispers through the trees' ;
If crystal streams 'with pleasing murmurs creep',
The reader's threaten'd (not in vain) with 'sleep'."

But while not too familiar, the apt quotation can not be unfamiliar. Otherwise, however apropos the expression may be, it comes largely as the speaker's own and without the power of his fame who coined it. And this criticism applies as well to the author not familiar. It is vain to call upon Smith's reputation unless that reputation be well established. To quote Chaucer to hoodlums, is like casting pearls before swine ; to quote Bill Nye to scholars, except in ridicule, is none the less absurd and ineffective. The middle course between the too familiar and the unfamiliar is best. Indeed in pressing the point, the present writer, for this very reason, would prefer Ovid's "medio tutissimus ibis" rather than Horace's "auream mediocritatem," which latter after centuries of constant service by this time has become quite like "sounding brass."

(4) ON LEVEL WITH WRITER'S THOUGHT. If below his thought, from any point of view, it is conspicuous for its ugliness like the death's head at a royal feast, calling exclusive attention to itself, adding nothing but, on the contrary, detracting from the main idea. If too far above his thought, it is a mere "purple patch," new cloth on an old garment with the disastrous effect of such a combination. Some one—I know not who—has likened such a quotation to "the dolphins that are said to have brought to the shore the dead body of Hesiod. They saved from the deep what, after all, was but lifeless clay." One cannot give even a local habitation to airy nothings by leading them out in fine company—the glaring contrast will be detected and the critical will either laugh or become disgusted. Instead of degrading, the quotation should carry along the main thought to upper regions; and it ought to be of such a character that, to quote Blanchard, it must "be introduced with something like the pomp due to a foreign ambassador." Young writers especially should get rid of the personal equation when judging whether a quotation be unfamiliar or not. To them, it may be as fresh as the morning; to their audience, as stale as last year's corn-stalk and as juiceless. "Books of Quotations" unintentionally mislead many an inexperienced person who runs to them for help and selects that expression which, new and bright to him, is old and faded in the eyes of others. For this reason there ought to be some way by which writers could be warned from these smiling but decrepit veterans like Keats's "a thing of beauty is a joy forever" and Wordsworth's "the child is father of the man."

(5) Duly Appreciative of the Author. There is a practice of saying: "a distinguished writer has said," or "one of the greatest men of his time writes," and the like. As quotation this is very weak. The mind pays no attention to the assertion or else begins to locate the reference. In the former case, of course, there is no result; in the latter, some one other than the person alluded to is selected from the hundreds who might be thought of in that connection and an entirely wrong conception is entertained or influence exerted. What can be more effective than to write Tennyson or Emerson, as the case may be, without adding a string of commonplaces that are exasperating to those who really know?

(6) In due Proportion. Good writing is never suggestive of the "crazy quilt" nor the mosaic, however skilfully arranged and beautiful these may be. The reader who has a retentive memory for words will hold in mind the attractive expressions he meets and unless he takes great care will, for the joy he has in the labor, bring them out in troops at times when a single bold sentinel only is needed. His work, then, is not his; it lacks the organic life of style which is set on fire when thoughts have been fused in his heart; it is a thing "of shreds and patches" and takes its place with all the other literary "hash."

C. The growth of an apt quotation. Such a quotation is a growth, not the result of search. One reads a great author and finds there perfect words to perfect music. He holds them in memory for their own sake alone, never expecting to use them. In time they become a part of his mental being; and long afterwards when he writes on a certain theme, they fall from his pen ere he is aware and take their places with the rest of his thought—they have a vital, an organic connection with what he is saying, they are not merely glued fast mechanically. It is fatal when one must rack his brain for apt quotations—they come not out in that way. It is equally fatal to rely on books of "Familiar Quotations"—Bartlett's and the rest—hunting in them for you know not what because you fancy that a quotation would be more powerful just at that point. These books are beyond value in verifying a quotation about which one is not sure, but they should never be used as a soldier uses the armory to which he may run for a loaded weapon on occasion.

Since we are finite we have need and do well to call upon the past for help, and to the literary worker much of this help comes by way of quotation. "It is only the Divine who never quotes"; and yet, even He, when on earth, summoned the aid of Moses and David. But the practice should be indulged only with the artist's fine appreciation of what is fitting. Scott was not happy when at the beginning of his chapters he pretended to quote from an "Old Play" verses of his own making; Disraeli was not happy when in his speeches and novels he professed to take from the lips of other well-known men words they never uttered

--a practice to-day charged against Joseph Chamberlain. A man is said to be known by the company he keeps; and a writer may none the less be known by the men he quotes and the way in which he weaves their cloth of gold into his own worthy homespun. For example of perfect quotation none better could be selected than that upon the stone over the grave of Edwin Booth, prince of Hamlets. It is Horatio's adieu to his friend:

> "Good night, sweet prince,
> And flights of angels sing thee to thy rest!"

Here, me judice, we have every excellence that should charactize an apt quotation.

KATHERINE BROWN LARISON, A. M.

PRINCIPAL OF THE INSTITUTE.

The history of the life of Mrs. Larison divides itself into three periods; her quiet home life on a farm and her early school days in New York state, covering a period of nineteen years; then a period of three years, from '59 to '61, brief but significant, spent in teaching and study at the Albany Academy in Georgia; and lastly, her life since she came to Lewisburg in 1865, including the ten years after her marriage, which were spent at her husband's home in Ringoes, New Jersey.

The eldest of three daughters, it early befell Mrs. Larison to share the burdens of her widowed mother in her efforts to gain a livelihood from the farm. How hard such a struggle may be, none but the widows and orphaned daughters of farmers can know. From her earliest school days in the district school until the present time Mrs. Larison has been devoted to study. After having learned all that was to be learned in the country school near her home, Mrs. Larison was sent at an early age to a private school on the Hudson. At the age of fifteen she began work as a teacher in the district schools of her native county until her nineteenth year.

In September, 1859, she went to Georgia to study and teach, an undertaking upon which she would scarcely have ventured could she have foreseen the momentous events which were so soon to alienate the South from the North and foster the spirit of sectional pride and partisan hatred. Upon hearing the results of the battle of Bull Run, she resolved to return to her home in the North. She was accompanied by her cousin, a fellow-teacher. They chose a circuitous route, leading through Macon, Atlanta, Chattanooga, Louisville, Marietta, Cleveland and Dunkirk, crossing the Confederate lines a short distance from Chattanooga. Their first sight of the Union flag was in Louisville, July, 1861.

In September of the same year she went to Monticello, New York, where she taught a public school for one year and served as vice-principal of the Academy for two years. She entered the University Female Institute of Lewisburg in September, 1865, and took rank at the head of her class. Immediately upon her graduation in '67, she was appointed an instructor in the Institute.

On October 6, 1869, she was married to the Rev. Andrew B. Larison, M. D., and went with him to his home in Ringoes, New Jersey, where he was called to the pastorate of a newly organized Baptist church. In January, 1870, Dr. Larison and his brother established a boarding and day school, known as the Seminary at Ringoes. Mrs. Larison taught English Literature and French. Dr. Larison died September 25, 1872, of disease incurred while serving in the army. His widow courageously took up his work in the school and in 1874 assumed the sole charge of it. By her faithfulness in many spheres of activity during her ten years' residence in Ringoes, she won an abiding place in the affections of the people. As a pastor's wife she had been singularly efficient and universally beloved; as a Bible class teacher she had been unusually successful in cultivating an intelligent, enthusiastic interest in the study of the Scriptures; and as a teacher and principal of the Seminary, she had demonstrated the high order of her literary and executive ability. Her home had become the favorite resort for the most cultured people of the town, and it was with genuine regret that they learned of her intention to leave Ringoes to become vice-principal of the Institute at Lewisburg.

After the death of Principal Jones, in January, 1882, the Board of Trustees appointed Mrs. Larison to succeed him. Her work while at the head of Bucknell Institute is too well known to all readers of the MIRROR to require extensive comment. The organization of three important societies—the Students' Loan Assotion, the Lewisburg Alumnæ Club and the Young Women's Christian Association, the many changes and improvements of the last seventeen years in the domestic arrangements, the curriculum and the government of the school have been almost wholly due to her influence and will endure as her lasting memorial. In 1889 the University, in recognition of her scholarly attainments, confirmed upon her the honorary degree of Master of Arts.

Mrs. Larison has not as yet formed any definite plans for the future. Her first care will be for her aged mother, who still lives with her youngest daughter at her old home in Cochecton Centre, New York. Mrs. Larison has given the best part of her life to the cause of education and is bound to the school she has served so admirably and unselfishly by indissoluble ties. She has scores of friends in the school and in the town, who gratefully remember her cheery, encouraging words and many kindly acts, and who sincerely hope that in the future she will return to Lewisburg to make this her home for at least a part of each year.

THOMAS A. EDWARDS, A. M.

PRINCIPAL OF BUCKNELL ACADEMY.

Thomas A. Edwards was born in 1850 in Oneida county, N. Y. His boyhood was spent upon a farm. From the time that he was able to reason the boy was always feeling out to learn something new, and when he had attended winter school for awhile the longing came to him to learn more of knowledge. He accordingly worked early and late so that he might go away from home and secure more further education. Later, he successively and diligently studied at Arcade Academy, Attica Acadmy, Cook Academy, and Wyoming Seminary, in New York state. He also studied at Rochester, doing two and a half years work there. Acquiring a taste for teaching he served for a time as assistant principal of Attica Academy, and as associate principal of Genesee and Wyoming Seminary. During his experience as a teacher the conviction was thrust upon him that he could accomplish more good in the world as a minister of the gospel. He, therefore, was ordained. This was in 1876. He then became the pastor of the Baptist church at Groton, N. Y., over which he administered until 1880, and in 1881 he served the Baptist church at Union City, Pa., for one year.

Keeping still before him the long cherished idea of completing his college education he seized the opportunity to pursue a course of study in Allegheny College, from which institution he was graduated in 1885 with the degree of A. B.; three years later the same college bestowed on him the degree of A. M., in course.

For nine years Prof. Edwards was principal of the Union City schools. It was here that he demonstrated his ability as the headmaster of a school and as a successful educator of youth. He raised the standard of the schools of that place and introduced a course of study preparatory to college, and as a consequence, many young people have entered higher institutions of learning from the above place, largely through the efforts of Prof. Edwards. He so endeared himself to the people of Union City that when the call came to become the principal of Hall Institute, established but a short time before at Sharon, he was offered flattering inducements to remain. Seeing an opportunity, however, for a broader field of usefulness and realizing that there was a large constituency back of the new enterprise at Sharon, he concluded to accept the principalship of that institution, and to do his share in aiding the development of the Institute. For three years he was the principal of Hall Institute. He then resigned to extend his researches in Latin at the new University of Chicago.

In 1894 he was called to the headship of Bucknell Academy, a position which he is now filling with great acceptability to the Board of Trustees and the patrons of the school. Although Prof. Edwards has been at Bucknell but three years, he has won the hearts of the people. He has great influence over boys and young men, and in the short time that he has been at the head of the Academy, he has influenced the lives of a number of young men for good, and more than one young man dates the beginning of his moral make-up back to Bucknell Academy since Prof. Edwards has become its principal. Firm, yet kind, he knows how to handle boys and he does it in such a way that he wins the respect, admiration and love of all the students who come under his care.

ELYSEE AVIRAGNET, A. M., Mus. Doc.

DIRECTOR OF THE BUCKNELL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

Elysée (full name, Jean Francois Elysée) Aviragnet was born in France, July 30th, 1828. In October, 1838, he entered the Royal College at Bordeaux and pursued a literary course of study. In 1845 he went to Paris, and in 1847 he graduated from the Sorbonne, after which he entered the French military line, in which service he spent three years. In 1851 he took up the teaching of French, Greek and Latin, and in 1852 he received the degree of Licencie es lettres, corresponding to the degree of Master of Arts. During all this time he spent his leisure moments in developing his taste for music, studying under Duprez, Delsarte and Revial. He later studied vocal music under Lamperti in Italy. He then took up the study of harmony and composed many songs which were published by Le Menestrel, a publishing house belonging to Heugel. Hartman, the publisher, also put out some of Prof. Aviragnet's music.

Later Prof. Aviragnet went to Mauritius and became a teacher in Latin, Greek and the Romance Languages in Bourbon College ; at the same time he was the musical critic of French editions of Le Mauricien, Le Cerneen, and the Commercial Gazette, papers published in French and English. Up to 1865 Prof. Aviragnet was an amateur musician, at which time he became a professional. Previously, however, he had taken part in concerts and conducted a Philharmonic Society of Amateurs. After leading operatic orchestras for a time, he attracted the attention of composers, among whom was Ambroise Thomas, the celebrated author of "Mignon," "Hamlet" and many other master-pieces. These famous composers presented Prof. Aviragnet with well merited testimonials of his worth as a musician.

Prof. Aviragnet has traveled a great deal and has spent many months in Italy, Spain, Egypt, Greece, India and the West Indies, leading orchestras and teaching vocal music and the languages.

At the beginning of the Prussian war, 1870, Prof. Aviragnet chanced to be in his native country. Like a noble son of France he at once entered the service of the French army as a private and later became a lieutenant and aide-de-camp of the Commandeur Superieur of the 10th Arrondissement. At the beginning of the Commune the government of the defense Nationale was obliged to go to Versailles. Lieut. Aviragnet was sent several times as a special messenger to Versailles, to the National Assembly. Being obliged to remain in Versailles he was made officer d'ordonnance, by commission bearing date April 18th, 1871, for the organization of the legion of the 10th Arrondissement, which was with the army when it entered Paris and ended the Commune by bloody battle upon the streets of that city, May 21st to 28th, 1871.

For four years before coming to the United States Prof. Aviragnet was a teacher of comparative languages at Bolivar College, Port of Spain, Trinidad. Although not connected with the music department of that institution, he organized a band composed of students of the college. This organization, during the vacation, made a successful tour in Venezuela. He then went to New York where he taught music for one year, when he was engaged by Mr. S. W. Murray, of Milton, Pa., to teach music and the languages to his daughter and the children of several prominent Milton families.

In 1887 he became a teacher at Bucknell Institute. The department of music was then a part of the Institute. Through dint of application and by thorough work, Prof. Aviragnet raised the standard of the music department until the Board of Trustees deemed it wise to create a School of Music, with Prof. Aviragnet at the head as Director. The School has flourished since, and if it continues to grow as rapidly as it has done in the past decade it will soon become necessary to add a conservatory of music to the growing group of University buildings.

In 1893 the University conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Music, an honor which he wears with dignity and merit.

Dr. Aviragnet is a member of the Society of Arts and Sciences of England (Mauritius branch). He is a life member of the association of French opera artists, to which organization Patti, Calve, Plancon, Lassalle, de Reske Bros. and many other well-known artists belong. He is also a member of the Music Teachers' Association of America, and is widely known throughout eastern Pennsylvania as an instructor at the Mt. Gretna Chautauqua.

Dr. Aviragnet is proud of his native land and has at all times proved his devotion to it, but he proclaims the United States to be the best country in the world.

LLEWELLYN PHILLIPS, A. M.

INSTRUCTOR IN ELOCUTION.

The subject of this sketch was born April, 1869, in Wales ; later on he emigrated to this country with his parents. He prepared for college at Bucknell Academy and entered the College in 1888. He successfully pursued the classical course and in 1892 was graduated from the college with honors, receiving the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Mr. Phillips was awarded the Chaplain J. J. Kane prize for the delivery of the best graduating oration. In 1895 he received the degree of A. M. from his Alma Mater.

Immediately after graduation Mr. Phillips was elected Instructor in the Greek Language in Bucknell Academy, which position he has held ever since with credit.

For several summers Mr. Phillips has pursued select studies in the University of Chicago. During the summers of '94 and '95 he took special work in elocution and oratory, after which he was made Instructor in Elocution in the College. He also spent the summer of '93 at Cornell doing special work in elocution.

Mr. Phillips was ordained to preach in September, 1896. He has received several calls to pastorates but has declined the calls, preferring to continue in the service of his Alma Mater.

He is a friend of all the students and takes an active interest in the religious and moral welfare of the students. His advice is frequently sought by the students in these matters.

L. G. C. RIEMER, A. M.

Mr. L. G. C. Riemer was born at Münchenbernsdorf (Saxe-Weimar), Aug. 27, 1873. When he was eight years of age his parents moved to America and settled at Brookston, Pa. Here he attended the public schools for seven years, being obliged to learn the English language at the same time. After leaving the public schools he assisted his father in the lumber business for a year or two. In 1889 he entered the Clarion State Normal School, where he remained, preparing for college, until the spring of 1892. While at Clarion he became a member of the Presbyterian church. During the spring term of 1892 he attended Bucknell Academy, taking at the same time, some college studies. He entered the Sophomore class at Bucknell in the fall of 1892 and graduated in 1895 with the degree of A. B. In the following year, in addition to his teaching, he continued his graduate work, and at the end of the year received the degree of A. M.

After graduating, he was appointed Instructor in German and Latin at Bucknell. In the following year several courses in French were also assigned to him. In order to prepare himself more thoroughly in the French language, he spent the summer of 1896 studying at Paris. He intends to go abroad again this coming summer for the same purpose.

Mr. Riemer is a student who combines care and diligence with native ability. As a teacher he has given a new impetus to the study of the modern languages at Bucknell. Being master of both German and English he has most excellent qualifications to teach the former to English students, and we feel confident that he will secure the very best results. E. M. H.

NELSON FITHIAN DAVIS, Sc. M.

INSTRUCTOR IN ORGANIC SCIENCE.

Nelson Fithian Davis was born at Shelley, Cumberland Co., New Jersey, August 10, 1872. After leaving the public schools, he entered South Jersey Institute, Bridgeton, N. J., where he prepared for college, and was graduated from that institution with the class of '91.

From South Jersey Institute he entered Bucknell in the fall of 1891 and was graduated from this institution with the class of '95, having pursued with honor the English Scientific course. He secured upon graduation the degree of Sc. B. and later received the Master's degree.

While still a Sophomore in college Mr. Davis was appointed assistant in Organic Science, which position he held with great satisfaction to all until 1896, when he was appointed Instructor in Organic Science, which position he now holds.

During the summer of '96 Instructor Davis attended the Summer School of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences located at Cold Springs Harbor, Long Island. For three years Mr. Davis has been doing microscopical work under the direction of Professor H. N. Conser, of Sunbury, Pa. He is also a member of the State Board of Bacteriology and has been appointed by the University Instructor in Bacteriology, which position he will assume at the beginning of next year.

WILLIAM CHRISTIAN GRETZINGER, PH. B.

REGISTRAR OF THE UNIVERSITY.

William Christian Gretzinger was born in Reading thirty years ago. He comes from a vigorous German ancestry who were among the first settlers in Berks county, Pa.

Mr. Gretzinger received his rudimentary education in the public schools of Reading. After leaving the public schools he took a course in the Reading Business College. Later on he entered Carroll Institute, a preparatory school for college. While at that institution he received a gold medal for deportment. After finishing his course he started to read law, but feeling the need of a more thorough preparation for his chosen profession he took a course at Perkiomen Seminary, and from there entered Bucknell College and was graduated from this institution with a first-class oration in the Latin Scientific Course with the class of '89. Mr. Gretzinger received the Chaplain J. J. Kane prize for the best graduating oration and also won the Junior oratorical prize.

During his college course Mr. Gretzinger was always active and prominent in all the important affairs of the University. In 1887 he founded the Commencement News as a means of assistance to the MIRROR. He was also the prime mover in founding L'Agenda, and became the Business Manager of that publication. He was the Assistant Manager for one year and the Business Manager of the MIRROR for two years, and served on the Board of Editors during his Senior year.

In 1889, before his graduation, he was elected Business Agent (now called Registrar) of the University, which position he has held with credit to himself and with honor to the University ever since. He has made the office what it is, having systematized the business affairs of the four departments of the University under one central office with perfect satisfaction.

On February 11, 1891, Mr. Gretzinger married Mary Adelaide Stoner, who graduated from the Institute with the class of 1887. Their marriage has been blessed by one daughter, Margaret Christine, aged four years.

While in college Mr. Gretzinger spent his vacations either in reading law or doing work for city newspapers. For a time he was editor of the Lewisburg Chronicle. He also served one year as editor of the Shield, the official organ of the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity.

Mr. Gretzinger has always been actively identified with the interests of Lewisburg. He was re-elected to the Town Council at the last election. He is also a member of the Lewisburg Fire Department and of the I. O. O. F. Lodge, No. 96. He has been mentioned several times for political preferment in the Republican party but has steadfastly declined political honors.

Besides his secular duties he still is able to devote time to religious matters, being Secretary of the Board of Trustees of the Lewisburg Baptist Church and Secretary of the Sunday School.

Mr. Gretzinger is also intensely interested in athletics. He is a standing member of the Finance Committee of the Athletic Association, in which capacity he is a tower of strength to the Association by his sympathy and wisdom always so desirable to the student body.

ALUMNI NOTES.

The Alumni editors take this opportunity to thank their friends for any items which may have been contributed for publication during the last nine months. Although this will be the last issue of the school year, the same scheme will be taken up again in September, and we hope that contributors will not discontinue their good work. All correspondence addressed to the MIRROR Box throughout the summer will be received and prepared for the next issue.—[EDITORS.]

'65. Dr. C. B. Lowe has given up the practice of medicine since his election as Professor of Materia Medica in the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy.

'75. From a Parsons, W. Va., paper we learn that Fred M. Kelly, a former graduate, is Mayor of the town and is dispensing law and justice in a manner that commends him to all good people, and makes him equally unpopular among evil doers.

'86. Lincoln S. Walter, Esq., of Mt. Carmel, has been admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

'86. Rev. I. D. Mallory, who recently commenced his seventh year as pastor at Cherryville, N. J., has been compelled to resign on account of ill health.

Ex-'88. Rev. A. W. Hodder has been elected President of the New York Baptist Ministers' Conference.

'89. Rev. T. W. Booth has resigned the pastorate of the Russell St. Baptist Church, Columbus, O.

'90. The tenth anniversary of the organization of the Second Baptist Church of Norristown, Pa., and the fifth anniversary of the pastor, Rev. J. H. Haslam, will be jointly observed this month.

'91. Rev. A. O. Stevens, of Rochester, Minn., has severed his connection with the Baptist denomination and united with the Congregationalists.

'91. The Regents of the American Temperance University, of Tennessee, have conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity upon the Rev. A. Lincoln Moore, pastor of the Spruce St. Baptist Church, Phila. Rev. and Mrs. Moore suffered the loss of their only daughter, Marion Wolverton, aged seven months, on May 17, 1897.

Inst.-'93. Miss Oriana Williams, for several years a student at the Institute, has been the recipient of very complimentary notices in the Scranton papers for her ability as a poet. She recently won two competitive prizes offered there.

'96. Thos. L. Josephs has been called to the pastorate of the newly-organized Baptist Church at Mt. Carmel, Pa.

EXCHANGES.

The exchanges for May are excellent. The most busy student will be fully compensated by a careful reading of these visitors to our table. Among the terse flashes of wit, the following is a fair sample:

"The Religion of Homer," in The Dickinsonian, is one of the best articles in the May exchanges.

The authorities of Brown University have decided that the students must either give up the use of tobacco or leave college.—The Lafayette.

Why was it so cool on the side of the line? Because the Gettysburg team fanned the air with their bats. Why would the Gettysburg team make good workman in a ship yard? Because they have so many pitchers. The Indian Helper (on game at Carlisle, May 22. Indians, 27; Gettysburg, 1).

"Unknown," in The Folio, is a beautiful and thoughtful poem. It holds forth the garland that the nation should entwine around the tomb of its dead heroes, beginning with Crispus Attucks, whose monument is one of the proudest in Boston, and ending only when loving hands shall strew flowers upon the grave of the last patriot who bore a part of the burden and died or offered to die for his country.

EDITORIALS.

The work of the present MIRROR Board has now come to an end. Whether we will or no, we are forced to say, to our readers at least, good-bye. We pass on, but another will come to take our places, and will, we hope, keep ever raising the standard of our paper. We have done our best, and the result, good or bad, we leave with you. For the last time we greet you—then, farewell.

To the list of our publications has been added the '98 L'Agenda. The book is well gotten up; the literary matter is good, the cuts are distinct; it is bound in a very neat and attractive cover. Altogether the book makes a very neat and attractive appearance and seems to be an improvement in many respects over the L'Agendas of former years. It is creditable to the class, the Board of Editors and to Bucknell.

The Y. M. C. A. Hand-Book for 1897–98 has just made its appearance and is a model of neatness and excellence. It contains a great amount of useful information for new and old students alike. The very fact that many of the former hand-books have been carried throughout the college year on account of their useful information and handy references bespeaks for this, the fifth number, a hearty reception and a wide use.

At the close of the year we can look back upon a long, almost unbroken list of athletic victories for Bucknell. Our teams have been pre-eminently successful. Our foot ball team was probably the strongest in our history. Our basket ball team lost but one game, winning from such teams as the Williamsport Y. M. C. A., State College and the University of Penna. Our track team won first place from Dickinson, Gettysburg and Franklin and Marshall in the University of Penna. Relay Races at Philadelphia. Our base ball team has been the best in years. We vanquished our old rival, State College, in foot ball, once in basket ball, and once in base ball. Can any one say that the season has not been successful?

At the close of the present year the question comes to us very forcibly, what shall be the future of the MIRROR, what course will it pursue? Since The Orange and Blue has so effectively taken up its share of the work, the course of the MIRROR must necessarily be modified to some extent. Whether it shall be made a monthly literary magazine with the price reduced to one dollar a year, as some have suggested, or whether it shall be published as heretofore, is a matter of grave deliberation. At any rate, since The Orange and Blue furnishes news of especial interest to the student body and confines itself largely to items of local interest, the MIRROR will necessarily look to the Alumni more for support and will deal more largely with items of general interest to them. It will also try to touch student life in all its phases. Whatever its form or policy, it is the wish and hope of the retiring Board that the MIRROR will ever be kept in the front rank, a faithful reflector of the progress of Bucknell. Long may it live!

The Fair and Festival held May 28 and 29, in the Armory, for the benefit of the Athletic Association, was a success in every particular. Over one hundred dollars were netted from the proceeds of the two nights. Too much credit cannot be given to the ladies of the town and Institute who willingly gave their time to the task of making the affair a success. They deserve and receive the hearty thanks of all loyal members of the school. By their aid the debt of the Association has been reduced to about fifty dollars.

UNIVERSITY ITEMS.

COLLEGE.

"The Galilean" was rendered in Bucknell Hall on Saturday evening, June 5th.

The Delsarte class gave an exhibition in Bucknell Hall, last Tuesday evening.

The Student Volunteer Bands of the University had a picnic in Bower's grove, in White Deer Valley, June 5.

The fair and festival which was held in the Armory on Friday and Saturday evenings, May 28th and 29th, reduced the debt of the Athletic Association one hundred dollars.

The staff of the Commencement News is as follows: Editor-in-Chief, L. B. Sinnette; Assistant Editors, M. R. Collins, E. C. Kunkle, J. V. Lesher, V. B. Fisk, L. T. Butler, Ed. Flint, O. J. Decker, Miss Watkins, E. P. Gilchrist and J. M. Rowe.

INSTITUTE.

Miss Grace Wales, class of '69, is visiting Mrs. Larison.

A reception was given by Mrs. Larison, on the evening of May twenty-fifth, to the Senior classes of the College and Institute.

Vol. XVII. Lewisburg, Pa., Jan. 10, 1898. No. 1.

BOTTLE GENTIAN.

Securely closed thy sapphire door
Against the rain ! as downward pour
Refreshing drops from clouds that weep
O'er Autumn's gloom and flow'rs that sleep.

Thy gown is tinged with heaven's blue :
God's artist has not slighted you,
Tho' faries loved thy rivals so,—
They fringed their lids and let them blow.

Hast thou offended Flora Queen ?
That thou must keep thy face unseen,
Nor welcome in the glowing sun
Nor twilight's rays when day is done.

Unfavored thou, sweet Gentian rare,
Of bottle shape, and sealed with care
From honey lovers winging round,—
Save one the bumble bee hath found,

The secret way to enter in
From perfumed pollen favors win
No fault in Mother Nature's plan
For flower kind as well as man.

THE LAST CHANCE.

The wonder was not so much that it happened as that it all came to pass in so short a time.

Just one week before Christmas the heavy curtain of a window in the Southern Express was pulled back, and a pair of blinking eyes peered out through the gauzy wire ventilator for their first peep at Dixie. The blinking gave way to a wondering stare, and a little gasp of disappointment could not be suppressed.

"What is it Laurie ?"

"Nothing. Are we in North Carolina yet ?"

Then another pair of blinking eyes were rubbed and raised far up before the window.

"Why Kitty, somebody will see you."

"I'd like to know who !"

"Well they might. Do you know where we are?" And the timid eyes ventured above the sash.

At a little distance the red roads and fenceless fields faded in a dense mist. A solitary horseman, sitting very straight in a colorless coat, was passing in the mud. The whistle blew. A large brick building with innumerable windows slipped past. Kitty said it was a cotton mill. And then the train stopped.

Again the eyes were down behind the ventilator. Right before the window stood a colored boy singing in time with a shivery shuffle. Laurie listened to hear her first real southern song. Between the shouting and dragging on the platform she caught the words, ——"Me an' Maggie O'Rook, skipped de light fastaskus o-o-o-o-n de side walk of New Yo'k."

"Well, I didn't expect to hear that down here."

"O," laughed Kitty, "the New South is getting civilized very fast."

At breakfast Laurie watched the dingy log-cabins, and the glaringly new mills, and the banks of red clay streaking past: while Kitty chattered almost hysterically in the excitement of reaching home.

"Mamma and Lil'll be at the station to meet us, with Bay and Grey, and old Pluto. And we'll drive into the old place; and George's dogs'll set up an awful racket—they know just as well as anybody that it's Christmas—and Aunt Calline'll wave her apron from the kitchen, and Sam'll try to make the dogs hush, and on the piazza'll be dear old Tom with his crutches, and a book."

Kitty's voice softened at mention of Tom.

"He's just the dearest fellow! When I get into trouble I always go to Tom. And he'll smile, and that helps, and he'll look at me with those steady blue eyes of his, and the clouds just roll away; and when it takes any planning, Tom's the one to do it. He's just awful smart—reads all the time, when he isn't in his "shop" doing experiments. That "shop" is a wonder to behold! He was cut out for a great man—but that dreadful hip-disease knocked it all sky-high."

And then as if she had forgotten the most important thing of all, she rattled on.

"But wait till you see George! Of course you've seen his picture, but he's lots handsomer. And I wrote and told him all about you, and that he simply can't resist this time. The idea of a big handsome, six-footer not looking at a girl, and just burying himself in business. But everything he touches just turns to money—he certainly has a way of making things and men do just what he wants them to. And if he don't fall in love with you, I'll never forgive him. You're the fourth of what he calls my "holiday display,"—you see I improve every time. And it's the last chance he'll get from me too, for its my last year—and if you don't suit I'll give up in despair. Wouldn't it be lovely if you and George only would get married, and you'd live down here all the time!"

Laurie reddened, and in another moment a look of mock perturbation came over Kitty's face.

"But suppose I'd marry—somebody, and live in Pennsylvania!

* * * * *

It was Christmas morning.

"Chris'mus gif' Miste' Geo'ge," called Aunt Calline from the kitchen door-way. "Chris'mus gif'! Yaw! Yaw!" And Aunt Calline's gibbous front shook with enjoyment. "I kotched you dat time."

George was not going any place in particular—just looking around. Of late he had become strangely uneasy, and had taken to loafing about the house. To be sure his mother and Laurie were cutting some holly from the garden hedge, but he was not going there. As he was just looking around, and as the kitchen commanded a view of the garden, he sauntered over to talk with Aunt Calline.

"Aint you gwine to gib de ole cook no Chris'mus?—Thanky, thanky, thousand times! Lawd bress you Miste' Geo'ge!" as a shining object sank into obscurity in the brown fist. "I'll jes' drap hit in wid de snuff. Kase hits good luck."

"Miste' Geo'ge!" Aunt Calline broke a long silence, save for the shuffle of her feet, and the clatter of pans. "Peers like you's mighty stracted 'bout sumpin in de gyardin."

George started, and then smiled almost confidentially in answer to Aunt Calline's genial grin.

"An' what's mo', you haint de on'y one nuther."

"Why, how's that Aunt Calline?" George's sudden interest lent a pleasing importance to the old woman.

"Well, in co'se I don't know zackly, but I spicions," she replied with an assumption of reticence, as she tucked in the ends of a huge pair of drum-sticks.

As George made no answer, and seemed about to leave, she played a trump. "But seein' as he's lame, I reckon he's got some discrepancy of conscience about gittin married." Aunt Calline looked up to note the effect of her move and the long words.

George turned quickly. "You don't mean Tom, do you?"

"Well, mebbe I do now, an' hit all happen bout dis hyar ve'y Miste' Tu'k, a layin hyar in the pan."

"Why, how was that, Aunt Calline?" asked George, studying the smoky ceiling with elaborate carelessness.

"Well, little Miss Laurie she come out in de back ya'd tother day jest when de sun was a gwine down--peers like she's jest allus a lookin' at de sky, an' de trees, and dat ole wood house, an hit kivered wid ole grey moss. An' Miste Tu'k was a struttin' aroun' jes' as bigoty as you please. An' bout dat time Miste Tom he come out to git a little tin bucket to put some sort o' kimical in,—but he never tuk none back wid him. An' Miss Laurie she had on a wrop wid a red linin' —jest a lovely wrop--speck she's mighty rich—dey all is up No'th whar she come from. An' when de ole tu'k kotch he eye on dat' ar red linin' he got bigotyer'n ever, an' he go gobble, gobble, and run at her, and Miss Laurie she clumb up quick on de wood pile. Dah she stood wid he' dress histed up jes' a little bit—like mebbe dey was mice in de wood pile—an' jes' de delicatest little ankle you eber seed—look like mebbe hit would break, if she warn't so slight. An' dat ole tu'k a struttin' aroun' on de groun', and de sky all goldy-like back of her. An Miste' Tom he stood a lookin' at her like he'd fo'- got ev'ything else, like he seed her a heap fudder off 'n she was, sorte' like he was tranced. An' I'm so fergitless, I disremember his words but he said to me, ‘Aunt Calline,’ an' I look at him, ‘did de sky eber peer to you like hit was a big sea o' gole wid islands in hit, an' like if you could jes' git to de edge you could walk right up to glory?’ An I said ‘yes, Miste' Tom, hit has.’ An' I looked at Miss Laurie, an hit looked like de wood-pile was right up in de sea o' gole, an a floatin' in it. An Miste' Tom he say, ‘Aunt Calline, looks heap mo' like she b'longed up dar den down hyar, don't hit ?’ An I say, ‘Yes, Miste' Tom, hit do.’ An' 'bout dat time ole Miste' Tu'k do like he was a gwine to flop up onto de wood-pile, an' I tuk a broom, an' drub him off. An' Miss Laurie she laugh an say ‘thankemam’ jes' as pelite as if I was white folks. An' when I come back Miste' Tom was done gone—an' he didn't git nary little bucket, nuther.”

George thrust his hands deeper into his pockets, and with a prolonged whistle, strode out of the kitchen.

“Miste' Geo'ge,” came a solicitous voice after him, “you haint a gwine to say nothin' 'bout it to Miste' Tom, is you ?”

“No, Aunt Calline, I shall not say anything about it to Tom.”

His intention was to go to his own room at the other side of the house. But before he knew it he was in the library, which overlooked the garden. At the window sat Tom, reading.

“Well, Sir Isaac,” said George, running his finger along a shelf of novels. “what's the absorbing topic now ? Attraction of—”

“No,” interrupted Tom, and George saw only the buoyant smile, and not the quivers it overrode, “No, surface tension.”

George laughed, and wondered if the book could be upside down. It was not. And then George wondered again.

* * * * *

It was the last night of the holiday visit. George and Laurie walked very slowly under the leafless oaks. The gravel of the driveway crunched crisply beneath their feet, and overhead the moon swung in a roseate wreath from a dappled sky. George had chosen the time and place after no little thought, and in his usual masterful manner had consummated his plans. Even the form of beginning his declaration was decided upon. He would stop beside a certain large water-oak, lean one hand against the trunk, and, after a pause, he would say: "Laurie, I love you, you must see it." He had not enough imagination to prepare for following up the attack in the varying ways that the effects of his opening shot might make proper, so he depended on his genius for generalship to see him through the battle.

Laurie was telling him about an old fashioned novel that she liked so much. He feared she would not finish her narrative before they reached the tree, and besides he felt a strange uneasiness and shortness of breath. That would never do ; he wanted to be himself. The little performance at the tree was assuming the proportions of an ordeal. His heart was pounding like a force pump. Surely she would hear it. But Laurie obliviously ended her story, and looked up at him for comment. He had not heard her. He wondered whether his expression was appreciative or agonized. The tree was at hand. True to his programme he reached toward it. The tips of his fingers barely touched the bark about on the level with his chin. His attitude was not altogether favorable, but he turned resolutely toward Laurie, and met a look of quizzical timidity. And then in answer to her timorous, "What is the matter, Mr. Duval ?" he fabricated an invention that astonished him. "I was getting the distance to that tree. It is most too near for safety on a dark night."

To cover his shameful retreat he added with the air of one accustomed to move mountains : "Yes, it'll have to come out."

Laurie walked on without a word, and George fumed within himself ; he had been a fool. They were nearing the house. His chance to retrieve himself was slipping from him. That was not his way of letting things go. He cast about him for a rallying point. His mental horizon was beclouded on every hand. The universe was a blank. By chance his eye lit upon the moon. That was a beautiful and poetic object. A remark about it might lead to something better. At least it would break the stupid silence. But all he could think of was some absurd nonsense about a "ring around a rosy." That would not do, she would think he was crazy. Then for the first time it struck him that the situation was altogether ridiculous. Suddenly he stopped. He and Laurie stood face to face. His strange actions demanded an explanation. He would tell her all. But his tongue was paralyzed. A feeling of compression crept around his lungs and throttled him. For all his thirty years and his six-feet-two, George stood mute before the slight girl in front of him. Her head was turned a little to one side, she was looking at the ground. Was that coquetry? Did she know what was coming? The moonlight silvered a tiny curl just under her hat. What was going on inside that little head? Was it filled with serious thought at the necessity of telling him she could not love him? Or was it all alive with elfin merriment ready to ring out in laughter and to mock at him. In fact the little head was in a hopeless whirl, bewildering, yet delicious. One image only made a clear impression, their shadows cast on the gravel by the moon. And then—perhaps the moon grew tired, it had cast two shadows long enough, for suddenly it cast but one. That single shadow stood quite motionless for such a time the moon feared its experiment had proved disastrous, And afterwhile two forms moved slowly—very close together—toward the house.

In the hallway with one crutch laid across his shrunken knees sat Tom, reading.

And the wonder was not so much that it happened as that it all came to pass in so short a time.

SOME NOTES ON QUOTATION.

PROF. ENOCH PERRINE, LITT. D.

I.

In his Commemoration Ode, Lowell wrote speaking of Harvard students slain in battle :

> "We sit here in the Promised Land
> That flows with Freedom's honey and milk ;
> But 't was they won it, sword in hand,
> Making the nettle danger soft for us as silk."

Evidently the poet had in mind (1) King Hen. IV Pt. I Act II. Sc. 3 : "Out of this nettle, danger, we pluck this flower, safety," and his use of Hotspur's words is very felicitous; (2) Josh. 5:6—"a land flowing with milk and honey"—and here he is not so happy. Certain combinations of words and phrases are handed from generation to generation and become a part of our common speech; e. g., "ways and means," "odds and ends" and the like. Should one reverse the order there is a jar and we feel that either he did not know or else he was attempting a sensation, the result being more or less a failure. Lowell is open to some criticism in the lines quoted. "Milk and honey" not "honey and milk" is the form in which that thought about the Promised Land has come down to us; and when the poet says "honey and milk" violence seems done to one of our treasured expressions. Moreover, "honey and milk" has in itself no advantage over "milk and honey: we see he used it in order that "milk" might rhyme with "silk." In other words, the poet had decided upon the expression of the fourth line and subjected the second line to that expression. Surely if this be not a mechanical way of writing poetry, one hardly knows where to find a typical instance. The quotation—for such it really is, since it is too close to the original for a mere allusion—is inaccurate and while accomplishing one purpose defeats itself in a vital point.

A critic ought to hesitate before he points out a fault in Lowell; but in this case we need not fear since the poet himself has incidentally given us a reason for the blemish. He wrote to Godkin; "I have not changed it except in striking out some of the weakest verses. The fact is one can't. They are like balloons that have snapped the cord. We can gaze wistfully after, but cannot overtake them." This proves that he saw defects. He wrote to Higginson: "The fact is that the 'Ode' was written at a heat—such a one, indeed, as leaves one colder than common afterwards—and I have hardly looked at it since" [Mch. 28, 1867]. In this very letter he suggests changes. Of the Ode he wrote to Thayer: "It bothers me sometimes in writing verses. The germ of a poem is always delightful to me, but I have no pleasure in working it up. * * * You will find some verses of mine in the next Atlantic the conception of which tickles me—but half spoiled (and in verse half is more than whole) in the writing." This proves that he had no delight in revision. But he saw the danger, for in 1865 he wrote to Howells: "The danger of our literature (with plenty of talent) seems to me to be carelessness and want of scholarly refinement. That is the rock I see ahead just now, and I fear we may go to pieces on it if we don't look sharp." Was he not correct in his warning when even the scholarly Longfellow wrote in The Golden Legend, "But it's a long road that has no turn"?

A HOT TIME AT BUCKNELL.

Written and sung by Samuel Sears Merriman, Class of '86, at the annual banquet of Philadelphia Alumni Club, 1897.

We are rollicking old boys, as free as birds upon the wing;
We are loyal sons of Bucknell, and her praise we proudly sing;
You may hear our joyful chorus through her groves and arches ring,
For on us she can depend as we our hearty tribute bring.
When we hear our Alma Mater call
You may know that into line we'll fall,
And as we swing in step around old Bucknell's Hall
"There'll be a hot time in the old town" that night, at Bucknell.

CHORUS:—
Yah, Yah, Yoo! Bucknell, Bucknell, B. U.!
Rah, rah, ree! Thy jolly sons are we!
And when this crowd you see, you may bet your last bawbee,
"There'll be a hot time in the old town" that night.

Then here's to Prexy Harris, Faculty and Trustees, too!
And if they plan for glory, why, we'll see the business through;
And they'll find us always ready for the thing that's square and true;
Then get the boys in line and whoop 'er up for old B. U.
Then you'll see, when the music does begin,
We'll do more than just blow our horns of tin;
We'll help to foot the bills, and each fellow will "chip in,"
"There'll be a hot time in the old town" that night, at Bucknell.
Chorus.

And here's to the undergraduates, the boys that make the noise!
Whose nights are filled with dreaming and whose days are rounds of joys;
But they will never fail amid life's trials or its joys,
For Mother Bucknell knows just how to train up sturdy boys;
For when they on the "gridiron" meet the foe,
Down the field for a touchdown sure they go;
And when the score proclaims them victors, we all know
"There'll be a hot time in the old town" that night, at Bucknell.
Chorus.

EDITORIAL.

After a discontinuance of one term the MIRROR resumes publishing. Just why the paper ceased no one seems able to say, but lack of interest is the generaly ascribed cause. If inquiry be pushed further, and the reason for the lack of interest be sought, still greater difficulties might be encountered. Resilvering the MIRROR is no small task, for it will take about a hundred dollars' worth of metal to satisfy the creditors. It is hard enough to revive a dead paper under any conditions, but when a lagre debt is to be assumed and carried, why then the editors have a right to use this as a plea for indulgence andaid.

That Bucknell, with her records of scholarly achievement and with her strong and loyal alumni, should not publish a paper which should make some pretensions as a literary journal, was a disgrace. The Orange and Blue devotes its entire attention to matters of purely local interest, thus leaving the literary field quite clear for the MIRROR. There is a talent found with many, or most, college students which can be most readily and profitably developed in work upon a school-paper. Not only should the paper exist for the undergraduates, but it should be of interest and value to alumni. Now these classes of readers are very different in their wants, so different in fact that what is of interest to one may be of no importance to the other. This being true, it is very evident that if a school journal is to please both grads and undergrads, consideration must be shown by each party. Altho to those present at school some events recorded will have become ancient by thirty days, yet the reading of these will be very satisfactory to those who have gone before. Likewise the grey-haired alumni must not be displeased with the unripe attempts of their young author friends Remembering that the MIRROR has these two different classes of readers to please will make things easier for the editors.

Formerly about a dozen names graced the editorial staff, now only four are there. If an explanation would prove exceptable here it is: out of the eleven or twelve only four worked; sometimes there would be a discussion as to which four should do the work, and then there was trouble. With work for four editors and with only four editors to do this work things ought to move more harmoniously.

THE LIBRARY.

E. M. HEIM.

[This paper was read before the alumni last commencement, and motion was made by them that it be published in the MIRROR. ED.]

The work in the library during the present year, so far as results can be measured, was briefly as follows: There were catalogued, by author and subject cards, all departments of the Library except "Religious," "Medical," and Government Documents of all kinds. There were added to the library 750 volumes, exclusive of pamphlets and numbers of unbound magazines.

The library was kept open nine hours daily, for reference and drawing of books. Too much commendation can not be bestowed upon Prof. W. E. Martin for his management of the library; his thorough study of its needs, his interest and his untiring zeal to promote its usefulness and his unfailing courtesy at all times toward patrons of the library.

The work done by the alumni during the year was as follows :

We would consume too much time were we to speak of all the present needs of the library. A library, from its nature, always is in need. But the lack in our library in some departments is so glaring, that we must briefly call attention to it. In the department of English are many gaps in very essential lines ; while of the literature produced in America, there is a sad need even of the most popular and common authors, such as may be found on the shelves of many a private library. The books relating directly to modern languages can be placed on a single shelf. The same is true, almost, of the department of Latin Language and Literature. Outside of the Lemaire edition of texts, there are less than a hundred available books, including lexicons, and few of them embracing the result of recent study. In History, half of the material has long ago been superseded by more modern investigation. In modern History especially, there is little of much value. College students are deeply interested in the political, social and economic questions of the day. They desire to know the truth, and to investigate other sources than the daily newspaper. But scarcely a day passes that students are not turned away by the librarian because there are no books by which they may carry on efficiently the courses offered. Even the public documents, state and national, which are so essential, are so incomplete that scarcely a question in economic or political science can be investigated with any degree of accuracy or thoroughness.

The additions mentioned are not only desirable, but absolutely essential in order for the professors and students of the respective departments to carry on their work effectively. Those who knew the library ten or twenty years ago can have no conception of the great change in the use to which it is put. It is no longer open only an hour or two every Saturday, at which time students drew books in a promiscuous manner. It is now open daily from early morning until late at night. The drawing of books does not give a fair showing of what is actually done in the library. In fact, no estimate can be made of intellectual work, when the library is made a study room, as ours now is. The modern library is a laboratory, not a museum for the collection of books. In science, chemical and scientific apparatus are not for exhibition but for use. In other departments, books are the material with which professors and students work. When a college offers courses of instruction and facilities for work and through facilities solicits the patronage of the public and induces young men to spend time and money in the school, it is its duty to provide what has been advertised. No matter what the curriculum may be, if the teaching force is inferior, it is a fraud upon the public. Bucknell has not an inferior teaching force. But we do little less, if we do not furnish the proper facilities by which the students and professors may do their best work. It is not fair to the teaching staff.

The practical question for us, is what can the alumni do? We do not wish to ask anything unreasonable, but suggest the following: 1st. Keep the library always in mind. If you have books, magazines, documents, etc , which you can spare send a list to the librarian. Look through your shelves and garrets. Do not think that because the book is an ordinary or common one, it is therefore not wanted or needed by the library 2d. Lawyers of the alumni can do an especial work by contributing books on elementary law, and especially reports of important cases in constitutional law. 3d. Bucknell should be made a public depository for government documents and publications. We have them even comparatively complete only for the years between 1850 to 1887. Either the alumni association, through a committee, or such alumni individually as are prominent or politically influential, should bring all their pressure and influence to bear upon our congressmen or senators to secure this result.

4. Contributions in money, no matter how small, are always acceptable and will be applied to the best advantage. A good library is a growth, and it grows by constant accretion in larger or smaller amounts. It is suggested, in order to prevent confusion or duplication, that persons should in all cases deal directly with the librarian, rather than with the individual members of of the faculty.

5. We suggest. further, that the balance of dues to the Alumni Association, if any, be contributed to the library.

ATHLETICS.

Our basket ball team promises to be the best in the history of Bucknell. Last year we easily defeated all of our opponents, among them the University of Pennsylvania and State College.

We still have, with but one exception, the same players as last year with the advantage of additional experience. Mr. Artie A. Smith, who has played on the team for two years, has been elected captain, and Mr. D. H. Elliott, manager.

The following schedule has been arrranged:

Jan. 8, Danville A. A. at Lewisburg.
Jan. 13, Bucknell at Trenton, N. J.
Jan. 14, Bucknell at Millville, N. J.
Jan. 15, Bucknell at Camden, N. J.
Jan. 29, Bucknell at Williamsport, Pa.
Feb. 5, Williamsport at Lewisburg.
Feb. 11, Bucknell at State College.
Feb. 25, State College at Lewisburg.

In addition to this, other dates are open which are not yet definitely arranged.

Mr. George E. Jenkinson, '99, who has played right end on the 'Varsity for two years, has been elected captain for '98 and Rush H. Kress, 1900, manager.

TO THE PURITAN AT CHURCH.

O serious maid in monstrous hat,
How can you sweetly sing
After a sermon two hours long
And dry as anything?

Your lover sits so far away,
A lofty wall between—
Your feet must nearly frozen be,
How can you look serene?

The tithing man is stalking 'round,
But you he cannot rap,
For one with such an earnest face
Would scorn to take a nap.

The glances that are cast at you
From out the solemn throng
Are unobserved, unconscious maid,
Your soul is in your song!

We join in staring with the rest,
You will not mind the gaze,—
For just remember, we don't see
Such maidens nowadays.

THE OLD MAN.

A peculiar old man he was, but one could not say in just what his peculiarity lay. Every pleasant day when he would walk out to the children's play-ground in Central Park, passers-by would stop to turn and look after him. It seemed as tho an atmosphere of gloom floated around him as he walked slowly along with bowed head. His clothes were plain but neat. He always wore an old slouch hat pulled down so far over his eyes that below its rim there was to be seen only the old man's beard, upon which there always rested a fine, wel seasoned briar pipe, which seemed to be his only comfort and consolation.

The old man would wander up to a bench near where the children where playing, and sit there watching them from under the rim of his old hat. The first few days the stranger was among the children they seemed to fear him, and were inclined to draw away from him ; but they soon found that he was their friend, for when any one of them was in trouble with a bruised toe or a knock on the head, the old man ran to the unfortunate one, picked him up in his arms with surprising tenderness, wiped away the tears and soothed away the suffering. Within a week the old man was so dear to the children, especially the little girls, that they would run to meet him as he would come to the play-ground; they would stick to him till he sat down on his customary bench, then they would climb upon his knees and sometimes would kiss him. But he never kissed them; indeed he rarely took the pipe from his mouth to speak to them unless they were in trouble, and then when he spoke his words seemed to have a magic kindness in them.

I saw this old fellow so often that I became greatly interested in him. I knew he had a history, a sad history, and I felt as tho I might help him if I could learn his story. Sometimes I would go and sit beside him and offer him a friendly greeting; he would simply return my greeting; then his whole attention would revert to the children playing before him. As the weeks went by he finally thawed out enough to pass a few general remarks with me, but no more.

One day while passing thro one of the humbler streets near the Park, I saw my old friend walking on ahead with a little basket of provisions in his hand. It would be no harm to walk slowly and watch him, and thus I learned where he lived. The house was a small tenement, and as I stood watching it I saw the old man at a window on the second floor.

For a time I was no longer able to go out to the Park in the afternoons, so in the evenings I would walk thro the street upon which the old man lived and often lingered before his house. Sometimes my peculiar friend would be sitting at his window smoking his pipe. his only friend, with his slouch hat pulled down over his eyes as tho he did not care to see even so much of the world as the tenement house pavement. At other times I would hear him playing upon a flute and the plaintive melancholy of his music would hold me so that I had to stay and listen. At times the flute seemed to be a living animal wailing and moaning in tortured agony. At such times the children on the pavement would stop playing and go away as tho frightened. I could now understand better the gloom which surrounded the old man. He never played light and joyful airs.

One night, or rather one morning, for the town-clock had already struck the hour of mid-night, I wandered down to the Battery to look on the water at night, it has sort of a facination for me. I was not the only one there. Some were sitting on the benches and some were walking about, perhaps thinking of the day when they landed here. Out by the sea-wall I saw a figure which I recognized immediately; the well known slouch hat with smoke curling about its rim told me that it was the old man who was standing there looking so intently at the black and sullen water. I sat down on a bench and watched him; I could almost imagine I heard him playing the "Traeumeri" in his most doleful accents. He stood for a long time motionless watching the waves as they came up and broke themselves with a little splash upon the sea-wall. Once he stretched out his hands towards them as tho imploring for a secret. At last he turned, and with chin lowered upon his breast started upon his long walk home.

I now felt as tho I knew the old man well and determined to visit him in his room. Whether he would rebuke this as an undue familiarity I did not know; at any rate I was going to try.

It was evening when I called. I expected to see the glow of the pipe or hear the flute as I approached; but all was quiet, the old man was not at the window, a dim light was burning in the room. I entered the hallway and found his door ajar; he was rocking in a corner and something was upon his lap. Whatever it was, it was made of cloth and he would hug it up to his breast at times as he rocked and talked to himself. Surely I could not intrude now, so I turned to go away, but he had seen me and called to me. As I pushed the door wide open he said: "Oh ! it's you, is it ?" He went on rocking and then said : "Sit down and I'll tell you my story." I saw now that it was a woman's gown he had in his lap. He gathered this up and kissed it and then went on as he rocked : "Thirty years ago it all happened. My wife died and left to me our baby daughter. The child was my pride and my joy. She was pretty and blithe and beloved by all. I worked and slaved for her comfort; my life was lived entirely in her. She grew to be a beautiful girl, and promised to make my last days full of happiness. But a change came, she loved me the same but she was different. I knew what it meant, but could do nothing. One day when I came home she was gone. I knew what that meant too, but still could do nothing I went to places where she might have gone, but my daughter was not there. Life had nothing in it for me now but I still hoped on. Finally word came and terrible word it was. My daughter had been found dead in the river, drowned with her sin and with her secret. She was my child and I loved her still. I would have kept her yet, but could not. This dress is the one she had on when she threw herself into the river, it is all I have of hers, and I love it."

The old man kissed the faded gown again and then folded it away carefully in a wooden box. He did not look at me, but picked up his flute and played the "Miserere" as I had never heard it played before. The melancholy of the old man's playing was now no mystery.

SOME NOTES ON QUOTATION.

PROF. ENOCH PERRINE, LITT. D.

II.

There are at least three different forms of quotation, presenting as many grades of artistic skill. (1) Blackie in his Life of Robert Burns writes: "And in the full feeling of this [independence of spirit and integrity of soul] Carlyle says: 'Many poets have been poorer than Burns; noone was ever prouder.'" Here we see that the writer has made a mere mechanical connection between Carlyle's words and his own, fitted the one combination to the other as though both were blocks of wood. No skill is shown or required—the requirement is simply that what you take from another shall illuminate your own general position. (2) The same author in the same book writes: "Wherein then lay his [Burns's] defect? Simply in this, that, as Cicero says of virtue, 'Virtutis laus omnis in actione constitit,' so we must say of religion that its whole praise lies not in sentiment but in action, not in 'calling Christ Lord, Lord! but in doing the things which He says.'" Here we have two quotations and but one sentence, the two sides of a comparison. The quotations are in closest connection with their surroundings; omit either of them and there is no thought; they are vital parts of the organism of the sentence. A finer artist has been at work. (3) Burns himself found, as he visited Canongate Kirkyard, that there was no memorial over the grave of his brother lyrist Robert Fergusson; he placed a simple stone over the revered ashes and inscribed on it these lines:

> "No sculptured marble here, nor pompous lay;
> No storied urn, nor animated bust;
> This simple stone directs pale Scotia's way
> To pour her sorrow o'er her poet's dust."

Instantly we recall the Elegy of Gray:

> "Can storied urn or animated bust
> Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
> Can honor's voice provoke the silent dust,
> Or flattery soothe the dull cold ear of death?"

Notice that Gray's sentences are not used, although the verse is his; notice, however, that Gray's epithets are used—"storied" and "animated"—and that they are used in connection with his nouns. Notice the absence of quotation marks and this because (a) the Elegy has long since become common property in the literary world and (b) the quotation is now not a part of the sentence, not an addition to help on the thought; it is the sentence—indeed, it is the very thought.

The quotation is no longer obtrusive—it pervades the entire expression like the perfume in an "alabaster cruse of exceeding precious ointment." It is difficult to see how one could make a finer use of quotation than Burns has made in the lines of which we speak. Any one with a "Book of Quotations" or a blue pencil while he reads, might use acceptably the first and second of these forms; only he who has lived with the great writers until the result of their labor has become a part of his inner life would think of using or could use effectively the third form.

III.

A misuse of quotation is seen where, although the original words may be given, the reader is indignant that they should be found in such company. In the prologue to "She Stoops to Conquer," spoken by David Garrick, we find:

"Excuse me, sirs, I pray—I can't yet speak—
I'm crying now—and have been all the week.
'Tis not alone this mourning suit', good masters:
'I've that within'—for which there are no plasters!"

Now Hamlet in 1. 2. 77 seq. says:

"Tis not alone my inky cloak, good mother,"

* * * * * * * * *

these indeed seem,
For they are actions that a man might play:
But I have that within which passeth show."

The melancholy Dane, thinking upon his father's death, replies thus when his mother tries to comfort him. He feels the torture of his soul; his words, where'er we meet them, call up his condition, and we grieve when they are used expressive of a very trivial, physical annoyance, even for purposes of comedy. We feel that the author had very slight appreciation of Shakspere or he would not have laid such violent hands on the poet's lines.

Maria Edgeworth seems to have had little conception of the sacredness of a master's work. She is describing in her Absentee the rooms of a family who, that they may get into society, have ordered new hangings, draperies, cornices, candelabras, everything. She helps matters along, she thinks, by using Shakspere's immortal lines in A Midsummer Night's Dream v. 1. 12 seq. in this wise :

> "The upholsterer's eye, in fine frensy rolling,
> Glances from ceiling to floor, from floor to ceiling ;
> And, as imagination bodies forth
> The form of things unknown, the upholsterer's pencil
> Turns them to shape, and gives to airy nothing
> A local habitation and a NAME."

This is too close to be defended on the ground that it is a parody, and is so utterly weak that we can excuse the author only by saying that she could have had no well-defined purpose in mind. To mangle one of the finest passages in our literature by inserting now and then a word out of all keeping with the remainder of the thought, is not the way to be humorous, witty or sarcastic, and will cause those who love real literature to cry out : "An enemy hath done this !" In the novel referred to before Miss Edgeworth causes a superannuated militaire, who has been flattered, to say: "For though honour's voice cannot provoke the silent dust, yet 'flattery soothes the dull cold ear of age.'" Notice how she has caused the garrulous old warrior to quote that splendid line from the Elegy until the very close when, to show his wit, he changes the solemn word "death" into the comparatively weak word "age." We want to take up the cudgels for Gray, who sleeps under his own yew tree's shade, and flog both author and speaker into a better appreciation of immortal art.

Contrast DeQuincey's use of quotation. He describes one of his dreams produced by opium. Cavalcades file off ; innumerable armies march ; there is battle, strife, agony ; a great drama evolves to the music of organs. Down he seems to sink until the weight of twenty Atlantics is upon him. Then he says : "'Deeper than ever plummet sounded,' I lay inactive." Backward our mind runs to Tempest v. 1. 56, where Prospero, abjuring his rough magic, drowns his book "deeper than did ever plummet sound"; and we see that Prospero's words and deeds are so in keeping with DeQuincey's experience that they fittingly assist in making vivid his thought.

A NEGRO CAMP-MEETING IN THE SOUTH.

Whenever you find an unbelieving southern negro, mark him well; he is as yet unknown, and when found would belong to a class entirely by himself. Religion has permeated and influenced the negro's whole being. The Bible is clear and plain to him; his mind is too unphilosophical for doubting or denying. He makes his own illustrations and metaphors with wonderful effect. Commentaries find little favor, he makes his own interpretations. On one point nearly all negroes agree. "De Bible is plain as A. B. C whar it says yer is got ter p'ent and be baptized, er ye'll be damned." Imagination does a great deal in forming his religious experiencs. His dislike for forms and conservatism in religion accounts for his very small membership in the Episcopalian and Presbyterian churches. The greatest part of them belong to the Baptist and Methodist churches. Here they enjoy frequent revivals and freedom to their heart's content.

Revivals and camp-meetings are a necessity if the negro is to be continually on "praying ground and pleading terms." It is there that the backslider and "unjined sips again the cup of Salvation" and the seeker goes through and relates the desperate struggles with the devil, the hair-breadth escapes from hell, the brief sojourn in heaven, and his final covenant. The minister's prayer is always answered, when he prays: "Give dese sinners an almighty shake over hell but defer de dreadful drop."

In August 1894 I was visiting Mr. W— a class-mate of mine in a small village in Central Kentucky while a colored camp-meeting was in progress in the neighborhood. Accompanied by Sam—, the head negro of the farm, a black of the Uncle Remus type, who in his own words "had long ago spilt de cup of damnation," W— and I started for the camp on the last Sunday night of the meeting. Inside the tent it was very hot and crowded and the sweating of this black mass of humanity added little to the purity of the atmosphere. By singing "In de mornin" the meeting was opened.

"Oh, de worril is roun' 'en de worril is wide—
  Lord! 'Member deze chillun in de mornin'.
Hit's a mighty long ways up de mountain side,
  En dey ain't no place fer dem sinners fer to hide,
En dey ain't no place whar sin kin abide,
  We'n de Lord shill come in de mornin'!"

    "Look up en look aroun',
    Fling yo' burden on de groun',
  Hit's a gittin mighty close on ter mornin' !
    Smoove away sin's frown—
   Ketch up en git de crown,
  W'ot de Lord will fetch in de mornin' !"

The song rose and fell in strange weird cadences with subtle inflection almost impossible to catch, and the harmony swelled melting and rich with the rare melody of the African voices. The beautiful and sweet melody of the southern negro is probably not equalled in the world. Prayer by a visiting clergyman followed. Each sentence was repeated by the kneeling congregation after the minister. He at first asked some general blessings, for the public, then for each member in particular. Something like this:

Minister—God bress deacon Jones.
Chorus—God bress deacon Jones
Minister—God bress Uncle Ephraim.
Chorus—God bress Uncle Ephraim.
Minister—God bress Aunt Sall's boys.
Chorus—God bress Aunt Sall's boys.

In this manner appeal after appeal ascended. His voice was rising higher and higher till it became a roar.

N'ahs, amens, shrieks, wails and sobs burst out in deafening confusion from the audience, and followed in the train of the prayer. So great was the excitement and noise, that the audience forgot the presence oftheir leader, and it kept repeating and shouting each one according to what he imagined the preacher was saying, for some time after the minister sat down. Had not some one struck up a "spirit song" they might have been praying and shouting still. As soon as the audience caught the tune of the hymn—

Oh look at de Moses !
Look at de Moses !
Oh-h Lord !
Jus look at de Moses !
Smotin on de water !
Chillens we's all gwine home !

Chorus—Oh de ole ferry-boat stan awaiting at de landin
Oh-h Lord !
Oh de ole ferry-boat stan awaiting at de landin
Chillens we's all a'gwine home—

a tapping of feet and clapping of hands began, gradually increasing into a stamp until the noise was deafening ; as the excitement increased, some would jump up, and utter shriek after shriek. "Glory Hallelulah ! lamb of God, come," echoed from all over the house. When they all got on "de ole ferry-boat" a sister started

"Ef you want to catch the heavenly breeze
Get down in the valley on your knees"

By keeping this up for sometime the congregation was pretty well warmed up and bre'r Jones took it in hand. "Now breddern," he said "de time is whiskin on. We mus be brief. I's gwine fill you wid de spirit afore I leaves this holy place. I's gwine have all ye seekers and sinners tryin on de ole waistband of salvation to-night." "Dat's it yes, yes," and other signs of assent came from the congregation. "But fore I proceed we mus have a big collection; while de contribution is being taken in, we's gwine to open the meeting by singing a few songs, which I hopes will work up some sinners."

"Roll Jordan Roll" was sung,—

"King Jesus sittin on the tree of life,
Roll, Jordan, roll
Lijah sittin on de tree ob life
Watchin Jordan roll."

In this manner they first placed up on "de tree ob life" the saints and then their relatives, the congregation one by one, singing, shouting, and jumping marched by the pulpit dropping their offering in a basket. At last bre'r Jones selected his text. I do not remember it now, but if it was anywhere in the Bible he certainly touched it, for he was actively journeying from Genesis to Revelation and back again.

After some account of Adam, Eve, Elijah and some others he proceeded to “reform de bruddern and sistern” followed by a beautiful description of heaven; “a place where niggers did'n have to do nothing all day, but sitting under de tree ob life wid de white robes on, a-wavin de palm branches and a a shoutin Glory! Glory! Glory! Glory! to the Lawd dat was slain: For what do de Scripture say? Dey say: ‘What though their skin be as black as ink, dey shall be whiter dan snow.” And after some more heavenly description of the mouth-watering kind he took the imagination of the audience on down to hell. He told them how hot it was and that sinners had to hoe tobacco continually, and gave some other hair-splitting descriptions. What more he said I never heard. Right then a scene occurred, which when read of seems the exaggeration of a disordered mind; and when witnessed seems like a nightmare. So wild in the torrent of excitement that sweeping away reason and sense tossed men and women upon its waves, mingling the words of religion with the howlings of madmen.

During the preaching the excitement had been gradually increasing. Men and women groaned, shouted, shrieked; their bodies swaying forward and backward, until finally, a “seeker” uttering the most unearthly scream, jumped some feet in the air, and fell back entirely overcome; others followed uttering the most frightful yells, their bodies shaking in the most terrible manner and finally falling down. Men and women tore their clothes, screaming most savagely, stamping their feet and clapping their hands until they became exhausted and lay stiff and rigid as death. Wilder grew the excitement; the stamping became louder; the shrieks became more savage, while above it all was heard the chorus over and over again, each time faster and louder:

“Jesus said he would die no no
Said he would'nt die no no
So my dear chillen don't yer fear,
Said he would'nt die no no.”

We stood like statues, unable to move, the excitement was almost too much for us. Finally after all the “seekers had done broke the bonds and were shuck over hell,” and the rest of them filled with the spirit, the storm lulled away to a gale of wind, then to half a gale; the half a gale slowly rocked down to a calm; some minister pronounced the "benediction."

We thought this was the last of it, but such was not the case. "Shaking hands in love" began and as their hearts grew warmer, their steps became quicker, their bodies began to rock, their hands to swing, their mouths to shout and sing, till they broke out into leaping and jumping and it looked as if the former scene would be repeated. We determined we would stay no longer and after some pushing we got away minus Sam.

Going home in that beautiful moonlight night under the soft and warm Kentucky sky, we could still hear them sing:

"Oh, whar shill we go w'en de great day comes,
Wid de blowin' er der trumpits en de banging' er der drums?
How many po' sinners'll be kotched out late
En fine no latch ter de golden gate?
No use fer ter wait twil ter morrow!
De sun musn't set on yo' sorrer!
Sin's ez sharp ez a bambor-brier—
Oh, Lord! fetch de mo'ners up higher!"

CEDARCROFT.

Rich in historic associations is Chester County. Here you are proudly shown the tiny, wide-curving Brandywine, Chads Ford, the old state road down which Cornwallis marched to meet Washington, the bridge over which he passed on the memorable Oct. 11, 1777, and even Washington's headquarters at Sconneltown. But by far the most delightful memories are those of a very different nature, for the country about Kennett Square recalls, at every step, the great poet and traveller Bayard Taylor. In prose and verse he has made immortal the quaint manners and customs of the simple, quiet Quaker folks of Chester Couuty.

Driving down the old state road, we come first to Kennett Square, a thriving country town the scene of the story of Kennett and of Hannah Thurston. These stories of homely country life teem with local interest, for all about us are the places he described, while the real names of his heroes and heroines are well known throughout the country. The story of Kennett is based on robberies committed by a well known out-law, while Hannah Thurston is a quiet satire on some of the peculiar views of the time. In both the characters are drawn faithfully from life. The old tavern, the meeting place for the fox hunts, once so famous, is still pointed out with pride, although now—

> "Gone are the olden cheer, the tavern dance and > the fox hunt,
> Muster at trainings, buxom lassies, that rode > upon pillions,
> Husking parties and jovial home comings after > the weddings !
> Gone, as they never had been!"

Quite recently the people of Kennett have erected a beautiful little free library to the memory of their noted townsman, for at last they have begun to appreciate the true worth of the man whom they could never quite understand, and in whose plans and aspirations they never fully sympathized.

About two miles south of Kennett Square is the beautiful home, Cedarcroft, in the erection of which Bayard Taylor took so much delight, but where he passed only two years of enjoyment. A turn of the road gives us a glimpse of the tall, stately house, high on the hill and almost surrounded with cedars and chestnuts ; then it is lost from sight until having passed the quaint ivy-covered lodge at the entrance of the estate we drive slowly through the well-kept park and are greeted at the top of the slope by the loud barking of dogs.

The mansion is, as Bayard Taylor planned, a perfect dwelling, dignified and even stately in its proportions, plain, yet artistic. It is of brick of a pale color that harmonizes well with the granite of the corners :

"High is the house and sunny the lawn; the capes of the wood lands
Bluff and buttressed with many boughs, are gates to the distance.
Blue with hill over hill, that sink as the passing of music.
Here the hawthorne blossoms, the wood is blithe in the orchards.
Winds from the Chesapeake dull the sharper edge of the winters,
Letting the cypress live, the mounded box and the holly.

Very beautifully also does he paint nightfall at Cedarcroft:

"The evening shadows lengthen on the lawn,
Westward our immemorial chestnuts stand
A mount of shade; but o'er the cedars, drawn
Between the hedgerow trees in many a band
Of brightened gold, the sunshine lingers on,
And soon will touch our oaks with parting hand.
And down the distant valley all is still
And flushed with purple smiles the beckoning hill."

Recalling these lines, as we look upon the beautiful scene we are able to comprehend in a slight degree, the pain which drew from him the longing of L'Envoi:

"Now, if the tree I planted for mine must shadow another's,
If the uncounted tender memories, sown with the seasons
Filling the web of ivy, the grave, the terrace of roses,
Clothing the lawn with unwithering green, the orchard with blossoms,
Singing a finer song to the exquisite motion of waters,
Breathing profounder calm from the dark Didonian oak trees
Now must be lost, till haply the hearts of others renew them,
Yet have we had and enjoyed, we have and enjoyed forever.

In the old burying ground of Longwood meeting house we find Bayard Taylor's grave. It is surmounted by a simple

Greek altar, of granite, bearing a life size medallion of the poet, which is surrounded by a wreath of oak leaves and bay. Above are the words, "He being dead yet speaketh." Beside him lies Mary Agnew the woman whose tender sympathy sustained him through years of dark trials and who was the inspiration of some of his sweetest songs.

"With thee was ceasing of sorrow."
Hope from thy life have I drawn and subtler strength from thy spirit.
Sharer of dream and of deed, inflexible measure of beauty,
Though as a grace thou art dear—as a guardian must thou art earnest,
Walking with purer feet the paths of song
that I venture,
Side by side, unwearied in cheerful encouraging silence.

LIBRARY NOTES.

Every friend of the University may share in the good work of Library extension. Recent generous helpers have been,—Sam'l Bolton, Jr., M. D., the class of 1896; Wm. J. Coxey, A. M., H. E. Deats, Esq, Mrs. M. J. Derr, Prof. G. G. Groff, M. D., H. S. Hopper, Esq., Thos. R. Jones, LL. B., C. C. Law, A. M., C. B. Lowe, M. D., G. B. Miller, A. M., Prof. F. E. Rockwood, A. M., Alf. S. Sheller, Esq., C. H. Sembower, Esq., Geo. M. Spratt, D. D., Wm. V. Wilson, D. D.

Students preparing for the law need about one hundred well selected works on our shelves. Who will assist in starting the Alcove of Law Books? Lists of needs will be sent to any inquirer.

Friends having in their possession books or periodicals they are willing to contribute to the Library are requested to send list of same to the librarian, who will inform them of our needs.

Gifts of money will always be needed to purchase new books, and scarce old ones, to bind periodicals and to provide working appliances. Gifts can be specially designated.

A Memorial Alcove in a College Library is a living, working monument; a benefaction and a blessing. Enjoy it while you live!

Glee Club.—The entertainment given by the Bucknell Glee Club afforded satisfaction and pleasure to those interested in music at Bucknell. The Club made a very successful trip during the Christmas vacation and their friends in the college and town were anxious to know by their own hearing whether the spirit of song had really deserted Bucknell. Great credit is due Dr. Aviragnet for the training he gave the boys, gratuitously of course, during the full term.

Singing at Bucknell.—Princeton's Glee Club made several thousand dollars on their trip. Bucknell's Glee Club did not make so much as this but it met with very fair success in all places, and proved that there are at least eight men in College who are able to sing. But these eight are not the only singers. Lately Bucknell gave a minstrel show at which it was made evident that there were at least twenty men at Bucknell who could sing. Further, the morning chapel exercises prove that there are more than an hundred men here who can sing. Now, at most other schools singing by the mass of students is one of the most enjoyable features in college-life. The singing at Princeton on the college steps has grown to be almost a ceremony. At other large schools similar customs prevail. Why can't there be such singing by the students at Bucknell? Surely no one can say there is no talent. The only reason to be ascribed is pure selfishness—no one has time. To be sure if a man really thinks that he has no time for a good thing, why let him miss it. But the students here do neither greater nor better work than is done at many schools where there is found time for singing. There is not space nor occasion here to speak of the obvious advantages of singing by college students. Let us make an effort to put aside our selfishness and start here a custom which we may ever look back upon as affording us some of the most delightful and unifying influences of college-life

The Man Who May Not Get Into Heaven.—There is a man here whom all might wish to be singular in his peculiarity, but alas! there are many more like him: he and his friends are Peeping Toms. One man will go to his room and study on a lesson for from two to four hours. His neighbor in class will go down town and do various things for from four to six hours. In class the next day the first man will get up and make a good recitation; his neighbor, who in the meanwhile has been looking up his point, will get up and perhaps make a better one. Just what does this all mean? The second man economizes, for he looks up one point instead of twenty; but no argument is needed to show that he practices a false economy. He is wronging those furnishing him with funds, for he is not getting the worth of their money. He is laying the foundation of bad work thro life. He is destroying self confidence. He is wronging his fellow students who work.

Now there are Toms of a different kind, but their chances of getting into Heaven are just as slim as those of the other Peepers. These are men who study hard and are ambitious to make good marks. They spend much time in preparing a lesson but are never satisfied that they have it out well; in class at the last moment before recitation a peep is taken.

This peep condemns them. It shows that they lack self confidence. It hinders the development of their independence. It lowers them in the eyes of their more honest fellow-students. It is robbery in the sight of some honest students who are just as anxious to make good marks and secure honors. In the case of the man who simply desires to get thro college in any way possible, who does not intend to wrong any one but himself and is satisfied that a poorly earned degree will compensate him for all acts of violence done to the moral standard of true students. why in the case of this man let him cheat. But the case of the "horser," who in striving for a high place uses dishonorable methods, there is to be spared no condemnation, and the Summa Cum Laude which he obtains on commencement day ought to be worked up into some sort of an anagram reading :—"I don't deserve this."

GENERAL AND LOCAL.

It is always pleasing to note progress. To see either an individual or a society rising into its highest sphere of usefulness is a satisfaction to all beholding.

The present year has witnessed a decided advance movement in the Bucknell Alumnae Club, which promises to give it increased influence as a literary factor. A change in the constitution has now made any woman graduate of Bucknell eligible to membership, thus making valuable additions from the collegiate department and the schools of music and art. A fixed course of study on art has been adopted for the year and a program, neat and tasteful, has been published. The meetings thus far have been remarkably well attended, proving that the changes have been satisfactory to the members. Each meeting is, as far as possible, made a loan exhibition of pictures, thus affording illustrations of the subjects under consideration. Cathedrals was the subject for January and the meeting was delightful. A collection of photographs represented the chief Cathedrals of Europe to the eye, while excellent talks were given on their construction. In honor of Mrs. Larison's return, refreshments were served after the literary program and a pleasant social hour was spent. That the Alumnae Club should be an important factor in keeping up intellectual activities of Bucknell's daughters, there can be no doubt; and we trust that each year may see her influence broader and deeper.

The Main Building at the Ladies' Institute has been considerably renovated since last year. New oak doors with plate glass have been put in the front entrance; the lobby has been made into a reception foyer and the hall-way has been entirely renovated to the second floor; the school room has been refurnished; new and improved folding beds are being introduced into the Institute and many other improvements are being made from time to time.

At the last meeting of the Bucknell Alumnae Club of Phila., held on December sixth, Mrs. Geo. Kendrick, President of the Alumnae of the Girls' High and Normal Schools of Phila., was the guest. Mrs. Kendrick gave a resume of the work of the club during the ten years of it history, and spoke of present methods of work.

The steam heating plant in the college building was extended during the holidays and now nearly all the studies in the East Wing are heated by steam. Steam heat has also been introduced in the dormitories of the West Wing, and the work of putting steam radiators in the East Wing dormitories is being advanced.

The men selected for the debate with Lehigh are J. R. L. Diggs, '98, and A. M. Forrester, '98, with C. F. Shipman, '99, alternate. The team for the Franklin and Marshall debate, which takes place at Lancaster, February 22, has been selected and consists of I. A. Dewitt, 1900, and M. A. Carringer, 1900.

Among the lecture treats booked for the current term is one on "Cuba" (Illustrated) by Col. George Nox McCain, of the Philadelphia Press. Hon. James Buchanan, of Trenton, N. J., will also lecture here this winter on "Eight Years in Congress."

The biennial convention of Province Beta of the Sigma

Alpha Epsilon Fraternity will be held in Lewisburg, February 21st and 22nd, under the auspices of the Pa. Zeta Chapter.

Three members of the Phila. Club of Bucknell Alumnae have been elected members of the Penna. Woman's Press Club.

Mrs. Katharine B. Larison, A. M., former principal of the Institute, is spending several weeks in Lewisburg.

A sewer line has been laid from the main at the Institute to to the Academy.

PERSONALS.

'54. The Baptist Young People's Union, of Philadelphia, gave a reception to Rev. Robert Lowry, D. D., on Thursday, Dec. 16, at the Grace Temple, Phila.

'62. The Rev. J. G. Walker, D. D., has been pastor of the Mantua Baptist Church, Philadelphia, twenty-five years. Such pastorates are a rare occurrance in these days of migration and change. The anniversary was very fittingly observed on the evening of November 22, congratulatory words being spoken by the Rev. Geo. Dana Boardman, D. D., the Rev. A. J. Rowland, D. D., ('62), the Rev. R. B. McDanel, ('88), Ernest L. Tustin, Esq., ('84,) Mr. Jas. S. Swartz and others. Dr. Walker has been the only pastor Mantua Church has ever had. With a constituency of 77 members, Dr. Walker has seen the church's progress until it now numbers nearly nine hundred. The Rev. W. H. Conard, D. D., ('62), holds his membership at Mantua, as does also his daughter, Miss Nellie W. Conard, ('95). Others of Bucknell Alumni who have come from under Dr. Walker's ministry are the Rev. R. B. McDanel, ('88), of Oak Lane, Phila., and the Rev. Chas. A. Walker,('89), of Bellwood, Phila.

'65. Rev. Edward Everett Jones died at Plainfield, N. J., on Jan. 7, 1898. He held several pastorates in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and was a faithful and earnest preacher. For some time he had been in ill health and unable to preach.

Lemuel Moss, D. D., LL. D., of Philadelphia, formerly editor of The National Baptist and later on, of The Ensign (Minneapolis), and at one time a member of the professorial staff of Bucknell, has recently been chosen editor of The Commonwealth.

'65. David Porter Leas, treasurer of the University, will sail for the Holy Land on Feb. 12.

'71. Died at her home in Towlerville, Columbia Co., Pa. Mrs. Harriet R., wife of Rev. R. Kocher, aged 42.

'72. The Rev. F. J. Parry, D. D., has resigned the pastorate of the Alexander Ave. Church, New York City, to accept a call from the First Baptist Church, Waterbury, Conn.

'76. Rev. L. H. Copeland has been called to the pastorate of the Central Baptist Church, of Riverton and Palmyra, N. J.

'77. The Rev. T. J. Collins has resigned the pastorate of the East Side Baptist Church, Salt Lake City, Utah, to accept a call to Bakersfield, Cal.

'77. LOWRY—ALDRICH.—At Port Jefferson, N. J., Dec. 22, 1897, by the Rev. Robert Lowry, D. D., (class of '54), of Plainfield, N. J., the Rev. H. M. Lowry, pastor of the First Baptist Church, Rahway, N. J., (class of '77), and Miss Eva B. Alrich.

'78 The Rev. Isaac D. Moore has resigned the pastorate of the Riverton and Palmyra Baptist Church, Palmyra, N. J., to accept a call to become pastor at Meredith, N. J.

'83. Rev. W. J. Coulston has accepted a call to the Baptist Church, at Elizabeth, Pa.

'87. Rev. Miles O. Noll, of Carlisle, was one of the lecturers at the recent Union County Teachers' Institute.

'87. Married. Dec. 14, 1897 in the First Baptist Church of Philadelphia, by Rev. Geo. Dana Boardman, D. D., LL. D., Howard L. Calder, Esq., of Harrisburg, Pa., and Miss Maud Hanna, daughter of Judge Wm. B. Hanna, of Philadelphia.

'88. The Rev. J. W. Griffith, of Edmeston, N. J., has resigned to become pastor at Sherburne, N. J.

'88. Rev. R. B. McDanel, pastor of the Oak Lane Baptist Church has arranged a six week's bulletin of attractive services for his congregation.

'97. L. B. Sinette, who is professor of mathematics at Kutztown State Normal School was a visitor at the college recently.

Ex.-'99. Mr. C W. Harvey, State Secretary of the College Young Men's Christian Association, conducted the devotional services at Bucknell on Tuesday evening Feb. 1st. Mr. Harvey is a very active Christian worker and always receives a hearty welcome among the students.

INSTITUTE.

'77, Miss Clara Beck who for several years has been editor of The St. John's Parish Register, the Church paper of the Lutherans at Centre Square, announces in the current number that the paper will be discontinued. In a spicy, valedictory editorial Miss Beck gives the reason for this action.

'78. Miss Cora Reese, of the Pittsburg Dispatch, has recently written a book entitled, "And She Got All That." It is a story and yet a daintly written story, telling of a young and ambitious wife who longs for a broader field of work than that which her home offers. The lesson of the book is a good one. The mentally-trained women of the present day are too often ambitious to be successful everywhere but in their homes.

'90. Miss Mabel Schreiner and her sister Maude, have left London for a short trip on the continent, in Germany and Belgium.

'92. Miss Frances Montgomery is teaching at Miss Kennard's school on North Broad Street, Phila.

'93. Miss O. M. Williams whose poem appears in this issue of the MIRROR is now teaching in Olyphant, Pa.

'94. The Misses Nora and Ida Green, of Saltillo, Pa,, spent three months during the Fall in the West, visiting friends and relatives.

THAT MULE.

BY T. H. PURDY.

I was walking in the market
  Of a dusty mining town
Where a sleepy mule was standing
  With his one ear slanting down.

He was meek, and seem'd so gentle,
  That I quite despised the rule
To be always telling stories
  Disrespectful of the mule.

I believed in Darwin's teaching,
  That development proceeds
In the organs of a creature,
  In accordance with its needs.

And I felt quite sure this fellow,
  With his over-growth of ears,
Had been thusly-wise projected
  By his wants, and hopes, and fears,

And felt certain that his hearing
  Would inspire him with alarm,
And would send him on a canter
  At the least approach of harm.

So I whistled, rather sharply,
  But the unexpected sound
Only put his tail in motion,
  As if flies had come around.

Then I yelled, uncommon spiteful,
  Sort o' jumped, and shook my hat,
But he never moved a muscle
  From the place where he was at.

Then I sang, a little gently,
  Like a sheperdess or swain,
And his north eye came half open,
  But he shut it up again.

Then I saw the driver grinning,
  Like as if he were amused,
And I said: "This mule is weary,
  And is shamefully abused—

Over-worked, and poorly rested,
  For he sleeps and would not hear
If a charge of mid-night thunder
  Were shot off, right in his ear."

But the driver's grin grew broader,
  As he handed me his whip,
Saying: "May-be if you'd touch him
  In the flank below the hip,

He might brighten up a little,
  And perhaps would undertake
To convince you that though sleeping,
  He am more or less awake."

So I touched him as suggested,
  And as quick as dynamite,
Both his hinder legs went flying
  Up and down, and left and right,

And so swift you could'ent see them,
  Till he left me much in doubt,
If he would not kick his body,
  Upside down, or wrong side out.

I ran back a little, feeling
  As I 'spose one mostly feels,
When he learns that the dependence
  Of a mule is in his heels.

And I felt quite disappointed
  As I sized him up again,
For the theory of Darwin
  Was so plausible and plain

That I thought I saw how nature
  Had been toiling on for years,
Just to put the mule's salvation
  In the largeness of his ears,

But this fellow in a moment,
  By the most persuasive means,
Kind o' kicked my faith in Darwin
  All to splintered smithereens.

THE VINE.

The old house which stood near to mine and had for so long a time been vacant was at last to have a tenant. It was nothing more than a large shanty and I wondered that any one except those in the most straightened circumstances should occupy it. There were only two rooms on the ground floor and one above. A small window in this attic room was the only opening on the side toward me, yet I had often wished that I might see a living being even at that.

When the occupants came with their household goods I did not wonder at their taking the house. They had only one small load of furniture and that was of the humblest kind—the smallest room in the shanty could hold it all. A little boy was with the driver and these two soon had the wagon unloaded and the things carried in. Of course I was curious and waited for the return of the wagon when it went away. Not long after it returned and in it wasa woman sitting in a decrepit rocking-chair, holding in her arms what seemed to be a child all bundled up in a shawl. The little boy ran into the house and got a chair, upon this the woman climbed down, carefully guarding her precious burden, and went into the house.

At last the shanty had occupants and somewhat peculiar they were. I felt as tho I ought to go and offer to help them, but as I remembered the woman's face it was proud, almost haughty and I was sure I should be intruding. The little window in the attic was now opened and I surmised that near it was a sick child, for most of the time there was a bottle of medicine, spoon and water-glass upon the window sill. In the evening when a dim light was burning I could see the mother fanning and fanning the child as tho she would never tire; occasionally a pale, wasted hand would be raised to stop the fan, but with a smile whose tenderness seemed a stranger upon a face so proud, the mother would kiss the hand and push it back upon the little sufferer's breast. It was fearfully hot those summer nights and the mother was always fanning.

I watched that little attic window all the time. I read in its vacant stare a sorrowful story. Sometimes I would see a wasted hand push its shrunken fingers out over the sill as tho lingering for a last touch of the sordid world before going to play upon a harp in the Celestial City.

One day I saw the boy out digging the earth beneath the window, into a little hole he carefully put some seeds and almost caressed the earth over them ; he lingered upon his knees as tho wondering whether he had not better dig the seeds up to plant them again and not so deep. Soon after I saw the little fellow up at the attic window with a ball of string in his hand ; he tied the end to something within the room so that he need do no pounding near the sick girl and then threw the ball from the window, the lower end he fastened to a stick planted near the seeds. The little fellow now watched his vine as solicitously as the mother watched her child. Twenty times a day, aye, twice twenty times a day would he come to look at the vine. Never was vine so watched over and cared for before, and strange to say it thrived and grew with great rapidity. It was a morning-glory vine and it seemed to enter into the race with zeal. One night when all was still and the fan had been laid aside, I looked down to the ground and there I saw in the moonlight the little boy upon his knees with hands clasped before his face in prayer ; as he arose and walked into the house I saw him brush tears from his eyes. Next day I was in my yard caring for my plants when I heard a voice from behind me calling :—"Mister." It was the first time the little gardener had ever spoken to me ; in his face was a look of fearful anxiety. "Mister," he said, "how long do you think it will take my vine to grow up to the window ?" I assured him it would soon be there. "Well," said he, "the doctor says it will have to hurry up or it won't get there in time." And then he burst into tears and went into the house.

The vine had at last grown up to the window sill and had bowed its tip end in toward the sufferer. Right at the window sill was a fine big bud forming. Next day this bud opened into a beautiful, bright morning-glory. The little gardener had won his triumph. I knew the flower would not be allowed to close again upon the vine and so I watched for its plucking. Ah ! there comes the shrunken hand toward the bright, fresh flower—what a pitiful contrast ! The hand falls, the mother helps it this time, the fingers seize the stem and the prize is won.

That night tapers are burned in the down stairs room all night. The next day I pluck a beautiful bunch of flowers from my garden and take it to the door. At the services in the afternoon I see my flowers in a jar upon the table, but in the little girl's hand is the morning-glory from her brother's vine.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF HOLIDAYS.

The wordly wise Lord Chesterfield in his "Letters to My Son" says that hard work is the best preparation for a holiday. The saying has a basis of truth but is by no means a comprehensive axiom. It may be worth while to examine the principles which govern mankind in the holiday or play activities.

We call in science to guide us in our work; in fact, the cry for technical education is becoming tiresome with its incessant iteration and sometimes sordid motives, but the play or holiday part of life is for the most part either neglected or suppressed or left to take any course that caprice may suggest. Of course work is the first in importance, but play should alternate with work in daily and yearly rhythm, or life becomes a gloomy, serious and melancholy episode. But a world without play, a life of work without holidays is hardly a possible conception, at least to the Anglo-Saxon mind. You may drive out sport as the early Puritans tried to do, and as some misguided people even now attempt, but it will rush in again, like the resistless tide. And yet what a failure many people make of their recreations and holidays! They return to work tired, bored and ennuyed and don't know what is the matter with themselves; or if by accident they meet with real pleasure and fuller health, they foolishly think that to go to the same place and do the same things will always have the same happy results. It needs not to urge further the necessity of a philosophy of play.

Every scholar and student who has grasped the meaning of the word law in science, knows that certain laws govern the life of man and all his activities whether he works or plays. If a man would succeed in study, in industry, in business, in any work or profession, he must fulfil certain conditions of success. Similarly if he would make the best and most of the play times and holidays of life, he must obey certain laws of his constitution.

The secret of success in play is not far to seek, although many seemingly wise people grope about and miss it. Watch the gambols of young animals the fun and frollick of children. It is the overflow from the reservoir of young life upon which work in the struggle for existence has made no draft. Childhood without overflowing energy and happy play is perhaps the saddest thing in the world. School and work come to absorb a great part of this overflow and energy, but if they absorb the whole of it no money nor opportunity can make a pleasant holiday to the overwrought mind and body. The primary fundamental condition of the enjoyment of play or holiday in any form is that the mind and body must have a saving or reserve of exhausted energy. The savings bank of the brain is a very confidential establishment and does not fully disclose the state of its private accounts. In a healthy organism there are stores of energy waiting for time and occasion to start into activity. It is the blessed function of holidays to make occasions for the exercise of unused energy. The tasks and work of life limit and confine us within certain necessary activities. We must bind and concentrate and keep down mad cap impulses until our tasks are completed. Then come music and the dance, sport and pastime. The staid worker is carried away and forgets fatigue and monotony. Every day and every year needs its holiday, and even restful sleep has its holiday of pleasant dreams. Sad is the lot of man, woman or child in whose life the play impulse is repressed.

Two other essential conditions of happy holiday activity emerge in these considerations Play must take its character from the individual genius and constitution, and it must be a change from the activities of regular toil. Unless it be a question of imperative morals, it is the blindest presumption of any governing authority, in the household, the school, the church, or the country, to limit and define the sphere of sport and play. The play impulse is the solace and renovation of life and expresses itself in a thousand forms. In play a man should follow his natural bent with absolute freedom. There is one open invitation to every one in the great play ground of the world. "Come" says Dame Nature, "will you join at a race, a country ramble,a game of foot ball, or will you revel in music, in poetry and the acts of imagination?" The intensest holiday enjoyment comes when the holiday maker finds the sport and recreation most congenial to his nature. There is a story of a London millionaire who retired from a life of incessant and unrelieved toil and found in his retirement that change and leisure brought no joy or relief. He went back to the old shop and begged his successor to give him employment. The long suppressed capacity for play was dead.

To these essential conditions of perfect holiday enjoyment, namely: a reserve of energy, a free exercise of unused force in congenial sport, and a change of interest from the ordinary routine of occupation, there must be added the condition of alternation of work and play. This is the principle of Lord Chesterfield's axiom. True play must come from the reserve of life and not from its working capital. It is the rush of fresh thought and feeling into new channels which gives a holiday its zest. If the search for new sensations and emotions is made the principal aim in life, as it is with certain rich idle members of society, then kind nature has no overflowing gift to bestow. A continual round of pleasure seeking wears out the faculties it stimulates, and even young lives become worn and jaded. In vain the idle pleasure seeker tries new devices, new luxuries of fashion, new routes of travel. The law is inevitable. The play energy must be held in reserve till our work is done.

Finally, it is a mistake to suppose that play belongs only to the young. It is not age, but over strain, unjust repression or vicious indulgence which kills the holiday spirit.

From all this one lesson comes. Cherish the reserve energies and do not exhaust them in over work or dissipation.

Give them free play, cultivate every act and pastime in which you take delight. While the holiday runs its course the working energies gather renewed strength. It is a simple philosophy and easy of application If some grave seniors feel doubtful and inclined sometimes to check or suppress the holiday spirit, they should stand aside and let the game go on.

CAPTAIN NELLIE'S GUARDS.

(A BIT OF HISTORY.)

MRS. DORA E. W. SPRATT.

Early Sunday morning, March 9th, 1862, the United States steam transport "Atlantic" sailed up the Broad river and anchored in the spacious harbor of Port Royal, South Carolina. On board were sixty-two men and women, who were sent down to the Sea Islands by the Educational Commission, with orders to set the contrabands to work, to give them instructions upon their duties in field and cabin, "taking every occasion to urge the obligations of truth, honesty, frugality, forethought, respect for the rights of others and self respect." They were also to teach the children to read, and, at proper times, all adults who were desirous of learning,—"that they might as speedily as possible, be able to read the Bible for themselves."

Most of those who undertook this experiment, were men and women of experience ; but a few of the most sanguine and enthusiastic were less than twenty-five years old. Among this number was a young woman from Boston, whom the negroes soon learned to call "Miss Nellie." She entered into this new work with all the vim and energy of her nature. When the General Superintendent, Mr. Edward L. Pierce, moved his headquarters from Beaufort to the Pope plantation on Saint Helena island, he took with him Miss Nellie and three older women to begin their work upon Saint Helena and the neighboring islands.

Most young people enjoy rusticating. To them there is a charm in variety ; plain fare and hard beds do not lessen their enjoyment of new scenes. But when middle life is reached, it is a more serious matter to be deprived of accustomed comforts. This was probably one reason why many things, which seemed like heavy crosses to the three older ladies at the Pope plantation, were only small annoyances to Miss Nellie.

One of the hardest things for the neat Yankee housekeepers to endure, was the dirty habits of the colored servants. Of course Miss Nellie, who had charge of the house, tried her best to have the house-servants clean and careful. But she was not always able to answer with emphatic affirmation, when one of her fellow workers anxiously inquired :—

"Miss Nellie, are you sure this is PERFECTLY CLEAN?"

But the thing which drove two of the older ladies home, was the active and ubiquitous flea. During the daytime the little pests might be endured, but to have their constant attention at night was trying to the best of nerves.

At length both Miss Donalson and Mrs. Johnson were nearly sick, because of the strain upon their nerves from loss of sleep ; so they told Mr. Pierce that they could endure it no longer. Their interest in the work had not waned. Their spirits were full of courage ; but their bodies were not able to bear so much fatigue.

"Will you also leave me?" said Miss Nellie, as she threw her arms around Miss Walker, who had promised to be a mother to her. "If you go North I shall be here all alone ; for this work must be done."

"If I do go, my dear," the good soul replied, "I shall take you with me."

"That is easier said than done !" replied Nellie, with a laugh.

Three weeks from that time, word came that the Union gun-boats were to be removed from Hilton Head, which would leave these islands unprotected. This brought them face to face with a real danger ; so Miss Walker said :—

"Come, we must return to the North, for it will not be safe for us to stay here. Suppose the Rebels should come back to take possession of their plantations, what could we do ?"

"Do," cried Nellie drawing herself to her full height, "I would fight before I would see these poor Negroes dragged back into slavery. If God spares my life I'm going to stay with these poor people, until the war is over. Perhaps then they will be able to take care of themselves."

"I hope you will not be so foolish as to stay here without any other women," said Miss Walker, gently.

"I can fill the house with women if I want their aid, but good Aunt Beckie will do as well as a hundred. Don't you remember she said, when we first came, 'I's gwing ter take cah of yo', Miss Nellie !' "

"O, I know, the colored women, and men too, would stand by you ; but you will not have any society," urged her friend.

"Of course I shall miss you," said Nellie lovingly, "for you have been like an elder sister to me ; but even if you decide to go I shall stay and do the best I can."

"Then you will allow General Saxton to send a guard of soldiers, as he offered to do ?"

"Indeed I will not !" exclaimed the decided young woman. "I would be more afraid of the soldiers than all the Negroes upon the island." A bright thought struck her, so she clapped her hands and cried, "I know what I can do ! I will train a company of able bodied Negroes, and they shall be my guard. How glad I am that my brothers taught me the military drill, while they themselves were in training. I told brother Will that sometime the knowledge might be useful to me. I remember how he laughed, when he said, 'I guess, little sister, you will never have to fight ; but you will enjoy the exercise of the drill, whenever you are tired of knitting socks for your two brothers, away down in Dixey battling for the Union.' It looks now as though I myself might have to be a soldier. I am so glad that Will assured me that I knew the 'Manual of Arms' quite as well as he did."

"Well, if you don't beat any girl I ever saw !" said Miss Walker admiringly. "If you will not go North, I'm sure your pluck will bring you out all right."

"If I had nothing but my own pluck to trust in, I should not feel very brave; but I believe I am doing the work that God wants me to do, so I'm going to stick to it."

Notwithstanding her brave utterances Miss Nellie's heart was sad when she saw Miss Walker start for home. That evening she called together the plantation people and said:—

"I'm going to stand by you, and I expect each one of you to stand by me. In this time of danger we must have a picket guard. Now I would prefer a trained guard, composed of your able bodied men, to a company of soldiers. When my brothers were trained for soldiers they taught me how to drill; so I can train a company I am sure, if you will help me by trying to learn. How many of you men want to be in Miss Nellie's Guards?"

Each man held up his hand, so she was obliged to select those she considered best fitted for the work. She did this wisely and carefully; for she had to consider the feelings of those whom she rejected. To Quaker, whom she knew to be one of the worst men on the plantation and therefore undesirable for a member of the "Guards," she said:—

"You told me, the other day that you were feeling poorly. Then you have the oxen to drive all day, so I think it would be too hard for you to have to be on duty at night."

So few of the men could tell their right hands from their left, that "Captain Nellie," as they then called her, was obliged to begin the drill by tying a rag around the right arm of each soldier in the company.

While she had her guards in training, but before she had put them upon night duty, Aunt Beckie, who was constant in her effort to "take cah of Miss Nellie," heard a noise on the veranda while the white folks were at dinner. She hurried out, then in a moment rushed back crying, "Miss Nellie, I done seed Maussa Tom Pope, or his hant."

Mr. Pierce with one or two of his assistants happened to be there that evening. They went to search the premises, and found a letter lying upon the window-sill. It was addressed to

"Miss Nellie, the Yankee Captain."

The letter was written with a lead pencil upon brown paper, and was composed as follows :—

"This is to let you know that I saw you eating your dinner in my father's house. No doubt you think yourselves secure in your possession, but you can see how easy it would be for us to come and drive you out, if it should seem best.

"This cruel war will soon be over, and we shall have our homes and slaves as before. Where will the Yankees be then? We will never be defeated ! !

Yours, Tom Pope."

The letter caused them to decide to have a picket guard about the place, at all hours. Later events proved the wisdom of this decision.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO.

(A GENERAL SKETCH)

The aim of the writer of this sketch is to give the reader a general introduction to a few of the salient facts concerning The University of Chicago. Little or nothing is said concerning its material aspect. Articles treating on its special features will appear later.

The University is still in its infancy, a child of only five summers. It is by no means a small or puny child. It has not only grown in this short time to a commanding size but it has grown strong. Its strength has been proportionate to its size. The eminent Dr. Berry of England said in a recent address to the students of the University that "American genius knows how to cause a great university to spring up like mushrooms in a night." Unexampled development has thus far characterized the University's career. Its student life is vigorous and remarkably varied. The variety of events which fill the daily calendar are full evidence of this fact.

The sudden rise and phenomenal progress which have thus far characterized the University's career may safely be reckoned upon as an earnest of greater things to come. Other departments and schools than those already composing it and affiliated with it will soon be added to the present equipment. Much has been accomplished and much more is expected. Three forces have thus far contributed to present results. They are large financial resources, able scholarship to man the various departments and an inimitable genius presiding over the councils and shaping all important matters. Every great development or progress bears the stamp of some ruling character and master mind. The University of Chicago is no exception.

Important as the great financial help and able scholarship have been in its development, yet to Pres. Harper belongs the chief credit of what has been accomplished.

In the short time in which the University of Chicago has been in existence it has won an enviable reputation in the scholastic world. For thorough and advanced scholarship it is a close rival of the oldest and most renowned universities of Europe. It has already outstripped many of the American universities in the rank of scholarship and bids fair to become the leading one on the continent. At the recent dedication of the Yerkes' Astronomical observatory the leading astronomers of the world were present, which argues much for the high repute in which the University is held.

The location of the University is most favorable from the educational point of view. In the heart of a thoroughly up-to-date city, with every grade of social, moral and political life it affords unparallelled opportunities for special study. Three great libraries are open to the students of the University. Opportunities for students of limited means to earn their way through the University are plentiful and the opportunity to hear the best literary and musical productions is unbounded. From the point of view of the largest considerations few universities of the American continent offer better inducements.

The reader may ask, What is the characteristic of the intellectual life of the University? The writer wishes to say that it is most commendable. The intellectual spirit is not technically conservative, but progressive, broad-minded and liberal. To know the truth concerning things however much old beliefs and pious convictions may suffer is the chief end. No sham is allowed to attach itself to the intellectual body of the University. A fearless and independent research into current beliefs and theories is heartily encouraged. A solid foundation for convictions is the chief motive in the pursuit of truth. Superficiality can not long endure.

As a parting salute two of the leading yells of the University are subscribed.

What B. U. Alumni are doing at the University of Chicago.

'94. Mr. Geo. Waid is working for his Master's degree in the department of Church History and of Philosophy. Mr. Waid will take his degree in June.

'94. Mr. R. B. Davidson is working for his Dr's. degree in the New Testament department and in that of theology. He is Precentor in the Hyde Park Baptist church and has been much in evidence in many important musical performances since his coming to the University in 1894. Mr. Davidson took his B. D. degree last June.

'93. Mr. Edwin Maxey is working for his Dr's. degree in the department of Political Economy.

'94. Miss Mary Harris, who now holds the Bucknell Fellowship is working for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. She will receive her degree in the near future.

'96. Three of the members of '96 are working for the degree of B. D. viz: Messrs. Chas. Firth, Fred Finn and H. T.

Colestock. They will receive their degrees in '99. Messrs. Colestock and Finn each hold scholarships.

'97. E. C. Kunkle is doing work in the Divinity School in connection with holding a pastorate in East Lynn, Ill. He expects to spend four or five years in the University.

BUCKNELL ALUMNAE.

A luncheon was given by the Bucknell Alumnae Club of Philadelphia on Monday. February twenty-eighth in the parlors of the Foulke and Long Institute. Mrs. John H. Scribner, President of the Woman's Health Protective Association of Philadelphia, was the guest of the club, and read a paper prepared by her for a meeting of "The Sorosis," a Woman's Club in New York. Mrs. Scribner gave a clear and comprehensive account of the work accomplished by the Health Protective Association during the seven or eight years of its existence, and made a strong plea for the hearty co-operation of all women in this work of improving the condition of humanity in our large cities.

Public apprehension over a proposed new curriculum and the possible overworked condition of the school children of Pittsburg, led Miss Cara Reese, a former student of Bucknell Institute, recently to investigate the methods pursued in one of the largest schools in that city. She enrolled as a student in room number 1, and diligently pursued her way day by day until graduated from the high school class. She is making further observations and reserves her opinion.

At a banquet given Saturday, February fifth, by the Alumnae of Girl's High and Normal Schools of Phila., Mrs. Dora E. W. Spratt, President of the Bucknell Alumnae Club of Phila., was one of the guests. The banquet celebrated the 50th anniversary of the founding of the Normal School. Professors Cliff and Rorer, Principals of the Normal and High Schools were also guests on the occasion.

The Lewisburg Alumnae Club has changed its constitution so as to admit women graduates of any department of the University.

Some Old College Laws.—No freshman shall wear his hat in the college-yard unless it rains, hails or snows, provided he be on foot and have not both hands full.

No freshman shall speak to a senior with his hat on, or have it on in a senior's chamber, or in his own if a senior be there.

All the undergraduates shall treat those in the government of the college with respect and deference; particularly they shall not be seated without leave in their presence; they shall be uncovered when they speak to them or are spoken to by them.

These are extracts from laws which were in force at Harvard in its early history. They seem strange to us and are apt to cause a smile as we read them, but their spirit still lives in colleges where the students are endeavoring to become men of manners and consideration as well as intellectual and muscular prodigies. Of course it would be absurd for a freshman to do obeisance to a senior, but it would in no wise lessen his manhood to show a great deal of deference to seniors, juniors, sophomores and fellow freshmen; nor would the senior lose any dignity by showing consideration to all those who on account of accident of birth or for other reasons have come to school later than he. But it is to the spirit of the third law quoted that particular attention is called, and in this case the letter of the law is very much narrower than the spirit. The men in control of a school are very often the intellectual inferiors of new born freshmen who, when they have lived to be seniors, find that their instructors are far, far beyond them; and when these seniors leave school and become men of ability they have still greater respect for their former teachers. It is commendable that even at a late day students should learn to honor those who in many cases are obliged to struggle with pompous ignorance in their effort to get students ready for the world, but it would be far better if these lessons of respect were learned earlier in the course. And it is by learning the lesson of reverence that one shall know in turn how to appreciate thecompliment if ever it be shown him.

GENERAL AND LOCAL.

The work on the running-track is being gradually pushed towards completion This track must be finished by April 1st if possible. The success of our team at the relay depends largely upon it. More funds are needed and the loyal friends of Bucknell are asked to contribute.

Before we again go to press, base ball season will have opened. Manager Ritter has arranged an excellent schedule and the rest remains with the players and with the support they receive from the student body. Last year Bucknell was said to have the best team she ever put on the diamond, and there is no reason why, with all of last year's players and several new men, we should not have a still better team this season. This however requires faithful practice and training, then our success will be certain.

The N. Y. alumni and matriculates held a meeting on March 7 for the purpose of reorganizing the N. Y. Alumni Club.

SONG OF HOPE

When the springtime thrill makes the heart rebound,
Then we kindly feel for all around.
When the young buds swell in the sun's warm ray,
Then life seems like a long, bright day.
Yet time may change, 'tis passing strange
How lives are moved and moods may vary,
But come what may, while Youth holds sway,
The heart is light when skies are cheery.

When our blood is fired in a noble cause
Till our restless zeal may know no pause,
When the passionate love of Right and Truth
Urges us on till past is youth,
Tho' the noble life is a ceaseless strife
Yet the moldering Past its dead must bury,
And if Duty guide, Joy walks beside,
So the heart is light tho' the feet are weary.

When little thorns our path beset
And many a danger and trial is met,
When clouds of sorrow and storms of pain
Sweep o'er the troubled heart and brain,
If sweet good-will our spirts fill
There's a glow within so warm and cheery,
And come what may, while Love holds sway
The heart is light tho' skies are dreary.

—Oriana M. Williams.

CAPTAIN NELLIE'S GUARDS.

(A BIT OF HISTORY.)

MRS. DORA E. W. SPRATT.

(CONCLUDED FROM MARCH NUMBER.)

The members of the household at Mr. Pierce's headquarters were often changing. Soon after Miss Walker started for the North, Miss Nellie's heart was made glad by the coming of Miss Towne, and a few days later of Miss Murray. The names of these noble women are known to this day for the work which they have done for the colored people of the Sea Islands. For years they have toiled on through all kinds of discouragements, "but the end is not yet."

Every afternoon, after finishing their day's work in the fields of cotton or corn, "Captain Nellie's Guards" assembled on the lawn in front of the house. They were undoubtedly improving. Some of the men could "file to the right," or "to the left," without ever making a mistake. These had even ventured to discard the rag; so sure were they that they knew left from right. When this point of progress had been reached Miss Nellie was confronted with the fact that they must be taught to handle and fire a gun. She was perfectly competent to teach them how to handle the weapon, for that was a part of the instruction which she received in the drill. But to fire a gun herself, and to teach her guards to fire, was somewhat of a strain even to the steady nerves of this brave young woman.

"But it must be done!" she exclaimed. So she went up stairs to her room, one morning when the negroes were at work, and took her Winchester rifle, with her box of cartridges, out onto the upper veranda. Here the heavy foliage of the trees growing just in front of the house, made a screen thick enough to hide her first efforts from the eyes of any of the Negroes at work in the cotton field just beyond.

By peering through the leaves Miss Nellie caught sight of several picturesque groups of laborers, with their broad-brimmed hats and bright clothing making a fine contrast to the rich brown loam, through which the young cotton plants were springing.

Resting her rifle upon the top of the railing, she aimed toward a knot on one of the branches and fired. Of course she did not hit the mark, but the first effort gave her more courage to try it again. Once more she peeped through her screen of leaves, and saw that the colored women were leaning on their hoes or standing with hand on hip, as all heads were turned to listen. Miss Nellie could almost hear them exclaim, "What's dat?" "Who dat air shootin'?" Quietly laughing, she continued her target practise, while workers in the cotton fields went on with their work, having concluded "ole Maussa Pope's soldiers" were not coming to capture them.

But aunt Becky, Nellie's faithful caretaker, was growing very anxious. With the first report of the gun her alarm arose, so she hurried hither and thither looking for "de young missis." At length she sought for her in her bed-room, and not finding her there she looked out on the upper veranda just as Miss Nellie again pulled the trigger. Suddenly a scream rang out above the report of the rifle. The young marks-woman lowered her gun and gazed about her expecting to find someone dangerously wounded.

Then she saw poor Aunt Becky, the very picture of terror, with her hands thrown up and her eyes rolled back until only the whites were visible. As soon as she could catch her breath she cried, "De Lawd sabe us, Miss Nellie! Some dese days yo' knock yo' head clean off!"

Her courage rose a trifle, when she saw that her young mistress was laughing at her terror. So cautiously advancing a step or two, she inquired, "What for you mek him talk, like when the big guns roll ober Hilton Head? You no t'ink Maussa Tom Pope up dat air tree?"

"No indeed, Aunt Becky, I shouldn't like to shoot him if he were there! I am only learning to hit the mark, for I must teach the men how to shoot."

"Good lan', Miss Nellie! You learn dem niggers to shoot, dey 'll blow up dis whole plantation 'fore next week, sure's yo' born!"

"Suppose they do some wild shooting," she replied resolutely, strengthening her own courage as she calmed Aunt Becky's alarm, "wouldn't that be better than to allow your old master and his friends to come back and drive all the colored folks into slavery?"

"Miss Nellie me no want slabery days come back; but I 'spects dose niggers terribul hate to hit old Maussa Pope."

"I sincerely hope that we shall not be obliged to use any human being as a target; but we must learn to hit the mark, whatever it may be."

The firing of a gun soon became a familiar sound on the Pope plantation; for, besides Miss Nellie's daily practice from the upper veranda, her guards, each afternoon while drilling, answered her order "Fire!" with a bang! bang-bang!! bang! of blank cartridges. Sometime the last report was heard fully a minute after the order was given; but they were all sure to respond, if the Captain waited long enough.

For the public safety, Captain Nellie decided to keep the ammunition in her room. In her heart she feared the fire-work and sky-rocket style of shooting in vogue among her guards, almost as much as she dreaded the return of the Confederates.

Each night a number of her soldiers were stationed as sentinels about the premises, with instructions to act as watchmen. If they saw any suspicious looking men or boats approaching they were to give the alarm, and the other "guards" were to come, as soon as possible, to their aid. Their captain agreed to see to it that they had their guns immediately after the alarm was given.

One night Miss Nellie was awakened by a sudden, war-like invasion of her guards into her sleeping room.

"Wha's de guns, Miss Nellie?" cried January, who was one jump ahead, because of the advantage his long legs gave him in running up stairs.

"O, Miss Nellie! De rebels done coom in a boat. Sure 'nough!" cried Jerry, while Patrick and Noll and Adam rang the changes upon his announcement.

Aunt Becky, who slept in a small room near Miss Nellie's, heard the disturbance, and, before her young mistress had fairly taken in the situation, rushed in, like a black storm cloud of wrath. Dressed in her night waist and cotton petticoat, her brown, bare arms and ankles looking black against her scanty white garment; without her turban, and with every little twist of hair bristling with indignation; it was difficult to decide whether this was the motherly Aunt Becky, known to them all, or a bronze figure of a Fury suddenly endowed with energy.

"Git out o'heah! Yo' nummine niggers! 'Pearse like yo's a parcle ob geese coom squacklin' into Miss Nellie's room. 'Clare to Maussa, yo's nuf to dribe her into a frazzle (fainting fit). Heah, Git out! Don't you recclemember Miss Nellie done tole yo' ter toot de horn, wheneber yo' want dem guns!"

Notwithstanding Aunt Becky's vigorous protests, Miss Nellie told them that they might take the ammunition with them, so they could be loading the guns.

"Do not fire until I give you the order" called their wary young captain, as they started to obey Aunt Becky's oft repeated order to "Git out!"

That faithful guardian of the public safety followed them to the head of the stairway, shouting, "Don't yo' dah bang off dem shootin' sticks, till Miss Nellie's down dere herself, so she see who's gwing ter be hit!"

As soon as the men reached the bank of the inlet, Miss Nellie, in morning-gown and slippers, was there also. The boat, which they had seen approaching, was now near enough for Captain Nellie to see that it carried but two people, which proved to be an unarmed man and boy. Before they landed, all of the house servants, as well as most of the field hands, were watching from the shore.

The man proved to be one of the owners of the Fuller plantation. His former slave and overseer, who was one of Miss Nellie's Guards, was the first one to recognize his old master. He exclaimed "Lawd save us, Maussa Robert, dat aint you?"

"Yes, John, it is! I don't wonder you didn't know me." As Mr. Fuller stepped from the boat the two men clasped hands. The thought that flashed through many minds was, "How things have changed!" It was evident that the former master was poor and needy. The account he gave of what his family had suffered brought tears to Miss Nellie's eyes, while the former slave sobbed aloud as he listened.

The teacher and superintendents, who were then at headquarters, all concurred in giving John permission to go with his former master, to the old Fuller plantation.

The next day, upon his return, John described the meeting between "Maussa Robert an de darkies."

"When he ask us, 'Wasn't slabery days de bes'?' We done tole him, 'Maussa, we's powful sad fo' yo' an' de Missis an' de clillun, but t'ank de Lawd we owns ourselves. Why Maussa Linkum pays us money fo' workin.' Den I done tole him dat my ole 'oman an' me had mos' money nuf ter buy a mule. We 'lowed he mus' take dat and buy new clothes fo' hisself an' de Missis. Den Maussa Robert jus' clean broke an' cry li'le chile. He clared he nebber tech dat money; but laws, Miss Nellie, he jus' hab to, he dat pooh (poor). Fo' de Lawd, my ole 'oman 'an me'd do any thing fo' Maussa Robert 'cept be his slabes."

One dark night, about a week after the first "gallant defence of the Guards," as Captain Nellie laughingly called events connected with the approach of Robert Fuller's boat; one of the sentinels was (as he said) "jus' gwing to slope 'gen de back ob de barn to res' my legs, when I heard some 'spicious talkin'" He knew that the barn was securely fastened with chain and pad-lock in order to make it difficult for any thief. who might covet either mules or horses.

As soon as the frightened darkey heard the voices in the barn he started on a jump for the house. Suddenly, remembering Miss Nellie's orders, he seized the dinner horn, which hung on a nail near the cook-house door, and blew a startling blast. All the other Guards rushed to his assistance, while, in short order, their Captain was with them giving her commands.

Upon hearing the horn, the horse-thieves who were within the barn called to their comrades, stationed near the door, to come and help them saddle and bridle the horses. "Never mind the mules !" cried one, but he spoke too late. One of his companions replied with a groan, which told the other men that it would be some time before Jim could get his mind off from the beast that kicked him. While his companions were trying to seat the injured man upon a horse, he moaned and almost fainted with pain, declaring with oaths that the mule had broken every bone in his body.

"Hands up, or we fire !" cried a voice. Turning quickly they saw a line of Negroes, holding their guns like trained marksmen, and pointing directly at the thieves.

"We are soldiers of the Union army," cried one of the raiders, "So we have more right to these horses than any of you."

"No one has any right to steal horses which we have just bought from the war department," replied one of the superintendents, who stood with a group of teachers, near Captain Nellie. The men were obliged to surrender, and the four uninjured soldiers were marched in disgrace to the cotton-gin, where they were locked up. A guard of armed Negroes stood near to prevent their escape.

The injured soldier received the best of care, for Miss Nellie was too much of a nurse to allow any to suffer,if she could help it. He was taken over to camp, with the other prisoners the next day, when this fact came out in the course of cross-examination. The men had decided to desert the army, so they were trying to secure the horses in order to make a more rapid flight.

Brigadier-General Saxton, then in command of the Department of the South, had been considering the possibility of training Contrabands as soldiers. Nearly every one assured him that the freedmen were too child-like and fearful ; while some even declared that they were so lacking in brains that they could not learn the ordinary forms of field maneuver.

The capture of the deserting soldiers, brought Miss Nellie's Guards to General Saxton's attention. One morning he, with some of his officers, came to the Pope plantation with the request that the men who were in training, should be called from the cotton-fields, in order that they might go through the drill, under Miss Nellie's leadership. It may be that the officers expected to see the funniest sight in the world. What they beheld was, without doubt, unusual :—A young, bright-eyed, white woman issuing military commands to a company of colored men, who had come, at her bidding, from their work in the cotton and the corn.

General Saxton was surprised and pleased to note the success of her experiment. When the "Guards" had finished their maneuvers, they stood with arms at rest while the General commended them for their dexterity; then, turning to Miss Nellie, he placed the epaulets of Captain upon her plump shoulders.

Soon after this, the first regiment of Union colored soldiers was organized. Among the first of these men to enlist, were several of the freedmen who had been in training as Captain Nellie's Guards.

THE LITTLE BOAT WEIGHS ANCHOR.

From, "And She Got All That," a Novelette by Miss Cara Reese of Pittsburg, a former student of Bucknell Institute. (Fleming H. Revell Company, New York, Publishers).

The little anchor loosed its hold on earth. The gentle spirit of Abe took its flight so easily and peacefully that those who sorrowed wondered at their blindness in not noting sooner the slender hold. Just a few days of drowsiness, a high fever, a brief delirium, and all was over.

"My pretty mamma," murmured the little fellow in his delirium, "come and take Abe." Then, "Don't feel bad, papa, you still have me."

Jane and Mary did their utmost, the baby was unheeded, the best doctors of the hospital staff came and went. The fair-haired nurse, now superintendent of the training school, left her post several times to minister to her little friend. The teachers from the school dropped in, and daily the children tiptoed into the house to learn how Abie was. Dave never thought of the mill and John came home twice a day in his anxiety.

All that love and skill could do, was done, but just at sunset one day, one of those beautiful days in which Abe used to delight to climb the hospital hill, the little anchor loosed its grip and the little boat always freighted with love and kindness went out toward the greater glory.

Dave held his child in his arms. He dared not breathe. He strained his ears for the faint coming and going of the heart throbs of his boy. The drops stood out on his forehead. Those veins that Emeline hated were full to bursting.

"Mammer, Ise up," murmured the child as his mind wandered to the morning greeting of those other days. Then the golden head fell back and the grey shadow told Dave that all was over.

Tenderly he held the boy close to him for a moment. Tenderly he laid him down, while Jane and Mary stood silently weeping. He looked at his treasure as though to photograph it forever on his mind, then fell on his knees, crushed the coverings of the bed between his hands as if in the act he might crush back the weight of sorrow, and in a hoarse unnatural voice, almost rasping in its intense agony, groaned:

"God, his mother!"

She had been gone several months. Since Abe's illness none had written, the child's own letter was the one last sent. They all thought now of Emeline. John said that it would do no good to frighten her with a hasty message, but that he would write.

So the simple preparations for the burial went on. The school children brought their offering of flowers; the fair-haired nurse remembered that the little chap had said one day, "I love violets, they are like your eyes," and she brought the sweet blossoms and arranged them about the little sleeper. Maidie's father brought her to see him and left some lillies as her tribute of remembrance. In his brief life the little man had made so many friends, that even Dave was now aroused, and in his slow way grasped the fact of how, with all such influences at work, it had been easy for the clever ones of his home to be drawn away. Abe's friends were also Emeline's friends. He could now make allowance for much.

He was the last to leave the grave. He stood so long that Mary returned from the roadside and placing her arm in his said coaxingly:

"Come, Dave."

He suffered her to lead him. His hat was pulled low over his eyes, and the shadows were deep on his face. As they went down the path, he stopped, gasped, almost strangled, and again came those words from the depths of his agony:

"God, his mother!"

A LONG, WEARY DAY.

The morning dawned brightly on that soft Welsh coast.

Cheerily the waves lapped the sparkling sand as the tide rose slowly over the broad, flat rocks. Then higher, ever higher came the water, till the curling, eager waves found the queer shells and delicate sea weeds they had left far up the bay the night before. Then higher still, until the Sunset Rock, which seemed a mountain to our childish vision, was hidden in the spray and the yellow cowslip on the cliff danced back and forth in glee as they fed upon the odor of the brine, nodding to each other as if to say, "There comes the sea, he never forgets us, us his little friends!"

We were his little friends too, we said, for every day we waited for his coming, Phil and I, venturing out to meet him as far as we dared, until the little silver curls touched our feet. These were baby waves we knew, for now and then a big, kind fatherly water came and gathered the little ones up in his strong embrace and swept them back. But on they came still faster, while we ran further back, calling to them, coaxing them to come and touch us, setting a barrier of sand for the next to wash away or marking a limit with round, smooth pebbles, mocking them as they lingered, "You cannot reach that, you baby wave." But the Sea brought them on, ever on, until high noon and then they shouted, "Good by, little friends!" "Good by, sweet cowslips, we will come Good by." And we laughed, threw kisses to the waves, and launched our fairy boats of cork, of which the sail was a feather and the cargo happy greetings, to the ships whose sails we could just see where the sky met the waters.

Beautiful gifts the ocean brought us, too. How we shouted as we ran along the shore, finding the dainty cowric and the pink shell fans! We clambered over rocks searching crevices for treasures of the sea, lifting pink or green sea flowers from their watery cradles, laughing at the awkward little crabs in the sea filled holes—peered into uncanny nooks and caves, whispering awful tales of dragons and fierce sea beings who carried little children to the middle of the biggest rock and turned them into star fishes and kept them there for ever.

When I was tired we would leave the rocks and going to the near cliff, gather the golden cowslip, and as we rested Phil would weave me cowslip crowns, and decorate my dress with flowers, saying that I was his little wife and that when we grew big we would sail off together right away across the ocean 'till we came to the fairy-land where the sea was always gentle and the cowslips twice as big and yellow, and so fragrant that all the air was sweet.

Oh! beautiful was the morning! Beautiful, but very, very short on that soft Welsh coast.

As we grew older the sea, too, forgot its childish frolics, the waves were quieter and more sedate. Instead of little baby waves playing hide and seek among the rock the sea sent larger ones to meet us that hand in hand rolled up and back again. They were lovers, I said once, and Phil looked down at me with such a tender, sweet expression that I grew silent and could not raise my eyes to his, but looked far across the ocean and thought of the fairy-land of our childhood.

Sometimes I grew mischievous and teased him, my patient Phil, said I loved the sea very much but men were stupid; that I wished he would go away, as far as America.

He knew me too well to feel hurt, but only hummed a little song:—

Wenn ich vergangen bin
Ganz weit ins Ausland hin,
Denn wisrt du weine,
Du liebe Kleine.

But one day I went too far. I do not know how the quarrel arose, but I said cruel things to him, words so bitter that I saw tears in his eyes; even that did not soften my wild humor and I angrily tossed him the ring I wore. Then his face grew white, he stooped to pick up the shining circle and turned away.

I watched him as he went across the sands, too proud to call him back, yet strangely sick at heart. Once I saw him turn, then go on and slowly disappear.

He was going across the bay that night I knew, and sleep left my eyes for I heard the wind and thought of the waves.

A strange foreboding seized me which I tried in vain to shake off. "Phil will be back in the morning and then I'll tell him I was wrong," but it was of no use.

At dawn I slipped away to the shore where we had sat the evening before. The sea was no longer frank and clear, it looked treacherous and sallow. I shuddered under a cold breeze which swept around Sunset Rock. There an old fisherman came hurrying to meet me: "Have 'ee heard then? Child, the boat went down!"

* * * * * *

Through the long, long weary day I have waited for the night.

I hate the sea, it is cold and cruel and the mocking, sneering tide toils back and forth over the long grey rocks in unending monotony. The cowslips are not fragrant now and the sand that glittered in the morning sunshine is dead and dull.

The long mist-shrouded waves slowly sob out the eternal song of the life-wrecking sea, the old ballad that Phil loved so well:

"Wenn ich vergangen bin
Ganz weit ins Ausland hin
Denn wisrt du weine,
Du liebe Kleine."

So in tears the long, long, weary day passes and the night comes dark upon that dreary Welsh coast.

THE MAN. THE GIRL.

The Man sat in the stern of the little boat, smoking his pipe and gazed meditatively through its ascending clouds at the Girl who was rowing. There was nothing unusual in their respective positions, for the Man liked to smoke and the Girl liked to row; so from the very first of their daily afternoon excursions upon the river, each had chosen the part most compatible to his or her nature and, in consequence, they had always managed to extract a creditable amount of enjoyment from their little trips.

In fact, during the extent of their short but agreeable friendship, they had come to an almost mutual understanding in everything and had even escaped that usual, annoying circumstance or outcome of ordinary friendship,—a quarrel. But the Man detested argument and the Girl was strong-minded enough to have a healthy abhorrence of the petty contradictory qualities of her sex, so that it was but natural that their relationship should have been as peaceful and phlegmatic as it was.

But this pleasant condition of affairs was now, practically, at an end. For the man was going away on the morrow and perhaps the Girl would never meet him again. As thoughts of this nature passed through the brain of the Girl, her usual half-serious demeanor began to be overshadowed by a pensive expression which irritated the Man.

"Give me your thoughts," he demanded. "Abnormal ones, I judge, by the expression of your countenance."

The girl looked up with a merry laugh. "You have forgotten our bargain," she replied. "I will not give, but exchange my thoughts and so far in my dealings with you, my trades have always been profitable ones."

"I will accept the reproof, if you will forego the praise," he said. "But come!—the exchange. I am interested in your musings."

"I have been thinking," she replied, "that the summer which is all but past, has been the most pleasant and fruitful period of my life."

"Fruitful? Would you mind telling me what it has brought you?" he asked quizzingly.

"From a physical or psychical standpoint?" she asked. "Body, Mind, or Soul? As to the first, you have the living proof before you," and she held out her arm for him to feel its supple firmness. "Is not that a glorious acquirement? I am proud of my muscle and tan. But more than that, you have made me think. You have come into my life with a "quiz" that would have done honor to Socrates. You have analyzed me, you have made me analyze myself, and from this self-analysis, you have helped me to build up a synthesis, so immeasurably great, that my gratitude falls short of acknowledgement."

"Oh, but do you know," he said, "there is one thing which I do most exceedingly regret and that is my cursed pessimism. I have thought at times, helplessly, to be sure, that perhaps, in some ways, it has stunted your mental growth and dwarfed your appreciation of the Truth which I have so earnesty endeavored to make you see."

"Dear friend," she said, "how can I assure you that your efforts have not been in vain? But listen to me. As a child, have you not often tried to look at the glaring sun with the naked eye, and after a few seconds of blinding, smarting agony, have turned away, unable to cope with its hot and powerful brilliancy? But when you grew older and learned to use a a bit of colored glass, then were you able to pierce the dazzling rays of his lordship, Phoebus Apollo, and see even the spots on his august face. So, through the medium of your pessimism, I have learned to regard the Truth as it is and not as it appears to be; and, for this too, I thank you."

"I am glad you appreciate it then," he said, "for I must acknowledge that I had just the shadow of a doubt of your ability to do so, but indeed you are advancing wonderfully. And now shall I tell you what have been my thoughts this afternoon?"

"Most certainly if they are as instructive as your thoughts generally are," she replied.

"You must judge for yourself. I have been thinking very earnestly, and have at last come to the conclusion that—I love you. No, do not be disturbed. I did not intend to startle you by any abrupt declaration, but I thought you had become accustomed to my brusqueness by this time."

"Oh !—I wish you wouldn't"—she began, but he stopped her.

"Now, I haven't proposed to you as yet and indeed I do not intend to, so you see there is no cause for alarm; but since we may never have the good or ill fortune to meet again, I think it a matter of duty as well as a relief to myself, if I tell you exactly how I feel towards you. From almost the first of our acquaintance, I have been interested in you, seeing in you what is so lacking in most members of your sex, and that is the inestimable quality of good sense. Then you have always listened to and respected my thoughts and ways of thinking, at which many other less intelligent mortals have laughed and scoffed. But, still dreading lest all this seeming depth might be the shallowest of deceit, I commenced to probe and sound you, for your own satisfaction as well as mine, and the result has exceeded all expectations. As I advanced in the work of analysis, and every day or every hour found some new phase, some new unfolding of your character, I rejoiced in heart and began to love this work of my mind. Sometimes you have not always known just when I have cleared away an excrescence from your mind or found some new growth of thought, but I have noticed and cared for all and, though I may have no other mission, I will be satisfied that I have shown at least one person how to think out and grasp the truths of Life. Men have called me selfish. I think it would be most brutal selfishness on my part, were I to ask you to marry me. And, because I love you as I do, I do not want you to tie yourself down to me for life or submit yourself to the enslaving enviroments, which I, understanding my own nature, know would be yours, Dear, little sister-soul, can you understand me?" He smiled as he finished and the answering smile was as whole-souled and truthful as his own.

"I will not say that I am able to understand your greatness of soul and heart," she replied, "for I am not. I can only say that I think you one of the grandest specimens of true manhood God has ever made and men fail to appreciate. The world would be far happier were there more creatures like you to people it. I can not thank you enough for this last favor,—in that, you will not ask me to be your wife. I am afraid my woman's nature would, after all, have been too weak to reject you, had you done so, and an ideal relationship would have fallen into most prosaic circumstances. Believe me, dear friend, this soul-union of ours to me is far more precious than an earthly alliance with the proudest dignitary of the world. And, hereafter, whether we meet again or not, it shall be the most sacred influence of my life."

"As it is of mine," he answered. "But, see ! the sun is rapidly sinking below the horizon. It is time to return."

"CENTWREE."

COLLEGE NOTES.

Dr. Freeman Loomis paid a visit to Lewisburg recently.

The Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity gave a ball March 11th.

The Senior class has decided to appear in the classic cap and gown Commencement Day.

Rev. Vyrnwy Morgan lectured in Bucknell Hall, Monday evening, Mar. 21st, on "Wales as it was and as it is."

Dr. Aviragnet gave an interesting and instructive address before the Y. M. C. A. recently on "Student Life in France."

The second preliminary debate of the Junior class was held in Bucknell Hall, on Friday evening, March 11th. The question was: "Resolved, That Hawaii should be annexed to the United States." Ballentine, Hazen, Meeker, and Rawlinson, were chosen.

A mandolin and guitar club of thirty members has been organized. It is under the leadership of Mr. George Schilling.

Rev. McKeever, of New London, Conn., gave two instructive addresses in Bucknell Hall recently, on "The Impatience of Job."

Howard F. King, D. D., '65, of Uniontown, has accepted the honor of alumni orator for Commencement, which was conferred upon him last year.

A debate has been arranged between Bucknell Academy and the Bloomsburg State Normal School. McCracken and Davis, M. J., will represent the Academy.

Dr. Perrine gave an excellent lecture on "Robert Burns and the French Revolution," in Bucknell Hall, Mar. 19th, under auspices of the Calliopean Literary Society.

The Glee Club, after a pleasant trip during vacation, returned to Lewisburg, on the 30th. The concert on the 4th was a success, the program being entirely new.

Col. George Nox McCain, A. M., of the Philadelphia Press, gave an illustrated lecture in the Baptist Church, Mar. 21st, on "Cuba." It was conducted under the auspices of the Athletic Association.

The faculty have passed an act prohibiting any student from joining a fraternity until he shall have completed the work of his Freshman year or if he be a special student the equivalent of one year's work. Class fraternities are abolished.

Lehigh University has accepted Bucknell's challenge for a debate to take part early in this term. The question is: "Resolved, That railroad pooling contracts should be legalized." Lehigh has the affirmative side. Diggs, '98, and Forrester, '98, represent Bucknell.

The base ball schedule for this season is as follows:

April 9.	Susquehanna at Bucknell.
April 16.	State at Bucknell.
April 23.	Bucknell at Williamsport.
April 30.	Dickinson at Bucknell.
May 7.	Bucknell at Dickinson.
May 9.	Gettysburg at Bucknell.
May 14.	Indians at Bucknell.
May 21.	Open.
May 28.	Bucknell at St. Marys.
May 30.	Bucknell at Gettysburg.
June 7.	Washington and Jefferson at Bucknell.
June 11.	Bucknell at State.

College Slang.—Recently there was given in Bucknell Hall a very fine lecture, one in fact which might serve as a model for precision and accuracy of language. At the conclusion of the lecture one student turned to his neighbor and said: "Pretty hot stuff—don't you think?" "Hot catoot," was the reply. Another man said: "The Professor is a pretty warm rag, if any one should paddle up on a catamaran and ask you." The reply to this was: "You boat you, he don't do a thing but smok'er up strong when he gets at it."

Such expressions as these may mean much to one who uses them, but their varying significations could only be guessed at by one not accustomed to them. A justification for the use of slang would be hard to find. It may possess a temporary emphasis, but it soon dies to give place to some other expression, equally absurd. Lasting emphasis and stability of expression are to be gained only in the use of such language as is found in the works of the best stylists, past and present. So much for college slang.

"Pennsylvania Dutch."—Perhaps on account of our location, perhaps for other reasons, an assortment of "Pennsylvania Dutch" expressions have crept into our College English. For samples take the following: "I am waiting on a hat-pin," said a fair woman of Bucknell. Of course you know that she was waiting for a hat pin or you might truly believe her suspense was indeed very painful. A man expecting to be ready at 4 o'clock may say to you: "I will be ready till 4 o'clock;" leaving you in doubt whether he will be ready after that time or not. Again, if you ask for a drink of water and all the water has been drunk you will be told: "The water is all." If at this reply you suggest that you would like to have about one-half of it you will be considered a fool. A fellow student comes to your locked door and knocks, if you be a user of the common College English and desire to know what it is he wants you will call out: "What is?" And he, if he wants to come in, will say: "I want in."

Examples need not be multiplied: the crudeness of such expressions is only too apparent. Surely they are not suitable for the use of a College man.

Common Breaks in Grammar.—After long years of public school and academy training in the elements of grammar it is remarkable that students and other learned ones should use such expressions as these: "He don't," "It don't," "I haven't got any," when mere possession is meant. "Got," by the way, is not a particularly euphonious word to use in any construction. Another faulty construction common here as elsewhere, is the 'split-infinitive.' A man thinks he has struck upon a happy expression when he says: "To delicately trace the nervous system." "Shall" for "will" and vice versa are about as frequent as the misuse of the the adverb "only."

Grunting.—A very common way of expressing affirmation or negation amongst our men here is by two grunts, the first grunt being emphasized when "no" is meant, and the second grunt receiving the emphasis when "yes" is meant.

Surely such crudity of expression is not indicative of that culture which the modern college is supposed to foster. Time is too valuable in college for a special training in the use of simple English, but time is not too valuable for every user of incorrect English to mend his speech.

'34. Rev. M. G. Smith has recently entered upon his seventh year as pastor of the First Baptist church at Towanda, Bradford Co., Pa., where the good standing and prosperity of the church speak favorably of the pastor's work.

'88. Rev. A. B. Bowser, of Danville, Pa., has issued the first edition of his new Sunday School Hymn Book, "Heralds of Grace" The book is filled with bright, sparkling music, and very many of the selections are of Mr. Bowser's own composition. The book ought to, and certainly will, find a glad welcome among all lovers of good music.

'88. Dr. Paul J. Pontius has removed his office to 1829 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

'91. The Rev. R. B. Dunmire, who was located at Wrangel, Alaska, as teacher, has taken up the pastorate at Homer City, Pa.

'92. Geo. Shorkley who is attending Hahnemann Medical College, Philadelphia, recently visited friends and relatives in Lewisburg.

'94. Ralph R. Snow was ordained to the work of the Gospel Ministry, Feb. 27, at Marquette, Michigan, where he has been called to the pastorate of the First Baptist Church.

Ex.'98. Prof. Brown Martin, of Perkiomen Seminary, Pennsburg, Pa., spent his spring vacation with his parents, Prof. and Mrs. W. E. Martin, Lewisburg.

The next issue of the MIRROR will contain the personals of the entire class of '88. The personal editor would be glad to have other classes take up this plan. This would be the surest way of bringing all of the Alumni in touch with the college and with one another. Which will be the next class to respond?

THE CHARACTER OF LINCOLN.

THE OPENING LECTURE OF THE TERM BY DR. HARRIS.

The first lecture of the term was delivered Monday morning, April 4th, before the students of the University. The subject was "Character as Portrayed in Abraham Lincoln." In the development of his theme Dr. Harris drew many lessons for every day application.

The lecture had three main divisions, namely: (2) The Moral Courage of Lincoln, (1) The Genius of Lincoln and (3) The Self-devotion of Lincoln.

Genius has the same place in history as accidental variation has in biology. About one man in one hundred and fifty thousand has a remarkable talent and this talent can no more be explained than can the color of a flower or the development of an animal. The characteristics of a real genius are born with the man; for instance, the musical genius of Mozart who played at four years of age and composed music at six. Such a genius was Lincoln. Not for years did he in the least degree realize his power. His gift of oratory was unique. It is related that a Professor of Rhetoric of the Harvard University went to hear Lincoln speak and was so struck with his splendid power that he went again many times simply to study the oratory of the speaker. So little did Lincoln comprehend his own genius that he regards this as a remarkable incident. True genius does not require external stimulus to develope. It is the man with average talent who requires continual prodding. Intellectually Lincoln was the ablest man of his day. He thought out all the sides of a question and never stopped until he had reached a conclusion satisfactory to himself. His power of debate lay in his ability to grasp the main argument laying aside all extraneous ideas. This was the secret of his influence before a jury. He was noted for the manner in which he seemed to give away his case. One point after another he would grant to the opposition but at the end it would be found that the most important point was thus left clear and distinct before the jury who were further impressed with his exceeding fairness. The lesson for the student is this: Get your own view of a subject; don't learn words and don't cram. Get hold of facts; then see the relation of facts to one another and finally grasp the totality of things.

But large as he was intellectually Lincoln overtopped the great men of the day in moral courage. Physical courage is very good but moral bravery is far more important. It faces boldly whatever threatens reputation and carefully considers the consequence of each decision. After his election instead of parading his views and making large promises to an excited, eager people, Lincoln had the courage to wait. The wisdom of his patience was shown later when by it 200,000 men were added to the North. After his inauguration complaints about his deliberation were heard on every side. Even Mr. Seward wrote to him urging immediate action. But strong will without judgment is useless. Lincoln could wait but when the proper time came he had the power to act effectively. Many great men have failed because they lacked the judgment which would have told them when to advance boldly. Lincoln moreover was willing to take upon himself the responsibility of defeat. No man can be an effective leader who puts his mistakes upon another. The true man acknowleges his own error and keeps silent regarding the faults of of others.

The third great element in the character of Lincoln was his self-devotion. His magnificent intellect and splendid moral force were given to his country freely and absolutely. An instance of this was shown in a most remarkable letter written by Lincoln to the leader of the opposition sometime before the nomination for the presidency. In this letter he stated his entire willingness to resign if by this means the undivided vote of the people so necessary at this critical time, could be obtained. No great end can be reached without entire self-devotion.

Dr. Harris closed the lecture by urging upon the students the study of lives of great men, the inspiration of a noble example being a most important influence in the formation of character.

BUCKNELL MIRROR.

VOL. XVII. LEWISBURG, PA., MAY 10, 1898. NO. 5.

HON. TRUMAN H. PURDY.

DIED APRIL 4, 1898.

There is no better example of what can be accomplished by a man unaided, except by his own energy and ability, under trying circumstances, than the late Truman H. Purdy. I met him first in the spring of 1857, while attending Lewisburg University. His health failed, and he was obliged for a time to abandon his studies, but subsequently resumed them.

No person had a better opportunity to judge of his character and ability. I boarded at the same place while at college, and afterwards when he was a resident of Sunbury, and was on most intimate terms with him until he died. He was endowed by nature with a strong mind, and had the energy and ambition to have enabled him to succeed admirably in any profession or undertaking had he been possessed of the physical constitution to endure the work. Notwithstanding he labored under the constant fear of failure of health, he succeeded well in all that he undertook. Few indeed, would have accomplished what he did under the same circumstances. For a time he edited the Lewisburg Argus, and afterwards the Northumberland County Democrat. It was while editing these two papers he took up the study of law, and prepared himself for admission to the Bar, while attending to his arduous editorial duties. He was a natural debater, and a forcible, logical and eloquent speaker. He argued his cases in Court with great skill, and as a political speaker he had few rivals.

He served his county two terms in the Legislature, and ranked among the leading men of that body. His tastes were literary, and he was a great reader possessing a mind well stored with general information. One could not help feeling that he had been benefited after a conversation with him on any topic. He was in every sense an educated gentleman. As an editor he was a forcible writer; as a lawyer, an able advocate and sound advisor; and socially a delightful companion, and above all, a man of strictest integrity.

BUCKNELL IN 1855.

On the fifth of October, 1855, the writer started in company with Prof. H. D. Walker to make the journey from Scranton to Lewisburg. We left Scranton, then a small village, in a stage coach, at four o'clock in the afternoon, and arrived at Wilkesbarre at nine o'clock that evening. Taking beds, we slept until one o'clock, and then took the packet boat for Northumberland. We passed Nanticoke dam about day-light and reached Northumberland at sunset. Here we were compelled to remain over night, and the next morning we took the stage, run by John Hess, and came up on the eastern side of the river, crossing on the old wagon bridge at the foot of Market street, and reached our destination about ten o'clock in the forenoon. We had thus been upon the road for forty-three hours, to make a journey which can now be made in four.

The college building at that time consisted only of the west wing of the college, and the old academy building, which has since been remodeled. Chapel and Commencement exercises were held in the upper room of the Academy.

There was then no University Avenue. The plot of ground now occupied by that street, and by the lots of Judge McClure, Dr. Gerhart, D. B. Miller, Esq., and by the President's and Professors' houses, was then an open wheat field. The board-walk to the college started near the intersection of what is now University Avenue with Third Street, and passed off diagonally to the southwest, across the John Brown mill race, and across the ravine, striking the edge of the woods about opposite to where the Seminary now stands, and thence southward along the woods, west of the present chapel, up to the Academy. From there a path went up to the west wing. The old John Brown grist mill was then standing below Third Street, celebrated in legend, as the place where Brady kicked over the whiskey barrel from which Ludwig Derr was dealing out whiskey to the Indians.

In 1855, Dr. Howard Malcom was President of the University. The professors about that time were Professors Bliss, Anderson, James, Dr. Justin R. Loomis, and Prof. Curtis.

They were a strong faculty, and when they put on their square caps and silk gowns for commencement, they made an imposing appearance.

Dr. Malcolm was president of the University from 1851 to 1858. He was born in Phila. in 1799, and died there in 1879. He graduated at Dickinson in 1818, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1821. He had been president of a college at Georgetown, Ky.—was the founder of the American Tract Society, was President of the American Baptist Historical Society, and was also connected with the American Peace Society, and with the American Sunday School Union. In 1835 he was sent to inspect Baptist missions in India, Burmah, Siam and China. He was the author of a "Dictionary of the Bible," "Nature and Extent of the Atonement," "Christian Rule of Marriage," "Tracts in Southeastern Asia," "Index to Religious Literature," &c.

Alfred Taylor, who delivered a poem at the Commencement, I think in 1856, speaking of Dr. Malcom, said:

"His foot has lingered long by Jordan's wave,
Has pressed the dust where prophets made their grave,
But in the Mission which from God is his,
He never trod a holier land than this."

Some of the students thought that Mr. Taylor referred playfully to a lame foot, which sometimes prevented the Doctor from getting up to recitations; but of course he meant no such a thing. Dr. Malcom had traveled extensively in the Holy Land. His foot had in reality lingered long by Jordan's wave, and had reverently pressed the dust where prophets made their grave.

In speaking of Dr. Stephen W. Taylor, one of the founders of the University at Lewisburg, and its first president, Alfred Taylor said:

"A great red sun glides slowly down the west,
The shadows lengthen, be his evening blest."

That poem was widely read, and justly appreciated, and it would well bear a reproduction in the MIRROR of to-day.

The present student of Bucknell can scarcely realize the changes that have been made since 1855. In railroads, telegraph, telephones, phonographs, electric light, and in agriculture, printing, and manufacturing machinery, the evolution has been great; and who can foretell what another forty-three years may bring forth?

T. H. PURDY.

GOING TO THE POST-OFFICE.

A pleasant country road leads past farms which resent cultivation and persist in sending forth luxuriant growths; picturesque, but provoking to the careful farmer who finds that eternal vigilance is necessary for productive fields.

Foremost among these growths, is the phytolacca or poke weed, whose wine-red stalks and pendent clusters of dark crimson berries glow in the September sun, and make brilliant a pasture field on the right. Clumps of glossy leaved laurel and bushy pine, form an effective background for the phytolacca, which they are evidently crowding out. On the left is a farm house, tinted by time and weather to a soft gray color.

A young girl is sitting on a step beside the kitchen door peeling apples. There is a grave intentness on her face. Her mother is away caring for a married sister, who is sick, and the girl, who is barely sixteen, feels the responsibility of being housekeeper for her father and brothers. One feels intuitively an interest in Lucy Jane, because of the serious questioning look in her large brown eyes, and because she never mingles in the merry-makings of girls of her age.

A short distance beyond this house, we find the pasture lands rapidly becoming copses. Nature has her own way with the once-tilled fields, and has covered them with a sturdy growth of saplings,—maple, birch and hemlock, with a plentiful sprinkling of sumac. A rabbit darts out of the thicket and hops along the wagon track; his sensitive ears warn him of approaching steps and with a bound he is safe in the underbush.

The road winds around a pine-covered hill and leads past a long, irregular shaped lake. Three large crows are perched upon a pile of partly burnt logs, which some woodsman has rolled in a blackened heap upon the bank of the pond. If it were not for the glossy backs of these crows, one might think they were the knots on the logs, so alike are they in color. These maligned birds remind one of the gossiping gaffers in one of Mrs. Horatio Ewing's delightful tales. They are watching and making hoarse comments on a pair of belted kingfishers who are plying their trade assiduously, darting and skimming along the surface of the water. The crows utter envious "caws" as one of the kingfishers, with a perch in his mouth, lights on a tall stump hard by. These predatory kingfishers are not so placid as their poetic name "halcyon" would indicate. Maurice Thompson has written a a most interesting description of the halcyon.

From the road, a herd of cattle may be seen grazing on the opposite bank; in the clear water of the lake they are mirrored grotesquely, with their feet toward the sky.

A little beyond the lake is the Post-office which is kept in a country store. The Postmaster is also the village blacksmith and his smithy is joined to his store. The place is a center for the rural folks. How much of the life and the interest of the neighborhood will be learned by a quiet listener and looker on at this gathering place. In secluded hamlets like this, are individuals as odd, quaint, and pathetic as any ever portrayed by Mary E. Wilkins or Sara Orne Jewett. How many seemingly common-place lives, are noble in the silent, patient endurance of life-long crosses. Truly no life is common place when rightly understood. It is not necessary when returning from the Post-office to retrace one's steps, but rather to continue by a road leading round to the starting point. Here and there along the road side, are wild apple trees, stunted yet fruit-bearing. Now the high-way leads through a piece of timberland. From among moss-covered logs and feathery ferns a pair of partridges rise with a whirring sound.

A sociable flock of chickens call merrily to the passer-by, saying, according to Emerson, "In Roman Key, Veni, Vidi, Vici," and not Chick-a-dee-dee. None of our feathered friends better repay a close acquaintance, than this same sprightly bird, who jauntily wears a glossy black cap instead of a crest.

Now we are passing the home of Patrick O'Flynn. One look at his sharp, cunning eyes and hard mouth would warn a person to be wary in dealing with Mr. O'Flynn, who by hook and by crook has gathered about him considerable property.

A dejected looking individual is shambling along with a dinner pail in his hand; Patrick calls to the man, and with many plausible words drives a shrewd bargain by which his field of corn may be cut and husked at about half the fair rate for such work. Through the open door Mrs. O'Flynn may be seen talking eagerly to a handsome young woman who sits holding a beautiful child. She is the youngest daughter of the O'Flynns making her first visit home since her marriage. More farm houses, each with a distinct individuality, and then comes an orchard so old, that even the most aged inhabitant can not remember who planted it. The old limbs have been cut off, and more than half of the knarled trunks are bearing branches many years younger than the original tree. More than thirty years ago the last traces of the adjacent homestead disappeared. This orchard recalls Hawthorne's question in "The Old Manse": "What is more melancholy than the old apple trees that linger about the spot where once stood a homestead, but where now only a rude chimney rises out of a weed-grown cellar? They offer their fruit to every way-farer,—apples that are bitter-sweet with the moral of time's vicissitudes."

Lichen-covered stone walls border each side of the road, plume-like branches of goldenrod wave against the stones, the stalks of the flowers shake suddenly, and a large mink emerges, his head held high, and in his mouth a hapless chipmunk. The captor and his prey disappear in the stone wall; another tragedy among the dwellers in wood and hedges. And now the highway passes well-tilled fields bordered by a row of maples, whose leaves begin to show gold and crimson spots,—signals that the pleasant summer time is speeding away,—and the Meadow larks know it, for see, in yonder field, they are flying hither and thither, lighting on the ash tree and holding musical colloquies as to when and where shall be their autumnal flitting.

Oliver Wendell Holmes in, "Over the Tea Cups," the last of that inimitable series of table essays, tells, under the title of "Eyes and No Eyes," of two men taking a drive in the country, and shows how the power of seeing things adds zest to life, and prevents ennui.

What numberless objects of interest John Burroughs would find in passing along this country road.

KATHARINE B. LARISON.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO HOUSE-LIFE.

House-life and organization promise to be such important features at the University of Chicago, that they deserve special consideration. The conditions here are somewhat unusual, because the university population is scattered throughout a large city, and because the co-educational factor also has to be taken into account. This latter circumstance has necessitated a great amount of careful study on the part of the organizers of the University, since it was their wish, so far as the women were concerned, to combine the home surroundings and intimate life of a women's college with the advantages of a co-educational university. That was the ideal of Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer when she in the early days accepted the position of Dean of Women, and also of Miss Talbot, the present Dean. From this ideal, the plan of House-life has grown; and when it reaches maturity in practical results, Chicago will be without a rival as a University home for women.

At present, however, there is inadequate house equipment, since the three Halls, Beecher, Foster and Kelly, can accommodate only one-third of the women students. These halls being on the campus are in close touch with the college life and yet have the private life of a secluded college. Each one has some member of the Faculty as Head, who has her rooms in the Hall, and who acts as chaperon and adviser. Graduate students are allowed the liberty of adult members of a family while the under-graduates are treated as the younger members of the house-hold. Each Hall has its dining-room, reception hall and parlor, and a life distinct from the others.

For the men, there are four Halls: Snell, for under-graduates; Graduate, for the more mature students; and two for the Divinity students. All these are organized with Head and Counsellor. Snell holds initiations (unofficial), unless there happens to be more candidates for membership than residents qualified to initiate, in which case the latter, like Br'er Fox, "lay low and say nothing." The men's halls do not have a "commons", so the "inmates" (as visitors call the House members) dine at the clubs which flourish thickly in the vicinity.

The fraternities are also organized as University Houses with Head and Counsellor from the faculty, and the rules of their Houses have to be approved by the faculty. The point insisted upon and incorporated in the rules of every House, is the prohibition of gambling and of the use of intoxicants.

Still another form of House-life is being adopted. By a recent decision of the Board of Trustees, any group of twelve students, not already House members, may organize as a House provided the members be increased to thirty within one quarter. The University then gives them a room on the campus and one hundred dollars toward its furnishing. The aim is to make a campus home for those who live in the city. Two houses of this character have been formed among the men, Lincoln and Washington: and two are being organized by the women, one to be known as "Helen Culver House."

All these Houses are nominally, at least, self-governing: that is they make their own laws, and the "House-spirit" of each Hall suffices in most cases to enforce their regulations.

The truest House-life is found in the women's halls, and it is of these alone that I can speak intimately. As hinted before, an effort is made to provide a real home for University women, and to approximate as nearly as possible a family life by fostering the "House-spirit" as opposed to the group or clique tendency. These Halls have a common base of supplies known as the "Women's Commons." There is a central kitchen in Kelly Hall where all the viands are prepared, to be borne thence on the arms of sturdy janitors to Beecher—several rods away—and to contiguous Foster. One woman says that nothing gives her so tangible an idea of the sisterhood of women as the thought of these one hundred and twenty women eating the same kind of soup or struggling with beefsteak simultaneously though separated in space and invisible to each other, and that it was probably a similar feeling which inspired Wordsworth when he wrote, "There are forty feeding like one !" The cooking was at first done on a scientifically hygienic plan, but the victims protested, and about two years ago, a return was made to the average dyspeptic form of nourishment.

There is considerable rivalry between these halls, and the variety of entertainments on such conventional play-days as Hallow-e'en and Valentine's Day does credit to the college-trained mind. There is lots of fun ; for of course the undergraduate element of the population must have its part of the child-play which belongs to every college student, and so in all the jollifications every member of the house joins regardless of rank or age, with the unselfish spirit of parents who go to the circus "to take the children."

It is yet early to assert the success of the House organization in its entirety; but we may safely say that it bids fair to be the means of a unified college life, which otherwise might be impossible in a University situated as this is.

A PROMISE UNBROKEN.

One evening Jerman asked the question for the third time. Of course it was getting a trifle tiresome, but Miss Fleet should have allowed for the fact of his mad adoration. At any rate, she should not have lost her temper. She did, however, and lost it so completely that Jerman afterwards told her that she must have found it necessary to light a candle, and sweep the house, and seek diligently till she found it.

The first time that Jerman spoke, he trembled; the second time he was calm and collected; the third time he was defiant and aggressive, and this maddened her.

"Now, Mr. Jerman," she said, getting rather red in the face, "I told you once that we could be very good friends, and should have pleasant talks together. But we certainly shall continue to quarrel and have very unpleasant times, if you recur to that subject."

Jerman's attitude changed. His eyes rolled a little, and his face assumed a look very characteristic and one which is supposed to sit upon the physiognomy of a cheerful idiot.

"But I mean to recur to it every chance I get," he said, "and I am fool enough to believe you will come around to my way of thinking."

The warlike glitter in Miss Fleet's eye was quite enough to make a more intelligent creature tremble. But Jerman was invulnerable when it came to glitters of the eye.

"Well," she said, "I'm not the person to keep a man who wants to be a fool, from being one. But I want no fools around here. If, as you say, you are one, the sooner off the better."

She ended with a sort of a snort. Really, the aspect of this little skirmish did not augur well for those heavier battles that lay ahead in the possible matrimonial campaign. But Jerman did not seem to think of that. He only continued to roll his eyes.

"If you are going to be sensible," she said, generously, "I'll forgive you once more, and we can go on with our talk. Let me see, we were discussing Lalla Rookh, were we not?"

"Never mind Lalla Rookh," said Jerman, with a persistency that was likely to be his undoing. "We have a more interesting subject on hand."

Miss Fleet rose. She grasped the back of a chair between her two powerful hands and faced the enemy with a visage from which all lines of grace and beauty had faded. She was as much like an enraged fury as anything one ever saw by night during a siege of the measles.

At first, Jerman looked only at the hands. He was admiring the power displayed in the grasp, and was wondering if the chair was happy or terrified. Incidentally, he wondered what his feelings would be if she had him thus by the shoulders.

"John Jerman," she thundered, "stand up !"

Then he forgot the hands. He rose. He looked up at the face. He stopped rolling his eyes, and they grew a little glassy. But the smile on his face was more persistent. It was too fixed to mean much.

"Yes or no,—once for all," she said in a tone that made his knees quiver, "do you promise never again to ask me to be your wife ?"

There was a pause.

"Do you ?"

"I—I"

"Do you promise ?"

"I do. I have been a fool to ask you at all. Never until my dying day will I do such a foolish thing again. I promise."

Miss Fleet was puzzled. Was it meek submission, or was it blighted sarcasm ? Of course, it made no particular difference. All matrimonial negotiations were at an end. But her woman's curiosity was aroused. The continuance of that smile did not help matters.

"Are you serious?" she asked, a little less fiercely.

"I have given you my answer," he said with a dignity irreconcilable with the smile. "Let's talk about something else."

"Ah, yes. You were telling me, I believe, why Lalla Rookh is not a great poem."

And so they continued to discuss questions about which they probably knew next to nothing, and thought they were improving their minds. Perhaps they were, and as Thomas Moore was probably beyond the reach of their slurs and flatteries, there was no harm done.

But for the next few weeks Lalla Rookh was as far from Jerman's thoughts as theology from the mind of a cannibal. He could think of little but those hands on the back of the chair, and those blazing eyes. But he had no plan for the future. One day he was wandering idly through the picture galleries in the largest department store in the city. He had not called on Miss Fleet since that day, and that was already three weeks in the past. Such a change in the routine of his life was causing vast wonderment among his friends, those well-meaning creatures who know more about taking care of us than we do of taking care of ourselves. But he did not care about the wonderment of his friends.

He stopped enchanted before two water-colors. They were not companion pictures, but were the work of the same artist. Both were pastoral scenes, and the choice was a hard one to make.

"I'm going to get one of those," he said to himself. "Wish I could get both, but 'tight affairs at home' always were too much for me. Which shall it be?" he added aloud.

"Perhaps I can tell you," said a voice somewhere in the neighborhood.

The sound was so familiar that he was not surprised. He turned around with a light in his eyes that had not been there for three weeks,—and it met in hers a light that had never before been there. And somehow the smile on his face was not so ridiculous when one became a little accustomed to it. At least, so she said to herself.

"I wish you would help me," he said, with a sigh of relief, as if giving up a responsible post to a newcomer.

She stopped and fixed her eyes on the pictures. Perhaps one becomes more artistic at times than ordinarily. At any rate there was something that told Jerman the wrong picture would not be chosen.

"I like the cows in this one," she said, "but the stream is particularly good here. It is a hard choice."

"Choose as if you were choosing for your own home," he said with a growing smile.

"Oh, but I'm not," she said abstractedly. "It makes a difference."

"Why yes you are," he replied.

"What do you mean?" she demanded, now thoroughly awake.

But the question needed no spoken answer. She read it in his eyes.

"You promised you would never"—she began.

"Well, I have n't."

And then she was silent.

"It is for our home, he said.

"I suppose so," she returned, "and on the whole, I think I'd like this one better."

But whether it was the one with the good cows or the particularly good stream, he did not notice. In fact, he did not know till four months later, when he hung it in their little parlor.

INTERLUDES.

I

"Why did she love him? Curious fool! be still.
Is human love the growth of human will?"

It was one of those nights which everyone has seen, so perfect that thinking was an effort while it aroused to its fullest extent the emotional part of human nature.

The garden was flooded with moonlight and a breath of wind, heavy and fragrant with the scent of flowers, lifted gently now and then, the curtain of the big old-fashioned rooms in which she sat. The great arm chair almost concealed the slender childish figure which was sitting so motionless.

Suddenly the girl moved restlessly, bringing into view a face whose strange, weird beauty as it peered from among the pillows gave one a faint electric thrill. With another quick nervous movement the girl sprang up, pulled aside the curtains and stepped out on the porch, where a man stood half hidden in the shadow of the tree. As the little white-robed figure strayed toward him a strange exultant gleam crossed his face. In a moment he began to speak, slowly, with a soft southern accent that was most winning. The girl, wide-eyed and breathless listened, gradually going closer as if fascinated. Suddenly he ceased and folded the little trembling figure close in his arms. * * * *

II

"Out, out, brief candle!
Life's but a walking shadow."

A tall rather distinguished man was threading his way through the crowded ball-room, with a woman clinging to his arm. She was very beautiful with a madonna-like face lighted by tender, wistful, brown eyes, and many envious glances followed the couple. As they stood a moment in the comparatively empty hall way, the man turned abruptly to his companion and began to speak evenly and courteously and without emotion, but too low for passers-by to hear. The girl was evidently startled for a moment, but when he ceased, a distinct "yes" was heard and a grave "I thank you." * *

III

"Sleep that no pain shall wake
Night that no moon shall break
Till joy shall overtake
Her perfect calm."

One of the prominent physicians of the city stood talking in a cheerful, animated way to his companion, a man with a worn though still fine face and an air which spoke plainly of life's fever and fret.

"Yes," the doctor was saying, "it is a most interesting case —magnificent looking too, though at first I thought her almost insignificant."

There came just a shade of interest into the listless tired face of the older man as he said, "May I not see her too?" Perhaps the doctor wondered at his interest in a hospital patient, but if so he gave no sign.

Together they entered the long ward. As they stopped before one of the white cots the doctor hurried away. A quick change passed over the man's face as the physician left. He bent over the cot looking at the white face and big wistful eyes.

"Dear," he said softly and clearly, "I could not do otherwise—can you believe me ?"

The white lids fluttered open and a look of joy flashed over her face for an instant, and then again the tired eyes closed. Lower bent the man over the lifeless form and reverently kissed the pale lips once—twice—then he turned and groped his way blindly out of the room.

At the same time as the moonlight flooded a room in one of the costly beautiful homes of the city, it revealed a woman lying with her face crushed among the pillows, praying passionately for the love she so longed for, which had never been hers. M. S. '99.

CLASS OF 1888.

On June 27, 1888, the Class of '88 graduated 19 men from Bucknell University, the last class during the Presidency of Dr. David J. Hill. A decennial reunion will be held during the approaching Commencement and a banquet served at the cafe of Mrs. Helen C. Huth on Tuesday, June 21, 1898. It is hoped that all the class will be present, and a most enjoyable time is expected. Seventeen of the nineteen survive, and are to be found in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina and Iowa. Eight are in the active ministry, and are pastors of churches. Three are practicing physicians, one is a dentist, one a college president, one engaged in religious and evangelistic work, two are college professors, and one is following mercantile life. Two of the number have ceased from earthly toil, Milton C. Reinhold, a promising member of the bar of Schuylkill Co. and Reuben C. Hollenbaugh, a teacher and student. The remaining members of the class are as follows :—

Rev. A. B. Bowser, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Danville, Pa.

Rev. J. S. Braker, pastor of the Scotch Plains Baptist Church of New Jersey.

Rev. W. H. Clipman, pastor of the Tabernacle Baptist Church of Harrisburg, Pa.

Rev. J. W. Griffith, pastor of the Sherburne Baptist Church of New York.

Rev. Geo. W. Hatch, pastor of the Wynn Memorial Baptist Church of Camden, N. J.

W. V. Hayes, M. D, a promising physician of New York City.

Rev. Lincoln Hulley, Ph. D., Professor of Hebrew and History in Bucknell University.

Rev. D. M. Jones, pastor of the Warrensville Baptist Church, Pennsylvania.

Prof. H. M. Kelly, Professor of Biology in Cornell College, Mt. Vernon, Iowa.

Rev. R. B. McDanel, pastor of the Oak Lane Baptist Church of Philadelphia, Pa.

Prof. J. D. Minick, President of Davenport College, Lenoir, N. C.

O. K. Pellman, D. D. S., a dentist of Mifflinburg, Pa.

P. J. Pontius, M. D., a successful physician of Philadelphia.

J. Y. Schreyer, Esq., Sec'y of the Milton Iron Company, Milton, Pa.

Rev. F. H. Senft, President of the Penna. Christian Alliance, residing in Philadelphia.

Rev. C. A. Soars, pastor of the Nicetown Baptist Church of Philadelphia.

W. M. Woodward, M. D., a well known physician of McKeesport, Pa.

EDITORIAL.

The College Student.—It would be difficult for the ordinary mind to conjecture for just what some men come to college. Apparently it is to run business enterprises, athletic organizations, religious and literary societies and a host of other things quite foreign to true, hard study. Altho a college is a good place in which to exercise business, religious or literary ability, yet it is a far better place for study; and training in these other things may be had elsewhere and at a less cost than a great sacrifice of time which should be devoted to classes. A college is the place in which to study, and to study those things prescribed in the curriculum. Now it is not to be supposed that one must absolutely taboo all things not found in text books, not at all; the claim is only made that the first duty of a college man is to his college studies. To just what extent outside matters may be indulged in with profit is a matter for individual choice. But again, if a college does not outline for its students such a course as will beget in its pursuing the most liberal training, then the college is at fault. Let us grant that the regular work of the college is most fitly suited to its ends, then if one fail to pursue this definite work the discredit falls upon him.

It seems in these days that people in general demand of a college of any pretense that it publish an annual, a monthly and a weekly periodical, that it maintain religious and literary societies, that it put forth long-trained athletes in contest and that it send to distant parts prohibition orators and other representatives. All of this is good in the line of advertising, but does it pay? If the training a student gets in stealing many hours for extra and extraneous work is the best possible training, why then it pays, otherwise it does not.

The one way in which to solve all problems of conflicting duties is to remember that the first duty of college student is to his studies.

COLLEGE NOTES.

The running track has been completed.

The street in front of the Seminary is being macadamized.

The class of 1900 has elected its L'Agenda board for next year.

The first "At Home" of the term was held at the Institute, Monday, May 2nd.

Bucknell has about a dozen representatives in the Twelfth Regiment at Mount Gretna.

President Harris gave anaddress before the students recently on our trouble with Spain.

Dr. Perrine has been engaged as one of the course lecturers at Peddie Institute this spring.

Hon. J. T. Hyatt, '91, late U. S. Vice Consul at Santiago de Cuba, lectured in Bucknell Hall May 2nd on Cuba.

Dr. Harris gave a patriotic and spirited address recently at the 33rd anniversary of Lee's surrender, celebrated by Post 52, G. A. R. of Lewisburg.

Prof. Riemer was elected a member of the Executive Council at a recent meeting of the teachers of German of this State held at the University of Pennsylvania.

New courses of study in elementary law and the theology in Browning, in the College, and instruction on the harp in the School of Music, will be offered hereafter.

The Academy athletes are training for their annual interscholastic meet. They have won the past two years and there is no reason why they should not again carry off the banner.

The annual sermon before the Christian Associations of the University was delivered in the Baptist church, April 17th, by the Rev. J. W. Ford, pastor of the Gethsemane Baptist church of Philadelphia.

The ball game with the Indians scheduled for the 14th has been cancelled by them. The game which was to have been played on this campus with State College April 16th has been twice postponed on account of bad weather.

The faculty has decided that hereafter no student will be recommended to the Board of Trustees for graduation if his average in the studies of the Junior and Senior years is below 8, and that no excuses will be accepted from any student for absences in the first week of each term.

Thursday evening, April 21st the debate between Bucknell and Allegheny College was held at Meadville, Pa. The question was "Resolved, That Hawaii should be annexed to the United States." Bucknell's representatives, Wiltbank, '98 and Dutton, 98 held the affirmative side. The judges were Prof. N. P. Gilman, Dr. Ken. C. Hayes, and Prof. S. P. Bates all of Meadville—Allegheny won.

An athletic meet with State College has been arranged to come off at that place May 29th. There will be two men for each event. The following events will constitute the program: 100 yard Dash, 220 yard Dash, 440 yard Dash, 120 yard Hurdle, 220 yard Hurdle, Pole Vault, Running High Jump, Running Broad Jump, Putting 16 lb. shot, throwing 16 lb. Hammer, Half-mile Run, Mile Run. Probably the Mile Walk, Bicycle Race and Relay Race will also be included.

REST AND PEACE.

I walked in worried mood one summer's day,
The earth in silent Peace before me lay.

Ah, how I envied those blue hills their Rest,
Who bear the dome of heaven on their breast !

The unpretending daisy at my feet
Smiled forth a Peace that raised my inward heat :

"Wherefore am I with carking thought accursed,
Alone rebellious, king of these—and worst ?

O speed the day when Death brings Rest and Peace,
Tho with it I, in all my Being, cease !"

"Not so !" The gentle voice of Reason spake,
"That pictured Peace is Motion. Man awake !

There is no Peace in Rest, there is no Rest,
But Peace is constant Motion toward the Best."

FIRST COMMENCEMENT OF THE UNIVERSITY AT LEWISBURG.

University at Lewisburg. First Annual Commencement. Wednesday, August 20th, 1851. So ran the thrilling announcement, and in response the hills and vales were resounding with excitement. The country roads were filled with all sorts of vehicles, and the "Raging Canal" had been for days all astir with voyagers hastening from far off Philadelphia to see and hear what was going on at Lewisburg. The like had been never seen before in the quiet town.

The procession forms in front of the old Baptist Church, on the site of the Music Hall. In its basement the college classes had been formed, and trained until the completion of the Academy, which with the western wing, recently finished, is all you see on College Hill.

Professors, Curators, Trustees, Graduating Classes and a mixed multitude start on the wonderful march ; so new, so strange. With all dignity they proceed along the board walk forming a dividing line between the grove and the cultivated land, where now you see professors' houses, on up to the Academy, whose upper floor was used for chapel service and for Commencement Hall. A portion of the great crowd finds entrance. A handsome arch of evergreen is sprung over the large platform, and beautifully festooned above the heads of the speakers is the word Ducimus—we lead the way—wrought in artificial flowers kindly furnished by a friend in Philadelphia.

After the usual preliminaries, and an appropriate piece of music by the choir, entitled "Hail Smiling Morn," J. Merrill Linn pronounced the Salutatory Oration. Washington Barnhurst, spoke of "The Blessings of an Accident," R.M. Fish discussed the "Basis of Free Government" and Geo. Osman Ide gave a word picture of "Reformers." After music by the famous Ringgold Band, J. M. Lyons dwelt on "Achievements of Mind" and Henry Pomerene gave emphasis to the thought. "The Light of Authorship Unquenchable," and then came the Valedictory by J. Howard Castle.

After music by the Band we had "Remarks to the Graduating Class, by the Acting President." So modestly did the grand old man put it. O what an address! As a natural philosopher he had led us to scan the Starry Heavens, and as an accomplished linguist he had taught us to scan the odes of Horace. Now all is changed, the fine classical face becomes that of a tender father. As a father he warned us and exhorted us to press on with a purpose. We wept, how could we help it ? A learned gentleman remarked "it was more like a funeral than a Commencement." So be it. We were not ashamed. We loved the noble old Doctor. The Hon. James Buchanan, afterward President of the U. S., was on the platform, and made the motion for the conferring of degrees on the class. Then followed music by the choir—"God be with you—Farewell." I think I may say, and that is to say enough—I believe Robt. Lowry even at that early day was the inspiration of the piece.

Now followed a very scholarly Inaugural Address by Prof. Bliss.

The First Class used no cap and gown, neither did the professors. The boys wore white vests, black cutaway coats and black pants. They wore as a badge a blue artificial rose on their left lapel.

On that memorable occasion we were much interested in hearing Dr. Taylor pronounce in Latin Horatio Gates Jones to be Doctor of Divinity—"Sacrae Theologiae Doctorem esse."

The professors on the platform were S. W. Taylor, G. R. Bliss, G. W. Anderson, C. S. James and Alfred Taylor.

Dr. Taylor spoke his final Farewell, and Dr. Howard Malcom took the reins with a few remarks. A "parting hymn," and all was over. The First Class had graduated.

WAR CLOUDS IN THE SIXTIES AT LEWISBURG.

October 5, 1860, that dark day when Governor Gist, of South Carolina, dispatched by private messengers his famous confidential circular letter to the several governors of the cotton states, was the birthday of the war between the states. The responses received from Florida, Alabama and Mississppi assured the vote of secession by South Carolina, December 20, 1860. Mississippi, Florida, Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana and Texas followed within six weeks. The other states came on in the wake considerably later and not without reluctance. More than a full average generation has come and gone since October 1860. By what title may we in this new generation, glance back to a third with sober fancy that we shall encounter a vivid recollection? Even though one age overlap its neighbors, time brings entangling cobwebs to our memories. We recall our dreams and imagine them to be recollections, monuments of facts.

Poor, innocent, worn out James Buchanan, one of the mischances of a republic, as honest and loyal as he was weak, had been driving the stage coach of state with slack and loosening rein through the last months of his administration. After the secession of the first seven states, there came the organization of the new confederacy, February 8, 1861. Plots and conspiracies deepened ; rumors were followed by ominous threatenings. And yet few of the wisest men of the North anticipated that the storm would break. Even Mr. Seward and General Scott were willing to let the seven states go in peace, hoping to keep the rest, believing that the recreants would soon come back as suppliant prodigals. Secession would run its course and disappear like an April shower. But early on the morning of that first black Friday, April 12, 1861, a shot was fired from old Fort Johnson that was heard around the world. Fort Sumpter was cannonaded from all sides. Her walls were broken, her interior buildings hopelessly on fire from hot shot, the little garrison of 128 men threatened with starvation and reenforcements strangely failed. Saturday, April 13, Major Anderson capitulated. The next day was Sunday. President Lincoln, aroused in the majesty of his strength, summoned his cabinet and confronted them with his call for 75,000 volunteers. Monday morning took the call to the nation and the nation answered. Lewisburg had been a college town for twenty years. The culture, the conservatism and the patriotism that sprung up with higher institutions of learning were shared by the little village of 3,000 people and all the region round about. Ten companies of volunteers went out from our inland town before the war was over. The first was recruited, transported to Harrisburg and mustered into the service of the United States in five days after the call for troops went out. The recruiting office was Chamberlain's store at the corner of Fifth and Market streets. But the fire burned everywhere. Young men came home from work Monday evening to be told by their mothers that other young men, their comrades or neighbors, had enlisted. Before bed time these young men had themselves enlisted. Company G, Fourth Pennsylvania, Captain J. Wesley Chamberlain, seemed to spring up like the five hundred warriors of Roderick Dhu, from the earth. J. Merrill Linn and James Chamberlain, Bucknell alumni, were among the officers of this first company and Charles R. Evans, a student in the college, enlisted as a private soldier. The boys were sent away with proper patriotic demonstration, processions, music, speeches. We all marched with them across the old Market Street bridge to Montandon, breaking step, lest under the strain of solid tramp the spans might break. Open lumber cars were the best means of transportation the Pennsylvania Railroad could then furnish in the stress of the emergency. But patriotism was not crying for luxury and the new soldiers sat down on planks stretched across the cars. With cheers and tears, as the train steamed out, we bade them adieu.

Two months later Company D, Fifth Pennsylvania Reserves, went out. Thomas Chamberlain was the captain, a brother of Wesley, an alumnus of Bucknell and first honor man of the class of 1858. Two other companies followed before the year was over. These were commanded, as I recall, by Captains J. Merrill Linn and Shorkley. In August 1862 still another company was recruited, commanded at the first by Captain John A. Owens and afterwards by Captain Charles R. Evans. This was Company E, 142 Pennsylvania. Andrew Gregg Tucker and Thomas R. Orwig, just graduated from the University, were among the officers. Orwig died in a few weeks from disease following exposure; Tucker fell at Gettysburg the next summer.

In early September of 1862 came the first invasion of our state. There was a call for emergency men. Lewisburg sent out two companies. Even the old men shouldered muskets. President Loomis, then fifty-three years old, enlisted as a private soldier but was afterward promoted to be chaplain. Our best citizens entered the ranks, leaving important business interests for camp life. Professor James was a sergeant of Company B, Third Pennsylvania. Men were scarce in our town after the minute men had gone to the front.

The climax of feeling came with Lee's invasion in June and July 1863. Lewisburg then sent out three companies. They were all of the Twenty-eighth Pennsylvania, commanded by Col. James Chamberlain. Company A was composed of college boys. Not a college student remained at school. Cobwebs curtained the windows of the west wing and hinges of the main building grew stiff with rust. We sometimes thought we could almost hear the guns of Gettysburg. Sunday, July 5, was a memorable day. The women and children all over town came home from church in the morning to spend the rest of the day in scraping lint for the wounded. We knew that it was a great battle and that our boys were engaged but how many of them we could but guess. Who might need our lint and over whose graves we should shed our tears we could only fear. The pastors of the Lewisburg churches were noble men. Some of them like our own efficient Mr. Mirick went down to the front to recover the bodies of the dead. Others like dear old Dr. Dickson of the Presbyterian church sent forth from their pulpits columbiads of patriotism. I remember his accomplished wife that July Sunday. As together we scraped the lint, she spoke of the needs of the hour and the call to prayer to the God of right who could bring us the conquest we believed must come. Later on came definite news of the great victory and our own loss. Men gathered on the street corners as others read the newspapers. Letters from the boys at the front passed from family to family amid solemn tears. Lieutenant Tucker, we learned, had been severely wounded three times during the first day's fight. On the morning of the fifth he had died. Major Thomas Chamberlain, then of the One Hundred and Fiftieth Pennsylvania, had also been fearfully hurt in the shoulder. Captain Evans too was wounded. The three young officers were together in the seminary hospital and for four days in the hands of the enemy. The Major was able during the progress of the battle to climb the steep, narrow, winding stairs leading to the seminary cupola and after taking observations bring down report to his comrades on the ground floor. The result seemed uncertain till the rebels finally retreated on the morning of Sunday. It was yet dim daylight when the major came down with the report. Young Tucker's face was even then pale and his eye glazed in death. Mid all his agony he had manifested keen interest and bright hope for victory. Chamberlain kneeled on the floor beside the dying boy and shouted in his ear the glad news; but it came too late to the nineteen year old officer whose life had been given to help in bringing it about. The two wounded comrades managed to dig a shallow grave outside the hospital. Together they laid the body in it, wrapped only in his soldier blanket; covering it with earth they marked his name and regiment on an improvised head board. His mother and pastor with Professor Bliss were thus able to find the body a few days later. I was one of those who met them at Montandon. The burial case lay crosswise on the platform of the baggage car. There were none at home to give military honors at the burial. But followed by those who loved him, we laid him away on the slope that provides Lewisburg with its cemetery. The Lewisburg Post of the Grand Army of the Republic bears his noble name.

In the summer of 1864 came the third and last invasion; with it another call for emergency men. Again our boys responded. Ten of the students enlisted in Captain Bruce Lambert's Independent Cavalry. Our term was one hundred days but they kept us more than four months. Theophilus E. Clapp was the first sergeant of our company and LeRoy Stephens commissary sergeant. Hiram MacGowan was a corporal and among the private soldiers were Chaplain Thomas A. Gill now of the navy, Dr. John B. Probasco, Professor Clement B. Lowe of the College of Pharmacy, the late Hon. Chas. S. Wolfe and the writer. Most if not all of us came back to our classes in November and having made up lost studies graduated at the end of the course.

But in all the clouds of war in the sixties at Lewisburg nothing was so bright as when they rolled away in the fall of Richmond, Lee's surrender and final victory in the spring of 1865. How the town turned out to welcome our heroes home! Their faces were bronzed, their garments were worn, their step was regular as the quick tick of a clock and agile with the first breath of home. We cheered them, we feasted them, we gave them garlands of flowers, we loaded them with congratulations and graved their names on the tablets of our souls.

J. S. JAMES.

COMMENCEMENT AT DISTRICT NUMBER ONE.

District Number One was about to witness its first Commencement exercises. The square sod school house, standing on the dusty prairie, with its roof of sod and narrow windows, without a floor but containing improved furniture, was suitably decorated for the occasion. Near the teacher's desk stood an organ borrowed from a neighboring ranch. Appropriate mottoes, made by glueing grains of last year's corn on remnants of paper boxes, adorned the plasterless walls. In the corners were placed bouquets of dried wheat and oats colored by the sky-blue prairie tulip, freshly gathered, and surmounted by cat-tails from the neighboring slough.

A bench for those pupils who were to take part in the exercises, was placed along the wall back of the teacher's desk, and above it was rudely draped a representation of the American flag.

The red May sun was still above the western horizon when the patrons, pupils, and invited guests began to arrive. Large wagons filled with little people, and large people on small horses came in from every direction, and having tethered their horses, they ate their luncheon in groups, chatting gaily with one another.

As the short summer twilight was passing into darkness, the teacher entered the building and lit the lamps previously placed upon the desks and here and there against the walls. The illumined windows gave signal that the time for beginning the exercises had arrived, and in a few minutes the audience was seated in the building.

What an assemblage it was! The yellow-haired Swede sat by the side of the fiery-bearded Irish emigrant. The tall, shaggy Russian by the short, stocky German. The cow herder with his Stetson hat, high-heeled boots, and clanking spurs shuffled into his place. By his side sat the old and stooped interpreter and guide who claimed to have been in that country even before the war-like Sioux. There was the retired army officer who had resigned his command at the fort and who numbered his cattle by the thousands. There, too, was the widow of a deceased member of a president's cabinet of ante-bellum times, now devoted to missionary work ; also, one who had been notorious in the Star Route transactions, the country doctor, and ourselves.

The pupils took their places in order of size on the bench that had been prepared for them. The legs of the small ones dangled in the air. The large pupils were uncomfortable, being suddenly conscious of possessing hands and feet that were painfully prominent and that could not be stowed away. The teacher, proud of her importance, announced the numbers in a loud, shrill voice.

How proudly each little fellow stepped forward, bowed and recited his selection ! How the eyes of the parent glistened as the oration with proper gesture was delivered. It was the proudest moment of one mother's life, when her daughter recited "Archie Dean" dramatically, without forgetting a word. Applause greeted each performance. What did it matter even though the more timid ones stumbled and had to be helped over the empty places that their memory for the moment absolutely refused to supply with a bridge. District Number One was as proud of these first exercises as the foremost University in the land of its most distinguished Commencement.

An orchestra furnished music for the occasion. It consisted of a fiddle in conjunction, but not always in harmony with the organ. The overture was a schottische, and the interludes were jigs, reels, waltzes, the music of old time favorite songs and sacred melodies. The audience kept time by drumming on the desks with their hands, while their feet tapped noiselessly on the sanded floor. How they enjoyed it and admired the skill of the players. It reminded some of bygone days; a whispered reminiscence brought a smile or a tear, as some far off incident was recalled. All were sorry when the last selection had been played.

The final number was "The Bridge" sung by the teacher to an accompaniment on the organ. It was a new rendering of that sublimely thoughtful and meditative poem. The sublimity and quiet of the thought was expressed in a manner suited to western progress. The bridge rattled. The moon sprang up from behind the church tower and frowned. The wind of the night shrieked, the storm howled, and an ominous silence followed while the singer gathered strength for the second onset, and the herculean efforts of the singer ended only with the last verse, and the disturbed elements were allowed to regain their equilibrium.

After a pause the teacher addressed her pupils. She spoke feelingly of the pleasant year just ended, and hopefully of the future. Each pupil bore away as a memento, a card with their own names and that of the teacher written thereon to be kept for many a year. Finally at a signal from the teacher the school rose and sang that glorious patriotic song "America" and the first closing exercises of District Number One had ended successfully.

THE EMERGENCY COMPANY OF 1863.

In June 1863 the college doors were closed for the first and only time in its history. In the old reading room on the second floor of the North wing the students read of the John Brown raid, heard the poundings on Sumpter, felt the thrill of Lincoln's call to arms. On the bulletin board on the first floor the students read of the first Bull Run defeat. Some of the students left their classes and put on the blue, others after graduation turned their faces to the enemy. When Governor Curtin sounded the alarm in 1863 that Lee had entered Pennsylvania the students could stand the strain no longer. The call came in the morning. That afternoon no studying was done. The Seniors were reading Tacitus. Meeting Dr. Bliss at the hour of recitation they had his blessing on their resolve to go. During the afternoon friends in town made haversacks for the boys and filled them. On the next morning about nine they formed in the Lewisburg Streets, and amid blessings and tears they marched to Montandon and took the cars. We traveled in freight cars, with rough board seats to Harrisburg. We slept the first night on the floor of the rotunda in the capitol building. We had no blankets under us, no coverings over us, but we slept as well as the disorderly Democratic Convention, then in session in the building, engaged in passing disloyal resolutions, would permit. The next night we slept in the Baptist meeting house. We were mustered into the United States service. Of the more than thirty regiments then formed only three had the courage to pass under the control of the general government. The Twenty-eighth went in to serve where ordered. It may comfort the heart of any member of the Twenty-eighth that if need comes he is entitled to a pension. Within a month past one of the Company A boys applied for a pension for disabilities incurred in that campaign. Our Colonel was James Chamberlain, a Bucknell man. We were in the place of honor on the right of the line and first in marching order in the brigade consisting of the 28th, 29th and 30th regiments. We belonged to the division of Maj. Gen. Couch. After several days we received our uniforms, guns and equipments. Our Captain was T. R. Jones, a Bucknell man who had seen service, First Lieut. D. M. Nesbit, a Bucknell man, Second Lieut., Professor James. I have in my possession the old muster roll by which I assigned men to their duties, standing guard, serving on detached duty. The names may be of interest in these days.

Sergeants : O. P. Eaches, Cox, J. B. Hutton, Ross Ward, Robert Townsend.

Corporals : Blair, Ritner, David McDermond, Frederic, Wolf, Henry Witmer, H. B. Garner, Jos. Sheppard.

Musicians : Kincaid, T. M. Shanafelt.

Privates : Barnhart, Bobb, George Bowman, George Brensinger, W. W. Case, Bower, Asher Cook, J. W. Custis, Derr, Donachy, Fegley, Gebhart, T. A. K. Gessler, N. Giddings, T. A. Gill, H. Grier, George Hall, Henderson, Hess, Hill, J. S. Hutson, James, Johnson, Krape, D. P. Leas, Freeman Loomis, Lotz, G. B. Low, Leinbach, Martz, W. R. Maul, A. W. Mettler, Overholt, Philips, J. B. Probasco, E. H. Ranney, J. Read, O. Read, W. H. Runyan, David Rue, Schaffer, Schwartz, Joseph Smith, Smull, O. W. Spratt, Startzel, Leroy Stephens, C. A. Stone, Straw, Truitt, VanValzah, William Winter, William Wolverton, Wolf, I. C. Wynn, Yeager.

There were 75 of us all told, a few joining us who were not members of the college. Some of these have been mustered out of life, having done a good work Among these are Hall, Runyon, Witmer, Wynn, Giddings, Custus, McDermond.

Their bones are dust, their swords are rust,
Their souls are with the Lord, we trust.

Our first place of service was in constructing and manning the earth works on the south bank of the Susquehanna at Harrisburg. Here we pitched our tents. Having no carpets the regiment borrowed the entire stock of hay from a farmer near by. He protested in vain. It is reported that some of the boys borrowed some poultry also but of this there is no proof at this late date. At this time our company was detached from the regiment and assigned to guarding the R. R. bridge across the river north of Harrisburg. Here we occupied a block house built in the old style with the upper story projecting and with openings for muskets. Here we slept on our arms expecting all the time an attack from the enemy. On the top of the mountain we built a fort of stones and trees. If any adventurous man should visit there to-day, in all likelihood, he would find the remains of the fort yet existing. When the enemy went South we were ordered to rejoin our regiment. We marched to Harrisburg July 4 and took the train for Carlisle. From this point onward the R, R. track was torn up. On piles of ties the tracks had been twisted into all possible shapes. Carlisle looked like desolation, torn by cannon balls and ravaged by fire. We marched from this point on our way down the Cumberland Valley. We at first started for Gettysburg but our course was changed. It was hard work for us. We carried our tents, our baggage, one hundred rounds of cartridges and ten days rations. At one point on this journey we were in momentary expectation of meeting the Confederates. But having heard of our approach they prudently kept out of our way. We were the first troops that had passed town the Valley since the Confederate invasion. We had a royal welcome. Near Chambersburg the people brought us all the delicacies of their homes. The men had largely gone away and the women were harvesting the crops. In barns, in freight stations, in the woods, in the open fields we camped at night. Looking back after more than thirty years, never did sleep seem sweeter than when camping in the open field with no tent but the sky, our shoes and knapsacks for pillows and our blankets around us. At one time our tents were blown over at night and we were storm swept. At Shippensburg we acted as provost guard for some time. We made a prohibitory law for the town, borrowed horses for the government giving receipts for them, impressing men into service for work, taking care of the disorderly soldiers that in thousands swarmed through that neighborhood while we were there. Our home at this time was in an old school house. The Phi Kappa boys in the company found here some resident fraternity men and shared their hospitality. Our longest journey on any one day was sixteen miles. At this place we had charge of a large group of Confederate prisoners captured at Gettysburg. A whole train load of the wounded at Gettysburg was in our charge to transport to the hospitals in Phila. It was a touching and horrible sight, that of a train load of maimed men. Relieved here we marched on until we reached Hagerstown, with its sullen Confederate look, not a flag in sight, shut doors and windows. Here we rejoined our brigade, which in our absence had had one skirmish with the enemy. We encamped here for some time, looking for work further South but our work was nearly done. We slowly retraced our journeys Northward and were mustered out at Harrisburg. It furnishes many pleasant memories for the after days. There was no fierce and deadly conflict. Had there been I think that Company A. would have faced the enemy with courage. We knew what we were doing when we took the oath to the government. We were not boasters. We were not cowards. It was not all solemnity in camp. About the fire at night there were pleasant gatherings, talks of the past and the future. On our marchings we sang "John Brown's body," "When this cruel war is over" and other taking songs that beguiled our way. Corporal Townsend had a favorite hymn, "I love to steal awhile away."

Whenever he was tempted to seize hold of anything in passing he would start the hymn and sing in this style,

"I love to steal,"—

and instantly something would go along with company A.

It was not much that we did, but we did what we were told to do. We had no Thermopylæ in our campaign, but we built forts, guarded bridges, went on journeys at night time, awaited the coming of the foe. The class of '63 has been the envy of all the classes since that time, in that it is the only class that escaped the Senior examination. One by one we came back to college. The Seniors came back, most of them a few days before the commencement to extemporize a graduating address. We presented a ragged appearance as we came, clothing torn and soiled and shoes almost worn out. Some of the students did not return until the day of commencement. Blessings be on the students of Bucknell who loved their country and tried to do their duty in the times that stirred and strained men's souls. The boys of 1863 salute the boys of 1898.

THE WAR EXCITEMENT IN THE SIXTIES.

PRES. JOHN HOWARD HARRIS.

The present interest in the schools arising from the Spanish war recalls the greater excitement in the early sixties. Under the call of President McKinley, Pennsylvania furnishes about 11,000 men; under the several calls of President Lincoln, Pennsylvania furnished in the war for the Union 338,000. The population of the state in 1860 was 2,900,000; in 1898, according to the Governor's estimate, it is about 5,900,000. If then as many proportionally entered the service in 1898, as did in the sixties, there would be about 687,000 who would enlist. We can conceive, then, what was the intensity of the excitement during the Civil War, if we imagine more than sixty times as many men going to the front as went a month ago.

Besides, the enemy was not hard to find in those days. In all, over one thousand engagements occurred, in which there was a loss of life from a few, up to such a loss as at Gettysburg where 3,070 were killed and over 14,000 wounded. During those years over 67,000 were killed in battle on the Union side; over 43,000 died of wounds; nearly 200,000 died of disease. These are figures now, but then they stood for our friends and acquaintances, brothers and schoolmates. The 55th Pennsylvania, for instance, numbered about fifteen hundred in January, 1864; in October, when I visited the regiment, it numbered one hundred and thirty men, commanded by a lieutenant.

I was in Pittsburgh during the progress of the Battle of the Wilderness, and the intensity of excitement in the throng which gathered in increasing numbers as the hours passed, until it became a multitude, is beyond language to portray. Extras were issued constantly, containing as received lists of the killed and wounded in Pittsburgh regiments, and men would wave bills, and shout offers of one dollar, five dollars, ten dollars for a copy of the paper which contained the name of a son or brother. Some who were fortunate in securing a paper would read the lists of names, but the throng would not patiently wait for the lists to be read, and would insist with shouts and threats on the reader finding straightway the lists of several regiments at once. Rough men would curse the stupidity of the reader who could not find what they wanted to hear. Under such conditions most persons would get their paper out of sight and themselves away as soon as possible. The same thing was occurring in various degrees in all centres of population, and the interest was extended to the little groups at every cottage door. When the news passed through the nation in that strange electrical way in which news propagates itself through a people that a great battle had occurred there was not much sleeping on the part of "those who had a son or brother there." Telegraphs were not nearly so common in 1861 as at present and it was no unusual thing for men to ride twenty-five or fifty miles, or even go on foot that distance to some centre of intelligence, in order to get the latest news from the front. On account of this intense strain, the health of many broke down, and the number of insane was greatly increased.

Of course, under such stress of excitement, studies were pursued in Academies and Colleges with difficulty. In one Academy, for instance, the principal raised a company, under the call for volunteers, and all the students eligible, except one, enlisted. In the following year the principal with about all students went to the front; the following year all the students of suitable age and health enlisted; and the same was repeated in 1864. The schools were almost depleted of students of military age.

COMMENCEMENT DURING THE WAR.

When the Institute Class of '63 entered their Senior year, the war was on, and many of our friends had already given their lives to sustain their country's honor.

The seat of the war was far away, and as young school girls we studied, amused ourselves, and sometimes wrote a letter to a soldier boy.

About a month before the usual Commencement Day, on Monday, June 15th, a despatch was received: "Lee's rebel cavalry are making a raid into Pennsylvania The Militia are called out." This brought the war very close to us, and faces paled as we thought of the future Soon our hands were busy making haversacks and filling them with good things to eat for the company of student soldiers, who were to be a part of the emergency men

On the morning of June 17th they started for the war. All the girls in town, as well as the Institute girls, walked to Montandon to see them off. From an old diary I find: "Two Companies left this morning, and Captain Jones' Company of students. All the College and Academy students enlisted except seven, one a "sick" copperhead, the others wounded, too delicate, and too young." On June 18th Militia Companies left morning and evening. Many parents becoming alarmed by the danger from Confederate invasion had called their daughters home, so that by this time there were but seven boarders at the Institute, and it looked as if there would not be any Commencement. We thought and talked more of what we would do if Lee's army came this way ; where we would bury our valuables; who would have an empty cistern where our Lares and Penates could rest secure during an invasion; than of Butler's Analogy, Intellectual Philosophy, or Natural Theology.

Sunday, July 5th, after the news of the Battle of Gettysburg the congregations of the various churches were dismissed and every one worked all day, making bandages, scraping lint, collecting blankets and other comforts for the wounded soldiers. Amidst all this confusion, we wrote our essays, and passed our examinations. Our programs were printed with the Goddess of Liberty in the national colors on the outside, and most of our essays were on the times in which we were living. The girls were all here, and our Commencement was assured, but would our class brothers, who had enlisted for the defense of their country, be able to get here to hold their Commencement?

On Wednesday afternoon, July 29, when our graduating exercises were well under way, there seemed to be some confusion at the entrance of Commencement Hall; in a few moments the large head and broad shoulders of "Energy" Townsend appeared in view, following him up the steps were some of our class bothers; this was the signal for such a burst of enthusiasm as to give no doubt of the welcome home to the brave soldiers. By the next day enough men were here to insure graduation exercises, and the University Class of '63 received their diplomas and were numbered with the alumni.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO CONVOCATION.

The University of Chicago did not grow but was made with deliberation. In the plan, many features that have become traditional at other institutions were discarded, and among them the annual Commencement as it is elsewhere known. That which took its place is known as the "Convocation" which is in a real sense a "commencement" of school work. To understand its place, we must remember that the school year is divided into four quarters of twelve weeks each. These quarters always begin on the first of the month, that is, on the first day of January, April, July and October, with a week or ten days of vacation between them. The Convocation exercises are held on the first day of each quarter, and a student may graduate or take his higher degree at any one of these four convocation days. Examinations for admission, as well as for any degree, are held during the previous quarter; in case of higher degrees often over a month before Convocation. Let us suppose that we are new students, and have gone through the red tape of registration, the first University exercises we attend are what would elsewhere be the Commencement exercises. If we arrive in the summer, they are held in the open air or in a large tent; if not, in the large Auditorium, eight miles farther down the city.

At the appointed hour, there is a stately "Processional," the order of which is stated in detail on the program, viz., the President and Orator, the Board of Trustees, the various faculties, and the candidates for degrees. All these take their places on the platform—about two hundred in number—except the candidates for degrees. Every one who appears on the stage, or is in any way connected with the exercises, must wear cap and gown. The gowns of the faculty are expected to show by various stripes and colors their academic degree and rank. While much of the ceremonial which is intended to add dignity and pomp and a certain scholarly air to such occasions seems more or less artificial, it is due to the youth of the University as compared to institutions with their traditional customs of a century. But lack of age or long-standing customs does not worry any part of the great city of the west; for what they have not they think they can buy or make for themselves—even ancestors and traditions. The University has nearly caught the spirit of the city. They do not live in the past, but in the present and still more in the future. Whatever they may be or have been, they feel that theirs will be the dominant city in the Mississippi Valley, which is destined to exert the most potent social and political influence on the continent. And they are right. "And we," says the University, "will be the greatest educational power in this great city and even the whole valley." And they are also right. However much certain innovations may be derided, they are daily becoming more firmly established and giving more of a peculiar character and individuality to the University.

But to return to the Convocation. One of the principal features is the address of the Convocation orator. The graduates do not speak. The object is always to secure some one of the most noted men of this country or Europe to make the address. Thus some of the orators during the writer's attendance, were, Dr. Bruce, of Glasgow, Dr. J. Henry Burrows, Chauncey Depew, Pres. Seth Low, Prince Serge Walskonski of Russia, and Lady Aberdeen.

After the address, the President makes a quarterly statement of the condition of the University, its future policy, announcement of appointments or promotions, etc., together with discussions of educational questions, which excite interest far beyond the walls of the University.

Finally comes the granting of degrees. The deans of the various schools call all candidates to the stage, first those taking the bachelor's degree, then the masters and finally the doctors. The last, while a little more formal, is quite a simple matter. The candidates take their places before the president who pronounces some Latin which no one understands—we suppose it is the contents of the diploma—and, then the examiner throws about their shoulders a hood signifying that they are now entitled to add Ph. D. to their names.

The Convocation exercises are now over. Belonging to the Convocation day, is a morning reception by the President to candidates for a higher degree; also Vesper Services on the Sunday following Convocation; and, recently, a meeting on Convocation Day of the University congregation. This is a body consisting, in addition to certain officers of the University, of all who have taken the degree of Doctor of Philosophy—provided they pay the annual fee. Honorary members may also be elected. To be sure, it is hard to state just what this body is for. At present it seems to be in the position of the old Continental Congress, provided one strips that body of the few powers it had. It will no doubt become a body membership in which will be considered quite an honor, and as the University grants no honorary degrees, it will no doubt take this way of bestowing due honor upon ex-presidents and ex-governors and others.

EDITORIAL.

The "Mirror"—In accordance with the prevailing custom, the "MIRROR" Board desires to say a few words about itself as it sends forth this its last number. As stated in the first issue the intention was to revive the "MIRROR" and establish it as a College Journal; further the object was to clear off the debt to which we fell heir and to pay the debt we would contract in doing so. Much has already been accomplished. The "MIRROR" has been revivified, enlarged and issued punctually on the tenth of each month; all the back indebtedness has been paid off and all of our own debt will probably be cleared up if the kind friends to whom we have been sending bills for some time will favor us with the price of their subscription.

In the present time of war enthusiasm it was thought advisable to make this Commencement issue something of a war number, even though the locals and personals should suffer. All the articles were solicited and were furnished by those who could make more money at other things, and yet were willing to do something gratuitously for Old Bucknell; it is hoped that this kindness will be appreciated by the readers.

"A LITTLE JOURNEY IN THE WORLD."

We had been in Burma one month, and a very busy month it was.

We were told it was advisable to get away from the heat and dust of the plains as soon as possible, as the "hot season" had already begun. Missionaries have been accustomed to spend the hot season on Mount Kserdo, twenty miles away. One of the houses would be vacant this season and we considered ourselves fortunate in finding a house ready for use and planned to occupy it.

Shopping in Burma differs greatly from shopping in America. When we reached England we found all the stores are shops, when we came to Burma we found only bazaars. As our facilities for bazaaring on Kserdo were limited to rice and chicken it was necessary to carry a full supply of tinned food with us. We ordered groceries from Rangoon 166 miles away. As sometimes happens, our order at this time was not filled as promptly as we hoped it would be.

In making a journey to Kserdo it is necessary to send messengers ahead to provide boats, carts, and coolies at the points where they will be needed. Having made these arrangements we were anxious to start when we said we would.

Goods were all packed, the boatman sat on the back veranda impatiently suggesting that if we could not go at once it would be no use to start that day. Everyone was waiting for the train that we hoped would bring the groceries.

Then surveying the pile of luggage, that kept increasing from time to time, the boatman declared it was too much for his boat to carry. He was finally persuaded to load his boat and our journey began.

The ride on the river was cool and restful. At this season the river is very low. We were frequently stranded on sandbars. The men all climbed overboard and helped to get the boat afloat again. Unexpected depressions in the river bed caused frequent surprises, and laughter greeted the unfortunate ones who had not made provision for such emergencies.

We reached a landing place about eight o'clock in the evening, and looked about for the cartsmen who were to have met us. They could not be found.

After consulting our Karen teacher, Mg Lay, it was decided we had passed the village where we should have stopped; our wisest plan would be to hire carts to take us back to the right place. The Burmans in this village were having a feast and were a little tardy, so it was ten o'clock before the carts were ready.

The roads we traveled led through tiger jungles and robbers were reported in the vicinity. As guns inspire a deep degree of respect in this country, it was decided best to keep our guns where we could reach them.

When all was ready, we mounted our ponies and the procession started. It was so dark we could not see the road and thought it best to ride behind the carts while a man carried a lantern ahead.

After an hour's journey we reached the village where we should have landed. The snorting of the oxen informed us we were near an encampment. They proved to be the Karen cartmen who had come to meet us.

The luggage was transferred to their carts and we moved on again.

Already the road seemed three times as long as we had been told it was. The Karens had fallen asleep in spite of the hard jolting of the clumsy carts over the rough roads.

The Indian cook who had been over the road several times was the only one on guard. On being asked,—"Are we nearly there?" he replied, "Oh, no! plenty much far yet Mama." He was quite right, it was plenty much far. Not until half past three in the morning did we reach the village at the foot of the mountain where we should have been at eight in the evening. This village had a nice large chapel and we rested in it until daylight.

At this place we packed our luggage in cooley baskets for the climb up the mountain. The coolies had all gone when we started. We trusted to Mg Lay to guide us. We had not gone far when we found we had made another mistake. The mountain had been burnt over, the path could not be found and Mg Lay did not know in which direction to go. We wandered around until we found a party of Karens and one of them kindly volunteered to direct us. The way led through primeval forests over a rough mountain footpath easy enough to these mountain people but difficult to the uninitiated. On parting with our guide we offered him money but he refused it with a surprised look as if such an idea had never occurred to him.

This was our first experience in jungle travel. On reaching our house we were so tired we did not want to move or speak. But we enjoyed our stay there and instead of suffering from the depressing heat in town we came back to Toungoo strong and well.

EX-PRESIDENT JUSTIN R. LOOMIS, PH.D., LL. D.

THE FACULTY'S MINUTE.

Rev. Justin Rolph Loomis, Ph.D., LL.D., Ex-President of this University, passed from the scene of his labors on Commencement Day, June 22nd, 1898, at 1.20 o'clock, P. M. The Faculty of Bucknell University desire to bear testimony to his eminent services to the cause of higher education, in this and other commonwealths, and to his distinguished labors in behalf of this institution. They, therefore, place on record this minute of his life-history, and of his connection with this University, over which he presided nearly twenty-three years.

Justin Rolph Loomis was born in Bennington, N. Y., Aug. 21st, 1810. He was a descendant of Joseph Loomis, who came from Braintree, England, in 1638. At the age of seventeen he entered Hamilton Institute—now Colgate University, for his collegiate preparation. He was graduated from Brown University in the class of 1835. After teaching for one year in the State Agricultural School of Rhode Island, he was called to be tutor, and soon afterwards, Professor of Chemistry and Natural History, at Waterville College, Maine, now Colby University. He was married January 16, 1838, to Miss Sarah Anne Freeman, of Richfield Springs, N. Y. Our esteemed associate, Professor Freeman Loomis, Ph. D., born in Waterville, Me., survives this union. Mrs. Loomis died March 3, 1852; and, soon after, Professor Loomis undertook an expedition to South America, involving a careful geological examination of Bolivia, Peru, and part of Chile. Returning to New York, he spent some time in revising his text books of Physiology and Geology previously published while he was yet at Waterville. In 1854 he was married to Miss Mary Gilbert and in the same year was called to be Professor of Natural Science in this University. The same year he received the doctorate of Philosophy from the same source. After the retirement of President Howard Malcom, D. D., in 1857, Dr. Loomis gave instruction in Philosophy and Morals and in 1858 he was chosen to fill the vacant presidency. In this year he received the degree of LL. D., from the University of Rochester.

President Loomis' inaugural address upon the "Collegiate System of the United States" was a notable and impressive discussion of a great theme. He considered "the distinctive peculiarity of the American people, regarded as a force and an excellence, to be Individuality. The Collegiate System furnished : I, a culture that reaches the general character ; II, instruction that embraces the elements of human knowledge and III, this culture and instruction may reach, more or less directly, the entire people." He rejoiced in the multitude of colleges scattered throughout the land, and in their control by the various Christian denominations.

Dr. Loomis brought to the presidency of the youthful institution New England ideals of College life and method ; eminent personal qualifications trained by superior advantage and tested by successful experience. The New Science had a mission in Pennsylvania, and he was its apostle. His wide acquaintance with men, eminent in religious and educational life, his extensive travel and wide sympathies, his untiring industry, and, above all, his powerful personality, had marked him as the coming man. This was cheerfully recognized by the eminent teachers composing the first faculty of the University, men who had devoted themselves to the welfare of the institution, and who were superior to self promotion. Their foresight was fully justified. The trained scientist had keen appreciation of the other departments of instruction, a wise comprehension of all the units of the curriculum, their due proportions and inter-relations.

The first work of the new administration was to raise thirty thousand dollars for buildings. But it was impossible to foresee the Civil War of 1861–65, or to estimate its effect upon the college. Yet fresh from the excitement and distress of that troublous time, fresh from the chaplaincy of the 28th Pennsylvania Volunteers, and the return of the students to their books, President Loomis threw himself into the work of raising the one hundred thousand dollar endowment fund of 1864–65. Troublesome debts were paid, the chair of Rhetoric was endowed by Mr. John P. Crozer, and the funds of the University were put upon a solid foundation.

During the five succeeding years President Loomis devoted his leisure to the erection of the Baptist church edifice. He drew all the plans, supervised the work of construction, supplied an incredible amount of manual labor and handicraft, and contributed over six thousand dollars in money to emphasize his convictions of the need of such an edifice for the church and the college

During the collegiate year 1871–72 President and Mrs. Loomis made a tour of the world, participating in the Scott centenary in Edinburgh, the British Association for the advancement of Science, studying art in Paris and Rome, exploring glaciers in the Alps, climbing Vesuvius, witnessing the Ecumenical Council in Rome, conversing with Huxley in Egypt, visiting Christian Mission in India, China and Japan; and returning via San Francisco, he arrived in Lewisburg on Commencement morning, 1872, amid great rejoicings. These were soon turned to tears by the sudden death of Mrs. Loomis, just three weeks after her arrival home, July 16, 1872. Carrie Gilbert Loomis, now Mrs. E. G. Owens, of Jefferson, Ohio, is the only surviving child of his second marriage.

August 20, 1873, President Loomis was married to Miss Augusta Tucker, of Lewisburg, who survives him. Andrew Gregg Loomis, of the Class of 1895, is the only child of this marriage.

January 1, 1879, Dr. Loomis retired from the office he had filled with distinguished ability for twenty-one years, and spent the next six months in Europe.

Dr. Loomis was a splendid specimen of physical manhood. Tall, of powerful frame, yet well proportioned, noble in presence and distinguished in bearing, he impressed his fellows everywhere as a born ruler of men. He was cast in the heroic mould. Vigor, force, determination were corresponding characteristics of his mind.

His text-books in Physiology and in Geology, long used in the institution, are indicative of the excellence of his method. They were not bulky "Manuals," engulfing the student in a sea of detailed knowledge, but true handbooks of principles, comprehensive, yet brief, and of marked excellence in the systematic structure and development of the subject. Science was to him systematized knowledge.

He was an illustrious teacher. He aimed to develop the student's power to grasp the author's thought, to test it for himself, and to analyze its constituents of fact and inference. He was an apt questioner and a close reasoner. His method was inductive and not dogmatic. While deeply interested in German philosophy, he felt that Hamilton formed the best basis for the instruction of the American youth of his time. In Ethics he followed his teacher, Wayland, until the publication of Calderwood's Moral Philosophy, which he hailed with delight. But whatever the text-book, or the fashion of treatment, the teacher was always the embodiment of Ethics to his pupils. He was greater than the book or the lecture; for he was the righteous man, devoted to the highest ideals, self-sacrificing for the good of others, interested in nothing so much as their personal moulding by the spirit of truth. Says one gratefully—"He taught us, not books, but life."

Among his services to the University mention must be made of his encouragement of athletics and his practical interest in providing a campus for out-door games. Assisted by his son, Professor Freeman Loomis, at an outlay of $3400, he filled and graded the campus, which had been too low and marshy during much of the season.

In his sermons on days of prayer for colleges, Dr. Loomis was revealed to his students in his true light. Here was a wealth of emotion the more moving by reason of its infrequent expression. How often has the chapel in the college building witnessed scenes of breathless suspense, when the student-audience waited that last sentence,—delayed by the choking utterance of the strong man whose heart was going out to his pupils in an agony of yearning love.

His interest in the University continued to the last. So late as 1892, he contributed one thousand dollars to the endowment movement of that year,—showing great anxiety for the success of the effort. The needle still pointed true to the Pole.

The Faculty extend their sincere sympathy to their associate professor, bereaved of the presence of a noble father ; to Mrs. Loomis, so long the companion of his life ; and to the remaining children who gather around his honored bier. The memories of his life of faith and hope should be sustainment in such an hour ; and the God whom he served with all his powers will be the comforter of all who mourn.

A TRIBUTE TO EX-PRESIDENT LOOMIS.

BY PRESIDENT HARRIS.

The death of Ex-President Loomis has removed from the life of Bucknell University a figure of commanding interest. It is nineteen years since Dr. Loomis retired from the presidency, after twenty-three years of service in that office, and twenty-five years in the service of the University. During these nineteen years his residence was in Lewisburg, and the "Good gray head which all men knew," was a part of the life of the institution. Just as the festivities of the Commencement, June 22nd, were coming to a close, the life, protracted even beyond the "four score years," came to a peaceful end.

Dr. Loomis spent twelve years as professor of Science in Waterville College, Maine, and left a profound and lasting impression upon the life of that institution. After a year of travel and study in South America, he became professor of Science in the new institution at Lewisburg, and two years later was advanced to the presidency. From that time forward his history is that of the institution. He was the greatest single force in its development. His faith in it never wavered, his work for it never ceased.

Dr. Loomis was a man of indomitable will. What he undertook went through, what he decided was final. At the same time, he was careful in reaching a decision. His mind was broad and hospitable to the truth from whatever source it might come. He was willing to receive suggestions. Whatever came to him was weighed carefully, and given due consideration, whatever the source of it might be. He kept himself in close touch with reality. He was a student of books, but much more a student of men and things. He traveled much and widely. He thus maintained the freshness of his interest in current events, and kept abreast of the times. He was careful in his teaching to bring his mind into vital and fruitful contact with the subject taught. In the most familiar subject he made it a rule to spend one hour in close thought upon the lesson, before coming before the class. He has been known to appear before the class and after explaining that he had not had time for preparation, to dismiss it. He was faithful to the students. He considered that when a parent entrusted his son to him, that he had received as solemn a trust as one human being can receive from another. He made each student a special object of study and his welfare an object of his care. When asked for advice by a student, he weighed the matter well before he gave it, and the student could not fail to be impressed with the feeling that Dr. Loomis regarded the training of a human life as a question of the highest moment.

He has ceased from his labors, and his works follow him. Multitudes have felt the impress of his strong personality, and have been sustained by his calm faith. When he went forth from the earth, there went forth a faithful educator, a great man, a courteous gentleman, a sincere Christian.

BY NIGHT.

The long black shadows of the trees lay across the asphalt and swayed gently in the evening air. Like ghosts, the people hurried to and fro in the glare of the electric lights. Far up in the vault, the stars glittered like little gems in an infinite setting of blue. The half moon was climbing the eastern sky and had almost come upon the illuminated cross that held above the city a nightly invitation to the lost to seek a better way.

It was a gentle September night. The sultriness of summer was gone, the harshness of autumn was not yet felt in the air. The square was crowded. In the circle of benches surrounding the fountain were gathered men, women and children, smoking, sleeping, yawning, laughing, talking, swearing. At this point all the various sections of the city seemed to meet. Germans, Italians, Frenchmen, Irish, Negroes and even Yankees mingled their voices in one strange Babel of sound.

A young man was dozing lightly on one of the benches. He was only half asleep, and was listening vaguely to the sounds that danced into his ears. Suddenly he heard a quick voice,—a short sentence,—two words; but they attracted his attention :

"J'ai soif"

He opened his eyes dreamily. An Italian had spoken the words to a negro in a language known to both. The young man wondered at that. Then he closed his eyes and dreamed again. He was back again in the old French room at college.

"Je suis soif," he was saying slowly, with a careful regard for the accent.

"Non !" the professor answered emphatically. "J'ai soif."

The young man smiled and stirred comfortably. The memories were pleasant. Then he heard a commotion around him, a hurrying of feet, a rattling of wheels. He was tempted to open his eyes, but finally settled back to dream again. He was reading a French play. How slowly the words came! Would he never finish the page? Then there was the clang of a bell on the night air. Nearer and nearer it came, till he sprang up in alarm, and looked bewildered around him.

He saw everything—the crowds, the ambulance, the mangled form.

"What is the matter?" he demanded of the bystander nearest him.

"Oh, a Dago kid run down by a truck," answered the man, and then the ambulance announced its departure by a clanging of the bell, the crowd dispersed, and the incident was a thing of the past.

"Only a Dago kid run down by a truck;" said the young man, as he turned homeward, "but I'm through dreaming of French classes for one night." Ex-'00.

PORTO RICO AND HER PEOPLE.

BY G. LIVINGSTON BAYARD, BATTERY A, PA. VOLS.

Concerning our new conquests and dominions in the Caribbean Sea, which now form an organic part of the political and social life of this country, the patriotic American is anxious to learn. We realize that a new people, with odd customs and strange institutions, with a different language and temperament, must be assimilated into the life blood of our nation.

The island of Porto Rico is about a seven days' journey from Philadelphia on the United States transports which average nearly twelve knots an hour. It is the easternmost of the Greater Antilles and is situated east of Santo Domingo, from which it is separated by Morro Passage. Christopher Columbus discovered the island in 1493, and found there the genuine American Indian.

Ponce de Leon conquered the natives in 1508-1520, and Las Casas claimed that six hundred thousand were enslaved or quickly exterminated, but this statement is certainly an exaggeration.

The population is composed of the original Indians, the white Spaniards or native Porto Ricans, the negro or slave population, and a tremendous mixed element. Slave traffic was formally abolished in 1873, but many of the old customs still remain and the social barrier is insurmountable. In recent years many foreigners have settled on the island, the French element apparently prevailing. The wealth of the island is not in the hands of its inhabitants. The great plantations and large tracts of land are under the control of American or European capital. The soil yields enormous crops and tropical fruits grow to perfection. The chief exports are coffee, sugar, tobacco and molasses. The city of Ponce is the greatest molasses port in the world. There are several varieties of cabinet and dye-woods, the most important being mahogony, ebony and cedar. Many plants, valuable in pharmacy and the arts, are found here. Although the island is only one hundred miles long and forty miles wide, it is one of the most flourishing in the world. Colonel Hill, United States Collector of Revenues, said that he received one hundred thousand dollars revenue during the month of August for the city of Ponce alone. When we consider the political vicissitudes of the country these figures are amazing.

Gold, copper, iron and lead are found in abundance. The best claims are owned by Senor Porrata Dona, the greatest minerologist on the island. Because of his American proclivities, however, and the natural opposition of Spain to colonial industry, the mines have remained undeveloped.

Telegraph and telephone communications exist between large business houses and the different cities. Porto Rico is connected with all parts of the world by cable.

There is only one church in Porto Rico, the Roman Catholic, or Church of Spain. Chaplain Sherman, son of General Sherman, introduced me to the Chief Priest and President of the College of Ponce, who speaks English well, and was kind enough to give me the religious history of the people, which was indeed very black and disparaging. His conclusions are that the inhabitants are absolutely without any consciousness of their relations to God. A visit to the Cathedral would certainly substantiate the priest's views on their lack of devotion. I attended several services at the Cathedral of Ponce on which fifty thousand people are dependant for a place of worship. The worshipers, however, were few and far between; probably not more than one hundred attend divine services at any one time. Having heard and carefully thought over the priest's explanation of the religion of the people, I was anxious to hear the same history from the layman's point of view and on equally good, if not better authority, than the priest's. I accordingly asked Senor Alexander Albizu to explain the sad state of affairs. Senor Alexander Albizu is a Catholic gentleman of honor, culture, refinement and education, who has been in the United States a number of times having received his college training here. He has a delightful home in Porto Rico where he royally entertained our honored Professor, Dr. Groff, and myself. While he rehearsed the same "status quo" as the chief priest, his causes and effects were quite different. Indeed, the only cause the priest gave for the spiritual profligacy of the people was their general worthlessness. There are two salient reasons given by the layman for his indifference to the church: First, the hypocrisy and profligacy of the priesthood; second, the church and state of Spain are one, and the priesthood has ever been a willing instrument in the hands of the government for the suppression of the inhabitants. The church and clergy are supported by the crown through the heavy taxes which are imposed on the people. At present the church in Porto Rico is deprived of this source of revenue and it is the object of Father Sherman's visit to reorganize it on the American system.

The education of the inhabitants is fairly good. The people as a rule are able to read and write and a great many are highly educated. The public schools are open about ten months in the year. They are, however, poorly attended as the government makes no effort to encourage education among the masses. There are five small colleges or academies with an average attendance of sixty students who take a five-years course, supposed to be equivalent to four years in an American college. These institutions are under the control of the priesthood. Although the people are fairly well educated and civilized they are certainly a century or two behind the Americans.

The ox cart is their chief means of transportation. There are, however, two small railroads which do comparatively no business. One runs from San Juan to Arecibo and the other from Ponce to Yanco. The first is about thirty and the second twenty miles long. The train leaves one day and returns the next. Whenever Spain does anything for herself she generally does it well even though it costs her four or five times as much as it should as in the case of the Military Road across the island. This road is in reality one great avenue about eighty-five miles in length and extends through Ponce, Juano Diaz, Coamo, Aibonita, Cayey and San Juan. It was built to facilitate the movements of the Spanish armies in quelling rebellion among the people. Every few miles there is a sentry house before which all traffic was compelled to halt and endure a search for arms or ammunition as none was allowed on the island except that in possession of the Spanish soldiers. On both sides the roads are lined with magnificent shade and fruit trees. Beautiful flowers are in bloom and the variegated foliage makes a beautiful picture.

Many of the fine residences are situated on or near this road. Here, too,one sees all kinds of human conveyances from the old native ox cart to the "swell" American trap. All travelers, animals and carriages are numbered and registered. The animals have their number branded in the flesh. The city and number is painted in white on a conspicuous part of the back of the carriage, and the native must wear around his neck a brass tag with his respective number thereon. Out in the country and up in the mountains the drive extends through enormous plantations of coffee, sugar-cane and tobacco. There too, are the beautiful pasture lands where the horses, cattle and sheep graze on the best grass in the Greater Antilles. One would naturally expect to see fine horses on this drive but with a few exceptions he is sadly disappointed. As a rule the horses are poorly fed, badly cared for and treated shamefully.

Off the military road driving is hard and very unsatisfactory. The only way one can safely get over the mountains and through the country is on horseback. There are no bridges on the side roads and the many little mountain streams must be forded. Along these streams near the towns the native women come out to do their washing. The clothes are rubbed on a big heavy square wash-board, after which they are spread out on the grass to dry and the women meanwhile sit under the shade in groups chatting and leisurely smoking big strong cigars that would mean nervous prostration for a week to the ordinary American lover of the weed. When the clothes are dry the women gather them up in a bundle and lay them on the wash-board which they proceed to balance on their heads and slowly proceed to their homes. That home may be a hut of dried cocoanut or large palm leaves. It may be a shingle hut with a bark roof or a board house with a corrugated iron roof. In every case, however, the house is two and sometimes four feet above the ground. This is to avoid the great dampness and innumerable hordes of enormous creeping and crawling things that inhabit the land. Giant cock-roaches, spiders, land crabs and lizards are the nightly bed-fellows of the American soldier who has no protection but the ground underneath and the sky overhead.

The homes of the upper class are usually built of marble on the old moorish style and remind one of Washington Irving's Alhambra. In the center is the large open court on which all the apartments face, in the middle of which is a beautiful fountain, its sprays as high as the second story, and in the large marble basin many odd fish of bright colors are found. Around the columns and under the arcades potted plants, ferns, and flowers lend color to the scene and the beautiful statuary in attractive positions adds form and grace to the surroundings. Fruit, flowers and vegetable gardens surround every home and if it happens to be in the city an enormous wall about twelve feet high is sure to hide this beautiful scene which is not meant for vulgar or common eyes.

The flower garden is the pride and joy of the Porto Rican. It is here that much time and labor are spent caring for the flowers and keeping the beautiful walks and inviting nooks in order. The Latin always had a great love for fountains and statuary and the Porto Rican, too, according to the impulses of his nature, graces his garden at every convenient center or corner with a piece of exquisite statuary or a charming fountain.

If there was ever any doubt in the minds of the American officers as to the number and quality of the truly high born, well educated and refined people of Porto Rico, all uncertainty disappeared at the great military reception given by the Casino Club to General Miles and his officers. Senor Parrata-Dona, having been favored with an invitation, asked me to accompany his family which includes three charming daughters. Of course, if one did not know a little Spanish or French he was not as comfortable as he would be at home under similar circumstances. Some of the officers who were particularly anxious to talk to a beautiful Senorita could be seen promenading the courts with a maiden on their arm and an interpreter at their side.

The reception was a grand affair and left an impression never to be forgotten by those who enjoyed the hospitality of these very charming people. One could just as well imagine himself at a military ball or reception here in the States. The same style, grace and polished manners were there; the same culture, refinement and education were manifest. The only difference was in the language and complexion. There was no domineering, haughty, disdainful sneer on the face of the victor, no expression of servility on the countenance of our host. We met not as conquerer and conquered, but clasped hands as brother Americans.

As I bade farewell to our kind Porto Rican friends, I wondered to myself if these could be the people the good priest would have us believe to be conscienceless, godless, worthless.

It is to this class of Porto Ricans that we must look for good citizens and pleasant companions. In his beautiful home and amid his magnificent courts and gardens, life is happy and free from care. Indeed, one involuntarily thinks that in these delightful springs and fountains and charming surroundings, he has as last discovered the paradise and fountain of eternal youth.

EDITORIAL.

To the new students of the University the MIRROR extends a hearty welcome. We trust that you will at once become identified with the interests of the school and that the year before you may be most pleasant and profitable.

Last January, after a discontinuance of one term, the MIRROR was revived as a monthly publication. A large debt, bequeathed by its predecessor, had to be assumed. Through the herculean efforts of the management that debt was liquidated and all debts contracted during the year paid. At the present time the paper must be published with what is received from subscriptions this term, as nearly all the advertisements continue until Jan. 1, 1899. We hope that all who possibly can will hand in their subscriptions at once. The circulation in the college last year was much smaller than it should have been and in the Academy and Institute there were scarcely any subscribers. A thorough canvass will be made and we hope for favorable results. The Orange and Blue attends to matters of purely local interest, leaving the literary field open for the MIRROR. For Bucknell, with her records of scholarly achievement, and with her strong and loyal alumni, not to publish a paper making some pretensions as a literary journal would be a disgrace.

It shall be our aim to make the paper as interesting as possible to both students and alumni. In the Literary Department we shall try to get articles which are of interest to both; under the head of "College Notes" will be recorded only such events as are of the greatest importance; through a large number of "Personals" we shall aim to keep the alumni in touch with each other and their Alma Mater. We hope to have the co-operation of both as regards finances and contributions since only in this way can a good paper be secured.

Last year for the first time in several years the University sent forth a representative Glee Club. A very successful trip was made during the Christmas vacation. The Club has this year been re-organized and enlarged and a Mandolin and Guitar Club added. There is in the institution plenty of material for an excellent Club and there is no reason why, if the men practice faithfully under Dr. Aviragnet, who is untiring in his efforts in their behalf, a Club should not be sent forth which would be of the greatest credit to the school and win for it the prestige in this line that it has attained in other fields.

EX-PRESIDENT HILL HONORED.

Ex-President David Jayne Hill, LL. D., was appointed Assistant Secretary of State by President McKinley, on the third of October, succeeding John Bassett Moore, Professor of International Law in Columbia University.

Dr. Hill was born in Plainfield, N. J., on June 10, 1850. He was the son of a Baptist minister. He received his early education in the public schools at Glens Falls, N. Y., and at Plainfield. He was graduated from Bucknell University in the class of '74. Immediately after graduating, he accepted the position of instructor in the ancient languages in the University and the following year succeeded Dr. Robert Lowry as instructor in Rhetoric. In 1877 he was made a full professor and in the same year published "The Science of Rhetoric." This was soon followed by "The Elements of Rhetoric." In 1879 he began a series of brief biographies of American authors, similar to Morley's "English Men of Letters." In March of the same year he was elected President of Bucknell, succeeding the late Rev. Dr. Loomis. Two years later he published a treatise on the "Principles and Fallacies of Socialism." Later works were: "The Social Influence of Christianity; with Special Reference to Contemporary Problems," 1888; "The Elements of Psychology,"1888, and an edition of Jevons' "Elements of Logic," 1884.

Martin B. Anderson selected Dr. Hill in 1888 as his successor at the head of the University of Rochester, and, after a year of special preparation abroad, he entered upon his work as President of that institution, which position he held until June, 1896, when he resigned. He received his degree of LL. D. from Madison University in 1884. Dr. Hill is at present in Holland but will at once return to this country to assume his duties.

COLLEGE NOTES.

An unusually large class is taking Spanish this term under Dr. Aviragnet.

Dr. Charles Gundy, '93, is teaching in the Laboratory during Dr. Groff's absence.

Miss Gertrude L. Knox, of Utica, N. Y., is the new vocal teacher in the School of Music.

A new scholarship has been established by L. E. Jones and wife, both deceased, of Minorville.

Dr. Groff has been appointed Brigade Surgeon of the 19th Regular Army with the rank of Major.

The first "At Home" of the year was held in the Institute parlors on Monday evening, October 3rd.

Dr. Harris delivered the opening address of the term on "The Character of the late Ex-President Loomis."

Registrar Wm. C. Gretzinger delivered the address of welcome to Co. A. 12th Regt. on their return to Lewisburg.

At the last Commencement of Franklin and Marshall College the Degree of Doctor of Philosophy was conferred upon Dr. Groff.

Registrar William C. Gretzinger has been appointed by Gov. Hastings as a commissioner to represent Pennsylvania at the Trans-Mississippi Exposition at Omaha, Nebraska. He left with the commission Oct. 1st.

Miss Candace Wood, of New York, is a new teacher in the art department, and Mr. Harry C. Fithian, of Greenwich, N. J., is an additional teacher in the Academy.

The Reception given by the Y. M. C. A. at the beginning of the term proved to be an enjoyable affair. Addresses were made by Dr. Harris and State Secretary Bard.

The number of new students admitted to the college is ninety. This will make the attendance in the college alone two hundred and thirty, and that of the whole University four hundred and thirty.

The College Glee Club has again been organized, and under the leadership of Mr. Hague promises to eclipse all former attempts along this line. The following men were selected: First tenor, Messrs. Hague, R. G. Stanton and Johnson; second tenor, Schilling, Keen, Theis and Griffith; 1st bass, Sherwood, Davis and Mulford; second bass, Peacock, Purdy and Meschter.

Bucknell has cause to feel proud of her sons in the late Spanish–American War. In every department they were to be found, in infantry, cavalry, and artillery. Among the American Colleges Bucknell stands first with a larger ratio of student soldiers than any other. Among the Bucknell men in this war were the following: Dr. Geo. G. Groff, Brigade Surgeon of the 19th Regular Army; Lieut.-Col. Tasker H. Bliss, U. S. A.; Major Martin L. Focht, Surgeon, 12th Regt. Pa. Vols.; Capt. Howard L. Calder, 4th Regt, Pa. Vols.; Capt. Wm. R. Follmer, Co. A. 12th Regt. Pa. Vols.; Rev. J M. Hare, Chaplain 6th Regt. N. J. Vols.; Rev. S. G. Reading, Chaplain 12th Regt. Pa. Vols. ; the following in Co. A. 12th Regt. Pa. Vols. : Lieut. Geo. Shorkley ; Sergeants Fetzer, Katherman, Shorkley, Crismyer, and Weidensaul ; Corporals Cober, Fetzer, Gilchrist, Hood and Christy ; Privates Anderson, Bailey, Baker, Bucher, Brownell, Earle, Heffelfinger, Koons, McCracken, Rambo, Ranck, Rowe, Trimmer, Van Gundy Van Dorster, Blair ; musician Bower ; G. L. Bayard, Battery A. Pa. Vols. ; O. R. LeVan Governor's Troop, ; Sergt. H. H. Bower, 5th Regt. Pa. Vols. ; Herbert Harris, Co. D., 12th Regt, Pa. Vols. ; Ralph Koser, Co. D., 12th Regt. Pa. Vols. and Lieut. Frank B. Hargrave, Co. I. 10th Regt. Pa. Vols. ; Harvey Marsh, A. T. Williams and Palmer W. Williams.

ATHLETICS.

FOOT BALL SHEDULE.

Oct. 15th.	Univ. of Md., at Shamokin.
Oct. 22nd.	Swarthmore, at Lewisburg.
Oct. 29th.	Lehigh, at Bethlehem.
Nov. 5th.	State College, at Williamsport.
Nov. 12th.	Franklin and Marshall, at Reading.
Nov. 19th.	Lafayette, at Easton.
Nov. 24th.	Villa Nova College.

"Jack" Lesher is at present coaching the team.

Cober, '99, has again been elected captain of the foot ball team. Captain Cober has had the experience of two years, and is perfectly fitted to fill the position.

The first game of the season resulted in Bucknell defeating Wyoming Seminary by the score of 6–0. The game was slow and steady, neither side scoring in the first half. In the second half Reimer scored the touch-down and Matthewson succeeded in kicking the goal.

"Sam" Boyle, the famous end of the University of Pennsylvania, spent a few days in Lewisburg the other week and while here put the boys through some hard practise from which much benefit was derived.

From present indications the outlook is bright for a winning team, there being plenty of new material from which to select. Among the new men are Matthewson, Ammerman, Thomas, Stanton, Bassford, Pritchard and Herman.

Our team met its first defeat last Saturday at the hands of the Naval Cadets, at Annapolis, Md. The score was 11–0 in the Cadets' favor. All the scoring was done in the first half. Bucknell was handicapped by Captain Cober not being able to play because of a bad shoulder and several of the other members of the team being in bad condition.

Bucknell played the famous Co. C team, of Bradford, Pa., October 1. The game resulted in a tie, neither side scoring. The Bradford team has not been scored against for two years and has defeated nearly all the prominent athletic club teams in Penna. It is composed almost entirely of old college "stars."

'94. Rev. J. R Wood has resigned at Collingdale, Pa.

'95. Wm. T. Paullin, Jr., was ordained to the work of the gospel ministry in Phila., on June 7.

LIBRARY GROWTH.

Education is the organization of mind. Its best progress is through the organization of knowledge. Books are the raw material containing the knowledge at the disposal of the race. Investigation brings more knowledge, and consequently more books. This variable quantity, therefore, needs ever fresh renewings. The students of 1898 do not use the same books as those of 1848, nor indeed of 1888. The students of 1908 will need quite other than the current volumes.

A Library is not a constant term, a fixed unit. For it not to grow, is to die. Buildings are fixed units, but Professorships are endowed. Relatively the building is a constant, enduring quantity, barring repairs; but a chair needs daily provision for continuous life. Now to treat a Library as a building, or as any material appliance, is to deny its vital character—to materialize it. It needs constant supply, and for this it needs endowment; such continuous, progressive change as will assure its evolution and accomplish its purpose.

In no period of American collegiate life has this truth received more thoughtful consideration from the friends of higher education, than during recent years. To particularize would be to rehearse the catalogue of munificent provisions for libraries during the decade. The foremost institutions have rightly given the central place to the library, and have emphasized its importance by every possible distinction. Adequate library facilities, no less than adequate special instruction, differentiate the higher education from the lower, the collegiate from the preparatory. This is emphatically true of the distinction between the University and all lower institutions.

It is safe to say that no institution better deserves adequate provision in its book supply than ours. In the spirit of instruction and the preparation of instructors to use larger facilities, in the spirit of the students, in their use of present facilities, and their eagerness for superior ones, it is within bounds to say no similar institution surpasses us. In the extension of our curricula in very recent years, in the range and scope of studies introduced, the need of new and liberal supplies of books has been multiplied many fold. If we are to mantain our present prestige, as assuredly we must, we must have adequate tools with which to work. If philanthropic friends could realize their opportunity and the institution's straits, we are confident they would rejoice to satisfy every reasonable demand.

What has been done in the past few years is only the earnest of what yet needs doing. We are grateful to every friend who has aided so far, but we must renew our appeal for concerted and prompt activity on the part of all friends of the institution in behalf of the Library. So long as the only source of such provision for institutions of higher learning is in the benefactions of their friends we must look to them. Certainly the day of State aid has not yet dawned; and the day of student taxation should be far hence.

Investigate the situation, assure yourself of the opportunities and necessities, and be in early at the race of loyal sons and friends who will press to the front to supply Alma Mater's greatest need.

RAISING OF THE STARS AND STRIPES AT SANTIAGO.

Cathedral chimes ring out high noon
Where Santiago lies,
They seem to chant a merry tune
Beneath the smiling skies;
The Stars and Stripes are rising fast,
They flutter o'er a palace vast,
A breathless throng look up to see
The glorious sign of Liberty,—
All hail!
Columbia, all hail to thee!
Tho' blood and treasure flow so free,
Tho' valiant heroes fall,
The Stars and Stripes on high to see
Were worth it all!

The banner floateth on the breeze
Above the arms of Spain,
The Starry Standard of the seas,
The pride of land and main!
Forth bursts a strain of melody
So dear to loyal hearts and free,
"Star Spangled Banner!" may it wave
Wherever hearts are true and brave!
All hail!
Columbia, all hail to thee
Who blood and treasure gave so free
Outside yon city wall!
The Stars and Stripes on high to see
Were worth it all!

O, none but patriots dare thus weigh
The worth of sacrifice,
Those who have suffered in the fray
Or helped to win the prize,
Or those who bore their loss alone,
Their dear ones gave without a moan;
Tho' through their tears as one they say
As waves Old Glory high to-day,
All hail!
Columbia, thrice hail to thee!
Thy sons but live thy shield to be,
And tho' we dying fall,
Old Glory's folds on high to see
Were worth it all!

THREE WESTERN UNIVERSITIES.

The Western Universities and colleges differ very largely from their sister institutions in the East in one respect, and that is in the matter of financial support. They are nearly all maintained by the respective commonwealths in which they are located. In the East the prominent universities and colleges are very largely under denominational control; whilst in the West the denominational colleges are to a very great extent overshadowed by the State Universities. It was the writer's privilege to visit recently, three educational institutions of the Central West, two of which are supported by State aid; and, at the request of the editor, student life at these universities is herewith described:

THE UNIVERSITY OF NEBRASKA.

This institution is a typical western university, and its work is of a high character. There were in attendance last year at the University of Nebraska nearly two thousand students, mostly Nebraskans. Like the average state institution of the West, this university is divided into many departments. Although it is a State institution, politics do not play any part in its development, and it is for this reason that the University is one of the most successful educational plants in the Trans-Mississippi country. It depends entirely upon the State for support. The tuition charges are merely nominal and simply cover the matriculation fees of $5.00 a student per annum. The buildings are like those of Bucknell—which were once described by Dr. Perrine in the American University Magazine as "Quaker-like in appearance." They were built not so much for architectural effect as for usefulness. It is, after all, men and not buildings that make a good college. It used to be said that all it was necessary to do was to put a boy on one end of a log and Mark Hopkins on the other end and a college was founded. There is a moral atmosphere about the University of Nebraska that is not found at many older and better known colleges. There is no law, so it is said, forbidding smoking in the college halls, or on the campus, yet there is a code of ethics that at once puts the young man under the ban who is seen with a pipe, cigarette or cigar in his mouth anywhere on the University grounds. This state of affairs is attributed very largely to the fact that the institution is co-educational. Neither is there prevalent that Bohemian phase of life that is manifest at so many of the larger educational institutions in the country. The cafes and the billiard halls of Lincoln are unfrequented by the students of the University. The one predominating spirit about the whole institution is work and study. This may seem strange, since the students room in the city. One would suppose that the absence of dormitories would develop a tendency to neglect scholastic duties, but this is not true at Nebraska.

There is another interesting feature in the student life at Nebraska and that is a series of receptions given by the Chancellor. The expense attendant upon giving these functions is borne by a State appropriation. The writer had the pleasure of attending one of these receptions. It was the opening reception of the school year. The various classes came in sections. The new matriculates were received early in the evening. A study of their faces revealed deep character lines. Many of these students came from the rural parts of the State. This was plainly manifest in their dress and their shyness, but the Chancellor's Secretary, who stood at the head of the line, made things easy for them, and presented them in polite and easy form to the receiving party. Later in the evening the older students arrived. They came in groups, and not singly like the new students, who were still unacquainted. The older students, in contrast wtih the matriculates of 1898, bore the impress of a longer residence at the university. They were at ease, and greeted one another in hearty, happy student style. Taken all in all the Chancellor's reception to both old and new students was a happy means of introducing the various students to one another. There are no dormitories at the University of Nebraska; hence the students at Bucknell, who enjoy the privilege of living together on the campus, can appreciate the large place these receptions would have in University life.

At a game of foot-ball between the University of Nebraska and the Iowa Agricultural College, which the former won by the erratic score of 23 to 10, the writer was greatly impress-with the spirit manifested by the general student body. The college cry was not heard once during the game. After the game the college bell tolled out joyfully the score, as the people left the field, which was enclosed by a 12 ft. high canvas. For more than an hour afterwards the bell rang furiously—some of the upper class men suggested that a half-dozen Freshmen were hanging on the rope. Strange to say the great crowd of people who witnessed the game, left in an orderly manner. There was no hooting and howling; "war-crys," such as one would expect in the West, were absent. The only racket made was the glad tidings sent forth by the college bell. After night fall, a red light was displayed on the top of the main building. This was to announce to the country for miles around that Nebraska had added another foot-ball scalp to her already large collection.

Taken all in all, the Western game of foot-ball is slower and more unscientific than that of the East.

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO.

This institution needs scarcely any description to Bucknellians. So many students have entered Chicago from Bucknell and the two Universities are so well known to one another that it seems almost useless to write anything descriptive of the big educational institution of the "Windy City," founded by Eastern enterprise and largely endowed with Eastern capital. There is one feature that seems omnipresent, and that is the general "newness" of things. This is manifest everywhere, especially so far as the campus is concerned, which at one time was nothing more than one of Chicago's famed swamps. The employees are engaged daily all through the season, in planting trees and bushes. It is said that President Harper made the remark after seeing Bucknell's campus that he would give a million dollars if he had it in Chicago. This "newness" is not only obviously manifest in the buildings, but it is discernible in the student life. There is also a lack of traditions; ancient college customs do not furnish the precedents and perhaps it is well that it is so, for if many of the established customs of older institutions were obsolete, the moral atmosphere of many colleges would be considerably enhanced. This "newness" at Chicago is also shown in the general spirit of things. There is no bubbling over of enthusiastic and effervescent students. Of course, in intercollegiate contests, the students shout and cheer their own team, but there is absent that indefinable aroma that hangs about older institutions of learning in the country. This is largely attributed to the fact that many students at Chicago come from other institutions where they have already given their boyish spirits full play, and where the cup of enthusiasm has bubbled over more than once.

At Chicago it is work, WORK, WORK. All recitations are called "Seminars" and some of them are two and three hours long. Frequently some students are heard to remark that a certain professor, in assigning the work for the following day seemed to forget that there were other departments besides his own. Let said students go to Chicago and they will soon run up against the cold fact that it is work and not play that brings a young man or a young woman to college.

THE UNIVERSITY OF WISCONSIN.

This institution is located at Madison, the seat of the capital of Wisconsin. The campus skirts along Lake Mendota, a beautiful sheet of water. Wisconsin is about the only Western institution that develops aquatic athletics. This is altogether due to the fine natural facilities afforded by the lake.

The University of Wisconsin is a many sided institution. There is manifest among its fifteen hundred students that "College spirit" which predominates very largely in the East, whilst the work of the institution requires close application and is of a rigid character, nevertheless the students develop many social diversions. In the Winter they indulge in a sport that is truly characteristic of Madison. Many of the students own "ice-boats." These boats are large sleds with sails attached, and many parties of students go out daily over the broad expanse of ice that every winter covers the waters of Mendota.

The buildings of the University are magnificent and complete, chief among them is the historical library building now in process of erection at a cost of $360,000.00. The money for this edifice came from a state appropriation. As at Nebraska, the tuition fees are merely nominal, viz, $6.00 per annum. The University is maintained by state aid amounting to $250,000.00 per year. This money comes from a state tax. The United States yearly adds grants to the above amount. The University has become particularly well known in the East through its aquatics. Also through the efforts of its President, who has done much in the way of strengthening the various courses of study and adding to its material equipment. The system of education in Wisconsin can be said to be entirely under State control, First of all there is the direct tax for maintaining the University, then there is an affiliation between the high-schools of the state and the University by which graduates of the former are admitted, with examinatio,n to the corresponding courses in the latter. This is true in nearly all the states of the West that foster state universities or colleges.

If politics do not in any wav corrupt the system, it is predicted that western education, maintained as it is by state aid, will in the course of the next few decades, reach a high plane of development.

THE SOUL OF HONOR.

A LIKELY STORY.

District Attorney Wilkins sat at his desk in deep thought. While he thought he whistled, and while he whistled, the clock ticked the minutes away.

"The police are away off this time," he said suddenly to a young man at a nearby desk,—"away off. They have taken the wrong party into custody, mark my words. But what am I to do? I have to try to convict the woman, of course. But I could swear she is innocent. I can do more than that,—I can prove it. But that's not my business. I can lay my hand right on the guilty man, too, but I can't prove he is guilty."

The Assistant District Attorney grunted. Wilkins began to whistle again, and the clock went on ticking.

"I can prove she is innocent, but I can't prove he is guilty, and of course I've got to convict somebody."

The Assistant District Attorney grunted again.

"I suppose," said Wilkins, rising, "her lawyer will prove her innocent fast enough anyway. Well, I must do something."

Then he put on his hat and coat and went out for lunch. There was a café about five blocks distant, where Wilkins had eaten his lunch only two or three times before. But to-day he turned his steps in that direction. When he entered the room, he glanced around quickly, said a soft "Ah !" to himself, and walked over to a table in one corner.

"Good morning, Mr. Pellier, good morning !" he said affably.

"Oh come now," said Pellier, "what's your game ? You don't come around this way just for sociability, you know. I suppose you want me to let you convict somebody. Eh ?"

"Pellier, you're all right ! Struck home first shot. That's just what I'm here for."

"Well," said Pellier, I'd like to please you, but really I don't see the need. You haven't been losing enough cases lately to be afraid for your place."

"No," said Wilkins, "it isn't that,—I'll swear to it. No, but I have a reason."

"Who's your victim,—Mrs. Clearfield?"

"Pellier, I believe you're bewitched. You never guess wrong. Perhaps, though, you guessed right because she is your only client."

"Perhaps," said Pellier, contentedly.

"Well, just put up a weak defense for her."

"But suppose she is really innocent ?" asked Pellier, smiling.

"Oh, pshaw !" exclaimed the other.

"That doesn't sound like you. What earthly difference should that make ?"

The two sat a little longer than usual over their wine that day. When they rose to go, Pellier said,—

"And you pledge your word that if she is convicted, you will see that she is not punished ?"

"I do," answered Wilkins, and then they separated.

But the District Attorney's work was only begun. He had spoken the truth when he said that the authorities had made a great mistake in arresting Mrs. Clearfield. With an eye accustomed to see quickly to the bottom of a case, it took him about two minutes to come to the conclusion that, Pellier's help to the contrary notwithstanding, it was going to be no easy task to convict the accused woman.

"There is no proof,—absolutely none,—that is worth calling proof," he said under his breath.

The trial came off in due time. Mrs. Clearfield sat in the dock and listened to the proceedings with a stolidity and an indifference that everybody classed as the coolness of an accomplished villain.

The prosecution made out a fair case against her, basing it, of course, altogether on circumstantial evidence. It was impossible to find any one who would swear that the woman was near the scene of the crime on the day when it was committed.

When the prosecution announced that it was through hearing witnesses, people in the court room whispered one to another,—

"If she can prove an alibi, she is safe, otherwise,—well, we would rather not take her chances."

The defense opened with a long line of witnesses who swore to Mrs. Clearfield's Christian character and good reputation among her acquaintances. Then followed two or three of her close friends, who testified in positive terms that she lacked the courage necessary for carrying out so desperate a scheme.

After these had been rent asunder by the District Attorney and his associates, Mrs. Clearfield rose to testify in her own defense. She explained at length that she was prevented by a treacherous memory from proving an alibi. She had forgotten the names of the two women with whom she had spent the afternoon in question. They were almost complete strangers to her, and their names had afterward slipped her mind. They had been extensively advertised for, but as yet nothing had been heard from them.

All this sounded very suspicious, and certain suggestions that Mr. Pellier had made to his client, and which she had followed in her testimony, helped to put her in an unfavorable light. Then she added the uncalled for fact that she had spent the whole day in question at Coney Island. This had been Mr. Pellier's idea.

In the prosecution's rebuttal, four or five witnesses were called who swore to having seen Mrs. Clearfield in Newark at eleven o'clock in the morning, in question. This proved that part of the Coney Island story, at least, was a lie, and as she could easily be in Newark at eleven o'clock, and in Brooklyn at two, circumstances pointed to her guilt.

When the realization of this fact came over her, her self-control gave way, and she sank sobbing into her chair.

The trial was finished in short order after that. Wilkins and Pellier went through with their speeches in a perfunctory way, and the judge charged the jury in a manner to put the crowd to sleep. The case went to the jury, the delectable twelve filed out, stayed two minutes and seven seconds, filed back again, and gave their verdict.

There was no excitement when the foreman answered, "Guilty," and the crowd rose to go. One or two noticed that the prosecuting attorney was standing immovable in his place, his eyes fixed on one spot in the back of the room. Suddenly a strong, commanding voice rose above the general confusion, and called for silence. It came from the spot upon which Wilkins had fixed his eyes.

"Your Honor," it said slowly. "that lady is no more guilty of the crime with which she has been charged, than you are yourself. Here stands the guilty man. I own to having done the deed. I shall surrender to the first officer who comes for me."

When the speaker ceased, Wilkins sank into his seat, and when Mr. Pellier immediately moved for a new trial, strange to say, the District Attorney had no objection to offer.

Half an hour later, he was sitting at his desk again.

"Didn't I tell you I could lay my hand upon the guilty man? I had my eye on him all through the trial," he said to the Assistant District Attorney," and I knew I was going to succeed. And yet I couldn't have proved it on him."

"And so you fixed it up with Pellier?"

"Even so. Worked pretty well, didn't it ?"

"But how could you tell that the man would do the right thing ? Not much honor in that class."

"Ah, my boy," said the District Attorney, with a paternal air, "a man may be as wicked and dishonorable as you please, but he will not let a woman suffer in his stead."

"You said once," said the Assistant, with one of his grunts, "that you could prove Mrs. Clearfield's innocence, if you chose. How would you do it ?"

"Oh," said Wilkins, with a yawn, "I saw her myself at Coney Island at the hour the crime was committed. She was alone, though,—that yarn about the two women was a fake. She would have got along better if she had stuck to facts. She must have had to step lively to get from Newark to the Island, though. And that was another lie. That was where we floored the whole defense. Why didn't she tell the truth, though ?"

"Because," said the Assistant, "Pellier told her to lie about it."

"Of course," said the District Attorney, with another yawn, and then he took his hat and went out to talk it over with Pellier.

Ex-'00.

THE COLLEGE LITERARY SOCIETY.

The student who enters college to-day must exercise great wisdom if he would neither dissipate nor limit his energies. It is a trite saying, but one worthy of frequent repetition, that the aim of the college course is to develop character. Character is the resultant of things done, not of things not done; it is active, not passive. The supreme question should be, what life in college will make me most serviceable in the larger sphere of the active world ? The answer is, that life which makes me most serviceable while in college, and which will enlarge my capacity for service.

In the aim stated above the College Literary Society has a large place. The work of the Society is voluntary and is performed under the pressure of more exacting duties. Work assumed of one's own free will, when there is already plenty to do, makes manhood.

The Literary Society cultivates expression. It cultivates the highest form of expression, i. e., vocal expression. Expression whether by tongue or pen must be free, spontaneous. The student should at times speak and write while entirely free from those who direct his work ; his own peculiar thought, his own peculiar method of thinking, his own peculiar style of expression, perhaps not in accord with the best taste,should be given full sway. The consciousness of a critic whom he thinks superior to himself, should not be with him always. In Literary Society he knows he is among the "boys." Moreover students can give each other new ideals in thought, style, and delivery without, as the teacher often does, cooling the enthusiasm.

Again the work done calls into action the fundamental principle in all good speaking. In the class-room the teacher for the sake of time and accuracy, an essential element in mind-training, must require the student to adopt and prepare in a degree a form, but the Literary Society encourages the preparation of the substance only. The "cut and dried" debate is frowned on. So the mind must work while the speaker is on his feet, and to re-think an address rather than remember it, is the very essence of true public speech.

Public speech is the scholar's most effective instrument for serving the public. Bear in mind a man's learning is not a luxury. Instruction in how to use knowledge should go hand in hand with the acquisition of knowledge. Public speech appeals to the whole man and this opens the scholar's way to all people. No candidate for public office is satisfied with writing papers and books but he tries to reach the people through public speech. If he cannot speak himself, he will get some one to do it for him. No force in any community is stronger and more permeating than the voice of the pulpit. True preaching will win a hearing anywhere and will inspire those who listen to endeavor to realize the ideals set forth.

But the best proof of the importance of the College Literary Society is the testimony of those who have gone through college and attained distinction. Prof. F. A. P. Barnard, LL. D., once President of Columbia University, an eminent educator said : "No part of my training in Yale College seems to me as I look back upon it, to have been more beneficial than that which I derived from the practice of writing and speaking in the Literary Society to which I belonged." Dr. Ezekiel G. Robinson, ex-president of Brown University,a moulding force in the early days of the University of Chicago, bears this lengthy testimony: "It was my good fortune to be a member of a debating Society. In direct education for the real work of life no influences of my college days were equal to those of this Society. It called into use and fastened in my memory what little I learned from text-books and in lecture-rooms; it prompted to inquiries and investigations that otherwise would never have been made; it stimulated to the exercise of all my intellectual faculties, as the set tasks of the professors never could. In many particulars the typical college of to-day is manifestly superior to that of fifty years ago; but in the societies of its students for the cultivation of literature and skill in debate, its inferiority is too marked not to awaken solicitude as well as regret, in the minds of all friends of liberal learning. Nothing yet devised has filled or can fill as a means of education,the place of the great debating societies, composed of representatives from every class in college, at once imposing and inspiring from their numbers, which were so marked a feature of the college forty or fifty years ago."

MERTON ROSCOE COLLINS, PH. M.

DIED NOV. 6, 1898.

One of the saddest accidents that has ever happened in connection with the University occurred Saturday evening, Nov. 5, when Merton R. Collins, '97, in some manner not known was thrown under the wheels of the passenger train, which leaves the Reading station, Williamsport, at 11:30, and had both legs horribly mangled. He had just a few minutes before boarded the train for the purpose of bidding good-bye to some of his old college friends. The train suddenly started to back up to attach a sleeper, when somebody called out that it would not again stop at the station. It is not known whether he was thrown off the platform by the rush of people getting off the train or in what manner it actually did happen. He was at once taken to the Williamsport Hospital, suffering all the while the most intense pain, until about two o'clock in the morning, when he was etherized and both legs were amputated. He never rallied and died three hours later.

The funeral was held Wednesday last from his home at Roaring Branch. A very large number of people were in attendance. It was held in the Methodist Church of that place of which the deceased was a member. The sermon was preached by his pastor, Rev. Robt. L. Armstrong, President Harris and Clarence L. Peaslee, Esq., of Williamsport, assisting. A number of students were present, and members of the Kappa Sigma Fraternity acted as pall-bearers.

Merton Roscoe Collins was born Dec. 16, 1870, at Arnot, Tioga Co., Pa. When two years of age his parents removed to Roaring Branch where they have since resided. Merton attended the public schools until seventeen years of age when he obtained a certificate to teach and followed that calling for two years. In March, 1891, he entered the Mansfield State Normal School, graduating the following year and delivering the presentation address of his class at graduation. He again taught a year and in the fall of '93 entered the Freshman Class of Bucknell University, graduating with the class of '97. During his college course he was a leader in almost every phase of college life. He was one of the best foot-ball players that ever played on a Bucknell team. He was manager of the base-ball team during the season of '95. He was the founder and also editor-in-chief of the Orange and Blue. He was President of the Theta Alpha Literary Society and represented Bucknell in an intercollegiate debate with Franklin and Marshall College in which Bucknell won. He was one of the speakers at graduation, being a magna cum laude, and taking the first Psychology prize. After graduation he was Principal of the Huntington Mills Schools for one year and the past summer entered the law office of Attorney-General McCormick, at Williamsport. He was a young man of rare ability and a perfect Christian gentleman, beloved by all who knew him.

MERTON ROSCOE COLLINS

BY PROF. PERRINE.

Seldom, if ever, has the University been so startled as when it received the tragic news that Collins had been crushed under a train at Williamsport and that life had departed from his mangled body. Aside from the dauntless courage with which he met his fate, there seems to have been no feature lacking that would add horror to his untimely taking-off. In the dark night of a day that had been crowded with life and joy, during which many of his school-time memories and friendships had been recalled and renewed, and surrounded by his fellow-students whose jokes and fun and enthusiasm proved that their faces were still towards the sunrise, Collins was called to give up everything in an overwhelming stroke of pain and disaster—and he did it like a soldier. Let us hope that some ministering angel up-bore him in the swelling flood so that what to the sorrowing watchers seemed death's cruel dart was indeed the opening of gates “we call Elysian.”

No student at least in recent years has developed more fully under the training for which “Bucknell” stands than did Collins. Intellectually, socially, morally, spiritually, he made rapid strides, all of which his instructors and fellows marked and in which they rejoiced. Alike on the ball field and in the recitation room, he was determined to succeed, not with the cheap “finery” of a transitory effort but with the abiding glory of sustained toil. His eyes had gladly opened to see the difference between wheat and chaff ; his heart led him strongly to seek after the one and to reject the other ; his light burning brightly and still more bright gave great promise—and “Bucknell” bows her head for one from whom she expected and would have received so much of untiring devotion, so much of unflagging loyalty. Of such sons, with more than Cornelia's Roman pride she can say : “These are my jewels”; and if the influence of a true University ought to be and is exerted beyond the bounds even of the physical universe, then she may still rejoice to think that Collins received his impulse toward all higher things while he studied within her gates.

RESOLUTIONS OF THE KAPPA SIGMA FRATERNITY.

HALL OF ALPHA PHI CHAPTER OF KAPPA SIGMA FRATERNITY.

Lewisburg, Pa., Nov. 7, '98.

WHEREAS, Almighty God, in His infinite wisdom, has removed from this life Merton Roscoe Collins, our most loyal friend and brother; be it

Resolved, That we hereby manifest our sorrow and grief at the loss which we as brothers have sustained.

Resolved, That this chapter has lost a most faithful and honored member, and the world one who has been an example of Christian manhood.

Resolved, That we extend to his family our heartfelt sympathy.

Resolved, That as a token of respect to the memory of our departed brother the badge of the order be worn inverted for thirty days. Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be entered on the records of Alphi Phi, one sent to his family, and also be published in the Caduceus and the college papers.

EDITORIAL.

Dr. David J. Hill.—It is with a feeling of pride that the MIRROR prints in this issue a picture of Dr. David J. Hill, our former President, and now First Assistant Secretary of State. Dr. Hill has had a most brilliant career. He had one of the best records as a student of any person who has graduated from this University. Immediately after graduating he became an instructor in the College, and in 1879, at the early age of twenty-nine, he succeeded the late Dr. Loomis as President of Bucknell. He held this position for nine years, during which time the institution made steady progress. He is the author of numerous college text-books and other important works. His appointment as Assistant Secretary of State has met with favor on all sides. It is safe to predict that he will perform the duties of his present position as brilliantly and ably as he has those of past positions of trust and honor.

Keeping Books Out of the Library.—It seems to be a habit with many students to take books out of the library and keep them long after the allotted time. In some cases where the book is one not often called for it may not make so much difference but even then it is a bad practice. In many cases, however, a whole class is compelled to use but two or three books and then the majority is deprived of their benefit by the selfishness of a few. Perhaps selfishness is too strong a word to use as we do not suppose any student ever intentionally keeps a book out. If we would all be more careful in this respect, however, we would be mutually benefitted and take a considerable burden off the Librarian's shoulders.

The Prospects of the Literary Societies.—Both Literary Societies have this term started out well. The attendance has been somewhat better than usual and the exercises have been good. No student can afford to neglect this work. Every person should have the ability to express his thoughts in good form. No student can feel that by giving some time to the literary society each week he is neglecting his work not only from the fact that great benefit is derived from it, but due credit is also given him for all work done here in the department of elocution. Let each student attend regularly and faithfully perform his part on the program and he will be greatly benefitted.

ATHLETICS.

Bucknell 6, University of Maryland, 0.—This was the score of the game played at Shamokin, October 15. The attendance was small, causing a loss financially. Bucknell made large gains but repeatedly lost the ball at critical points by fumbling.

Bucknell, 34, Swarthmore, 18.—The most interesting game seen on the campus for some time was played with Swarthmore, Oct. 22. Several substitutes were put on the team in the first half when Swarthmore did all her scoring. The last half the regular team played and the wearers of the garnet were unable to make any gain.

Bucknell, 0, Lehigh, 0.—A tie game was played at Bethlehem with Lehigh University, October 29. Although Bucknell was superior in both offensive and defensive play, she did not score, owing to fumbling every time she got near the goal.

Bucknell 0, Pa. State College 16.—Saturday, Nov. 5, the annual game between Bucknell and State was played at Athletic Park, Williamsport, before about two thousand spectators. It was a far more even contest than the score would indicate. Bucknell had decidedly the advantage up to nearly the end of the first half, when Scholl skirted our right end and after a long run made a touchdown. In the second half Captain Cober and Thompson were forced to retire because of injuries. State showed herself somewhat stronger in this half and scored two touchdowns, but kicked only one goal, making the final score 16–0 in their favor. We will not be so ungenerous to our opponents as were they two years ago, when defeated by Bucknell at Williamsport, when the Free Lance, commenting on the game, said that it was a contest between "Age" and "Beauty," in which "Age" won, although it might be far more appropriately said in this case than it was then. The majority of our team played on the 'Varsity for the first time this season while nearly all State's men were old and experienced players, having been on the team three or four seasons. Matthewson far outpunted Cure, State's full-back. Fumbles were a little too numerous on both sides. It was, however, a magnificent contest and one which reflected no discredit on Bucknell.

Bucknell, 6, Baltimore Athletic Club, 5.—With several substitutes on the team Bucknell defeated the Baltimore Athletic Club, at Baltimore, Tuesday, Nov. 8, by the above score.

Geo. L. Megargee, 'Ex-'96 and Harvey F. Smith, '94, have been assisting coach Lesher the past week.

Registrar Gretzinger has been given nearly a hundred dollars by friends of the University to be applied to the Athletic Association debt of last year.

RELIEF WORK IN ARMIES.

DR. CEO. G. GROFF, MAJOR U. S. ARMY.

It is the object of those engaged in the Relief Societies to ameliorate some of the unavoidable sufferings and hardships of war. Necessarily, the attention will in the main be directed to the wounded and the sick, who are always an encumbrance to any army. At least two per cent. of the men are always set aside for hospital work, and often a much larger per cent. will be needed.

The Government undertakes to furnish regular rations, clothing, medical attendance, shelter, transportation. If a soldier falls sick, there is a hospital, surgeons and nurses to care for him, but the delicacies which would tempt him back to health are generally lacking. Ice, milk, gelatine, prepared cereals, soups, boullion, cocoa, dried beef, tapioca, and tea, can be furnished to the sick with great advantage by the friends of the soldier. So also, netting to keep off insects, soap, towels, handkerchiefs, shoe-strings, and many other little comforts may be sent the soldier and are always welcome.

If a Government is given to war, and thousands of men are trained warriors, there should be comparatively little need of such aids; but in a volunteer army, where both officers and men are unaccustomed to camp life, there will be much sickness and much need of the offerings of the wealthy. In the creation of an army of 250,000 men in a few days, there would necessarily be many things which would be overlooked or fail to receive the attention of untrained officers, but which should receive attention if the comfort and health of the soldiers is considered. Here is the place for the Relief Associations. They come to the aid of the Government, offering their services to do a portion of the great work of caring for the army.

In the Civil War, two great organizations came into existence in the north. The Sanitary Commission and the Christian Commission. The work done by these Societies can be told only by those who participated in the work or who received the benefits.

In the present war two Societies also came to the front. The National Red Cross Society with headquarters in New York City, and the National Relief Commission with headquarters in Philadelphia. The Red Cross is an International Society whose existence is recognized by nearly all civilized countries. The National Relief is a temporary organization, intended only to aid the Government in the present emergency, as did the two Commissions in the Civil War.

When only these two societies are mentioned it is not meant that there were not other societies with similar aids, located all over the county, but the money and the goods which they collected were dispersed through the two national organizations.

One of the greatest agencies to save life and prevent suffering among the soldiers was, in the present war inaugurated by the Government itself. This is the organization of hospital or Relief Ships, which are floating hospitals equipped with every possible appliance for the health and comfort of sick men. Of these the Solace belongs to the Navy, the Relief and the Missouri to the General Government, and the Bay State to Massachusetts. These vessels have made possible the transportation of the very sick from the heat of the tropics to central latitudes where recovery was possible. It is safe to say that hundreds of lives have been saved to the country and to their friends by these ships.

War is a dreadful necessity only to be entered upon in dire extremities. It is hoped that the liberation of the millions of human slaves in Cuba, Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands constitute in the sight of Heaven the righteous cause which justified the war now being brought to a close. May the same powerful arm, which gave victory to our brave men on sea and on land, grant to our rulers the great wisdom necessary to administer just and proper laws to those freed from the galling slavery of a Middle Age power.

Ponce, P. R., Nov. 6, 1898.

THE GONDOLAS OF VENICE.

> "Didst ever see a Gondola? For fear
> You should not, I'll describe it you exactly;
> 'Tis a long covered boat that's common here,
> Carved at the prow, built lightly, but compactly,
> Rowed by two rowers, each called "Gondolier."
> It glides along the water looking blackly,
> Just like a coffin clapt in a canoe,
> Where none can make out what you say or do."
> —Byron.

It was late in the evening when we left the main land, by rail, for the city of Venice. Though one usually leaves terra firma by boat we were actually carried out to sea on a railroad train. On either side of the train nothing could be seen but a wide expanse of dark water dotted, here and there, with the flickering lights of Venetian fishermen.

We had all been very anxious to see this interesting and unique city built, as it were, upon the very surface of the turbulent waters of the Adriatic. One gets deep and lasting impressions on entering a strange city by night. Our train suddenly comes to a station, and now we are, not upon the sea, but in a city glittering with many lights, yet silent save for the noise and bustle of moving crowds. There is not the rumbling of cart wheels and the clatter of horses' hoofs so characteristic in all other cities, for there are neither horses nor carts in the "City of the Lagoons." Our baggage was carried down the stone steps, leading from the station to the Grand Canal, and placed in boats. We followed and embarked in the same strange looking water crafts. Away we sped through the darkness and over the still water with scarcely a ripple sound. The first impression is one of extreme pleasure and delight. The boat moves so smoothly, no rocking nor splashing of the water with oars. It darts ahead as though endowed with life. We sit under a felze, or canopy, closed at the rear, and our view is obstructed by no rower, for the man who propels the boat stands behind us. Suddenly we approach a corner and we hear him cry, Destra! Destra! to warn any boatman who may be coming the other way. After a number of intricate windings and short turns, during which the boat is managed with a skill approaching an art, we arrive at our hotel, having greatly enjoyed our first journey on the canals of Venice.

The boats of this melancholy city are known as gondolas, and nothing like them are to be seen in any other city in the world. Byron has briefly described them for us, but a few words may be said concerning the history of this strange but beautiful Venetian craft. A Chinaman by the name of Sing-Ho-Li, while visiting in Venice, wrote to his friend Champ-Pi-Pi as follows: "Every one here keeps their carriage anchored at the door, and the carriage is a sort of a tomb in which they daily bury themselves for five or six hours with great regularity." The gondola is, indeed, a most charming carriage and Venice would not be Venice without it. We Americans would hardly know how to get along with gondolas in one of our cities with all the hurry and commotion of moving commerce. But go to Venice and get into a gondola and you will be quite satisfied with its speed and really wouldn't want it to go faster.

The gondola is not an invention. It is a growth. It came by the process of evolution, and as time rolled on it was continually being modified to suit the needs of the place. Far back in the early centuries of the middle ages, when Attila came down from the north with his marauding Huns and invaded the prosperous cities of Milan, Padua, Aquilira and other towns of Northern Italy, the inhabitants fled to the mountains and the islands of the sea for safety. It was during this unsettled period that the city of Venice was founded on the mud islands of the Adriatic. In the course of time, through the development of engineering skill, the rude huts of the fugitives were replaced by substantial structures built on stone walls which rest upon piles. The houses were built close together and the canals made very narrow, which was a necessary provision for protection from the hot rays of the sun during the long summers. In order to navigate these narrow intricate canals the boats must be propelled from the rear, and the gondolier must stand facing the prow, so that he can see where he is going. These requirements on the part of the boatman compel him to be an expert at handling the oar. He uses only one long oar which fits into a a notch near the stern. The gondolier stands while rowing and must be able to give that peculiar return stroke which keeps the boat straight. With remarkable skill he propels the gondola through narrow passages and under low bridges, and turns sharp corners with the side of the boat scarcely an inch from the wall.

The felze, or canopy, is a covering for protection from the rain and the sun during the hot summer days. In the early history of the gondola this was made by bending two hoops and fixing any sort of covering to them, but this rude arrangement was soon replaced by the artistic Venetian with more elaborate canopies. At the height of the city's prosperity,the canopies were so profusely decorated and the gondolas so brilliantly painted that the government had to go to the extreme measure of prohibiting such lavish extravagance. Now one sees no gaudily colored gondolas. They are all painted black, and seem to be mourning the departure of their former greatness.

Another interesting feature, entirely characteristic of the gondola, is the ferro, formerly on both ends of the boat but now only on the prow. After the adoption of the canopy, the gondoliers found it necessary to place a stick upright in the prow in order to protect the canopies when passing under bridges. This upright post was later made a part of the boat and constructed out of metal instead of wood. We are told that the boat builders, doubtless influenced by the cultivation of art in the city of Tintoretto, tried to imitate a swan's neck and head with the ferro. This was gorgeously decorated and carved during the predominance of the "Barocco" but is to-day very plainly and simply made.

Some of the more elegant gondolas and all the larger ones have two gondoliers. This interesting class of Venetian society is united in one union or brotherhood, and all the passenger traffic is carried on under its direction. The gondoliers have continually resisted the construction of gondolas for private parties, but the hotels have always found it more economical to own their own boats. In order to put an end to the intrusion of the hotel managers into their business, one night, by concerted action, they broke to splinters all the hotel gondolas and ever since have had undisputed possession of all passenger traffic in Venice.

The gondola will never go entirely out of use, especially in the narrow canals, though it has certainly seen its best days. The steam boat now plies up and down the chief water way of the city, from the station at one end of the Grand Canal to the Public Gardens at the other.

Though the gondola still retains its picturesque and romantic appearance it has lost some of its former precedence and now, like the old palaces of this melancholy city, it tells of former greatness. What a wonder this "Queen of the Adriatic" must have been in the days when it ruled the maritime world! Its cathedrals, first among which stands St. Marks; the palace of the Doges, with its peculiar style of architecture; the Bridge of Sighs, with more fiction than fact connected with it; the art galleries containing many of the master pieces of the great Venetian painters; all these are lasting evidences of the former greatness and splendor of that romantic city. To-day one sees the frescoes crumbling and the guilding on the palace walls darkened with time. Notwithstanding all this, Venice still lives as one of the unique and characteristic cities of the world, where the gondola must ever remain an essential feature. W. K.

SHAKESPEARE'S ATTITUDE TOWARD THE JEWS AS SEEN IN "THE MERCHANT OF VENICE."

To a superficial reader or observer of Shakespeare's great drama, "The Merchant of Venice," the character of Shylock the Jew may present none but repellant and odious features. Some scholars see no more than this, and hence conclude that Shakespeare, catering to the popular prejudices of his time, entertained a hostile attitude toward the Jewish nation. A first approach to the play would seem to justify this belief, but more thorough students have formed other opinions.

Soon after the appearance of the play, it became the general sentiment that Shakespeare intended this character to be a humorous clown with all the attributes of a court fool, and it was so produced upon the stage. But that view has long since been abandoned as an unjust reflection upon the great dramatist. Some, with Gervinus, think that Shylock was introduced merely as an instrument, with no intimation whatever as to Shakespeare's feeling for the race. But the great majority of Shakespearian critics confidently believe there is a rich undercurrent of thought in this production showing clearly that Shakespeare pitied the Jews and wished to defend them, and this belief is well substantiated. Not so much because the weight of opinion is in favor of such a construction, though that must not be overlooked, but because the evidence in the play itself is so strong, we are led to form the same conclusion; namely, that Shakespeare's attitude toward the Jews was, on the grounds of humanity and justice, one of sympathy and defence.

As a foundation for further discussion of the subject, however, it may be well to ascertain two things,—from what sources Shakespeare derived his knowledge of the Jews, and what their social standing was in the Elizabethean age. That the author had a thorough knowledge of the Jewish disposition cannot be questioned, for otherwise he could not have produced a representative so true to every feature of the Hebrew character. He must have been well acquainted with the Bible, a fact which is plainly shown by the spontaneous allusion to the history of Jacob, the manna, the "fawning publican," "my deeds upon my head," and other references. Besides it is altogether plausible to suppose he made a special study of the Old and New Testament in order to secure an accurate rendering of the Jewish character. Here he would find the Jew at his best and at his worst, and could appreciate both sides. But he must have had some personal acquaintance with the people also. His biography is very uncertain, and it cannot be stated positively that he ever traveled, but there are some grounds for such a belief. If it be true, he surely must have encountered the Jews on the continent, possibly in Venice itself. He may have been more closely related to them, however, for contemporaneous records prove that there were numerous Jews in England at that time, though an edict of banishment still remained unrepealed. The case of the worthy and estimable Jew, Doctor Lopez, who was the victim of a court intrigue and finally executed; and Mr. Sidney Lee's statement made in 1625, "a store of Jewes we have in England; a few in court, many i' th' city, more in the countrey," both show that he had ample opportunity for meeting them. There is evidence to show also that Shakespeare very probably had personal relations with Doctor Lopez, perhaps both in public and private life. From him he would have gained a high estimate of Hebrew character, for the Doctor was a noble man, though not generally given credit for it. From these sources, then, it is clear that Shakespeare must have gained a comprehensive knowledge of the Jewish people in all their phases.

The case of Doctor Lopez as a prominent physician and confidant of many of the nobility might seem to deny the state of affairs existing in the Elizabethan age, but he was no exception to the rule; he suffered with the rest. Popular feeling and prejudice against the Jews was cruelly immoderate and most bitter. They clung to their faith most consistently, and, in consequence, were considered vile, despicable infidels, akin to Satan, Judases and living types of the slayers of the incarnate God. By law they were allowed to hold no property and were thus driven to the necessity of traffic in money. But usury had been abhorred by the church for centuries as equal to prostitution, as a malum in se, not a malum prohibitum as Shakespeare, a moral pathfinder in this respect, considered it; and usurers were looked upon as monsters of greed, avarice, hatred, and revenge.

But the bitterness of the age did not stop with sentiment and prejudice. The Jews were ostracized from all social relations, insulted, spit upon and persecuted to the extent of the law. It was no sin to cheat and pilfer a Jew, and they were often tortured or compelled to pay large sums to avoid having their eyes put out. Antonio, Shakespeare's most amiable character, answered Shylock's accusations with:

"I am as like to call thee so [misbeliever, cut-throat, dog] again. To spit on thee again, to spurn thee, too." Marlowe's "Jew of Malta," true to the sentiment of the age, represents Barabbas as an incarnate fiend. In short the prejudices against and persecutions of the Jews were even an exaggeration of those practiced against New England witchcraft in colonial days. Is it at all strange, then, that such abusive treatment at the hands of Christians did sour some of the "milk of human kindness"? And yet they were long suffering, for Shylock says:

"Still have I borne it with a patient shrug;
For sufferance is the badge of all our tribe."

It was in the midst of such prejudice as this that Shakespeare produced his "Merchant of Venice." Gervinus says the supreme purpose of the play is to depict man's relation to money and wealth, and we may grant him his opinion. The secondary and underlying purpose, however, quite clearly is to vindicate the oppression of the Jews by a faithful portrayal of their good and bad qualities and by pointing out the sources responsible for the persecution heaped upon them. In order to do this the author represents "Shylock as the incarnate spirit of the Jewish race," not an individual, but the representative of a nation. The Jew is not misrepresented in either direction, but is presented true to nature. He is not amiable nor magnanimous, neither is he a detestable villain. Shakespeare could not have painted him in glowing colors, an infallible character, for the people would not have received him so, nor would it have been a faithful portrait. Neither could he have painted him as black as Marlowe's Barabbas, for he would then have forfeited all claim to be ranked among the "great humanizers of English, and the world's literature." Shylock is a typical Jew with qualities both good and bad. Among the virtues Shakespeare clearly attributes to him are,—love for his wife and daughter, patriotism and devotion to the Jewish faith, carefulness and frugality in business, earnestness and zeal even in hating, patience, perseverance, great reasoning power, strong will and determination, sternness, dignity, strong character, intellect and personality and a thorough respect for law even when in its grasp. His faults are many, too, but why? He is called "avaricious," but such a quality is only the most natural development from the sole business allowed him by law. He is twitted of being a "usurer," when his tormentors leave him no other occupation and even ask the "usurer" for a loan. He is a "devil" and a "fiend" because he has a belief other than that of his accusers. He is "selfishly cruel" when merely fighting the enemy with their own weapons. He may be the personification of hatred, revenge, vindictiveness and treachery, but the oppression and persecution to which he is daily subjected "in the Rialto," on the street and everywhere the Christians meet him is ample explanation. They force him to be morose and callous in disposition. His own argument has double power because of its truth when he says, "If a Jew wrong a Christian, what is his humility? Revenge. If a Christian wrong a Jew, what should his sufferance be by Christian example? Why, revenge. The villany you teach me I will execute." The revenge he justly uses is but the practice of their example; and though it is not admirable, yet it is easily comprehensible; for it is just as good as Christian abuse and insult. The Jew is shown to be the product of two influences,—the natural Jewish character, and that character in a strange land persecuted and outlawed by society. Man is responsible for an evil just so far as it is in his power to prevent it. The Christians made no effort to prevent the Jews' condition, though it lay largely within their control; hence they were responsible. The Jew was "God made and man marred," and it was the Christians who marred him. Their treatment made him evil more than natural tendencies, and the reason was because they did not follow the charitable teachings of Christ. Retaliation not pardon, revenge not forgiveness, abuse not love, were the principles practiced; and then they blamed the Jews for being what they were. All these teachings and deductions a careful eye will read between the lines of the great play, and it is not hard to gather from them Shakespeare's feelings for this much-suffering race, for Shylock represents the nation.

Whether it was a pious and reverential respect for the Jews or simply the noble desire of a magnanimous, fair minded man to see justice done, we do not know. But, from some motive, it is certain, Shakespeare did what he could in this play to turn the tide of public opinion into channels more favorable for their race. He considered them as human beings, for Shylock says: "I am a Jew. Hath not a Jew eyes? hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions?..... if you prick us, do we not bleed? if you tickle us, do we not laugh? if you poison us, do we not die?" If they are human, the inference plainly is, treat them humanely. The injustice shown Shylock is evident in the play. That Shakespeare was a noble character is also evident, for he could not have produced such a work otherwise. If noble, then just; and if just, a lover of justice. On the grounds of justice, then, his plea was for the emancipation of the Jews from the shackles of Christian prejudice. Even in the end of the plot, as the child, having innocently eaten injurious dainties and suffered the consequences, is pitied, so Shylock, as he leaves the court room, thwarted, crestfallen, humbled and begging for mercy, calls forth our pity and compassion.

In this magnanimous defence of the Jews, Shakespeare manifested the true Christian spirit far more than the Christians he satirized and rebuked. As a noble champion and defender of the oppressed and defenceless, he deserves our sincere commendation, and his example is worthy the following of every just and humane writer.

PHILADELPHIA ALUMNI CLUB BANQUET.

The annual meeting of the Bucknell University Club of Philadelphia was held on Monday evening, Dec. 5, 1898, at the Colonnade Hotel. A brief business session was held, presided over by the Vice President, P. N. K. Schwenk, M. D. The following were elected to membership: Rev. J. M. Lyons, '51, Rev. J. E. Sagebeer, Ph. D.,'85, and Frank Katherman, '98. The report of the Treasurer was read showing a balance in the treasury of $8.08. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year:

President, Rev. A. J. Rowland, D. D., '52.
Vice President, Rev. M. G. Evans, D. D., '82.
Secretary, Rev. R. B. McDanel, '88.
Treasurer, C. B. Lowe, M. D., '55.
Chairman Ex. Com., Rev. B. MacMackin, '74.

The Company then repaired to the dining room, where after the divine blessing had been invoked by Rev. Leroy Stephens, D. D., the following menu was served:—

Blue Points.
Hors D'Oeuvres Varies.
Consomme Printanier Royal.
Turban of Sole, a la Parisienne.
Chicken Cutlets aux petits pois.
Filet de Boeuf Pique Duchesse.
String Beans.
Lettuce, French Dressing.
Roquefort Cheese.
Neapolitan Ice Cream. Fruit.
Fancy Cakes. Café.

President Rowland in witty and cheerful words introduced the various speakers, calling first upon President John H. Harris, whose presence at these annual gatherings is always most highly appreciated. Dr. Harris dwelt on the great advance made in the University curriculum in reference to various elective and honor studies, calling especial attention to the fact that one hundred students are taking honor work. He announced Rev. Dr. Lemuel Moss and Rev. Dr. B. L. Whitman as lecturers this present year on Sociology; and certain lecture courses in law by the Hon. H. M. McClure. He spoke also of the great and immediate need for a dormitory building.

Rev. J. M. Lyons, a member of the first class graduated, that of '51, followed in most interesting reminiscences of the old days, and expressed his sincerest love for Alma Mater, and his devout gratitude at the marvellous growth of half a century.

J. K. Weaver, M. D., '61, late Brigade Surgeon, Second Army Corps, dwelt upon the value of his College training on his after life, and made tender reference to the late Dr.

Loomis and the teachers of those days. He also spoke briefly of his army service and refuted the charges of inefficiency in the management of the army.

Hon. Ward R. Bliss, '74, who was introduced as the Speaker of the next House of Representatives at Harrisburg, spoke of the importance of the College study of politics, really the teaching of the history of humanity. He called attention to the fact that in every calling Bucknell Alumni are standing at the head.

P. N. K. Schwenk, M. D., '76, spoke a few words of appreciation of the late Dr. Loomis.

Rev. Harold Kennedy, A. M., spoke warm words of appreciation of President Harris.

Rev. M. G. Evans, D. D., '82, spoke especially of the value of the study of history, and that our universities must be both the radical and the conservative elements in our civilization.

Rev. J. H. Chambers, '72, was thankful for Bucknell's progress and for what it had done for him.

On motion of Dr. J. G. Walker, a standing vote was taken in which the club placed on record their grateful remembrance of the work and worth of the late President Justin R. Loomis, LL. D. The following were present:

Pres. J. H. Harris, '69.
Mr. H. S. Hopper.
C. B. Lowe, M. D., '65.
Rev. R. B. McDanel, '88.
Rev. A. J. Rowland, D.D., '62.
Rev. G. M. Righter, '72.
Rev. W. V. Wilson, D. D.
Rev. F. S. Dobbins.
Samuel Bolton, M. D., '85.
Rev. R. M. Hunsicker, '82.
J. G. Grater, '72.
D. P. Leas, '63.
P. N. K. Schwenk, M. D., '76.
Rev. A. L. Moore, 91.
Rev. B. MacMackin, '74.
J. K. Weaver, M. D., '61.
O. W. Spratt, '61.
Rev. J G. Walker, D. D., '62.
Rev. J M. Hare, '85.
Rev. J. M. Lyons, '51.
Rev. W. H. Conard, D. D., '62.
Rev. Wm. Barrows, '67.
Rev. M. G. Evans, D. D., '82.
Rev. W. R. Patton, '71.
Rev. Jos S. Evans.
Rev. H. B. Rankin, '89.
Rev. J. H. Chambers, '72.
R. B. McCay, '96.
E. T. Haddock, '96.
Rev. T. A. Lloyd, '75.
Rev. Lemuel Moss, D. D.
Rev. P. L. Jones, D. D.
Hon. Ward R. Bliss, '74.
Rev. W. K. Lord, '78.

Intercollegiate Debating.—It is pleasing to note the manner in which the idea of intercollegiate debating is taking hold of the various colleges throughout the country. But a few years since and an athletic contest was the only thing in which the colleges met, save possibly a few of the larger institutions. To-day not only among the larger colleges but among the smaller institutions as well, the custom of debating contests has taken firm root. Bucknell has reason to feel proud of her record in this line during the past two years. Debates with several colleges are being arranged for the present year. There seems however to be a lack of interest taken in the matter this term. At the preliminary contest held in one of the societies recently, no more took part than the number to be chosen. Surely this is not as it ought to be. There are plenty of good debaters in the institution and no college honor should be esteemed higher than that of representing one's college in a debate. It is with pride that we note the fact that one of our representatives last year was chosen to represent the University of Michigan against the University of Pennsylvania at once upon his entrance in the former institution. Let every student consider it his duty to take part in these contests so that the University may be truly represented and the reputation which Bucknell has gained in these contests be sustained.

Basket Ball.—Now that the football season is over, basket ball is claiming the attention of the college athletic world. Although it is a comparatively new game in many colleges, yet it has won great and well-deserved popularity. The prospects for the usual good team to represent Bucknell are bright. An excellent schedule of games has been arranged and there is no reason why, if the men practice faithfully, Bucknell should not maintain her past great record of having a team the equal of any college team in the country.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Several intercollegiate debates are being arranged.

The majority of the students spent Thanksgiving at home.

Dr. Aviragnet has offered a prize for proficiency in Spanish.

All the undergraduate Bucknell soldiers have now been mustered out.

The Mandolin and Guitar Club gave a concert at Milton on Thanksgiving evening.

The usual pleasant "At Home" was held in the Institute parlors Monday, Dec. 5.

George Dana Boardman, D. D., LL. D., delivered three addresses in Bucknell Hall last month.

An excellent program was rendered by the University Mandolin and Guitar Club in Bucknell Hall, Friday evening, Nov. 18.

The Zeta Literary Society entertained their friends Friday evening, Nov. 25, by a presentation of scenes from Tennyson's "Princess."

The village west of Lewisburg, known for many years as "Linnville," has been given a post office which is called "Bucknell."

The National Relief Association decided to suspend operations in Porto Rico on Dec. 1. Major Groff returned home Thursday, Dec. 8.

Dr. Aviragnet has composed and arranged a very classical piece of music for the University Band, and has named it "Orange and Blue."

Dr. Geo. G. Groff has been appointed by Governor Hastings a delegate to the Pure Food and Drug Congress which meets in Washington, Jan. 10–20.

Dr. Hulley spoke before the Baptist Congress at Buffalo, Nov. 18, on the subject: "On what grounds should we accept the biblical books as our Bible?"

Mrs. Katherine B. Larison, A. M., former Principal of the Institute, has established a scholarship for the use of the Student's Law Fund, to take effect after her death.

Dr. Hulley lectured recently before the Columbia County Teachers' Institute. He has also been engaged to lecture before the Northumberland County Institute, to be held at Sunbury, Dec. 19–23.

The Y. M. C. A. has secured Father Ganss to deliver a course of four lectures on "The Evolution of Music." the first of which was given in Bucknell Hall, Friday evening, Dec. 2, on "The Formative Period."

The preliminaries for the Intercollegiate Debates were held in the Society Halls, Friday evening, Dec. 2. Five were chosen from each Society, from which number will be chosen Bucknell's representatives in her debates this year.

The first preliminary debate of the Junior Class was held Friday evening, Nov. 18. Dr. Pulaski F. Hyatt, Ex-Consul to Cuba, and Prof. Dwyer acted as judges. The question was, "Resolved, That the United States should adopt a colonial policy." Messrs. Bunnell, Carringer, DeWitt, Grim, Harvey, Morris, Pearse, and Stabler were chosen.

ATHLETICS.

H. B. C. Riemer, '01, has been elected captain of the foot ball team next season.

Several promising new basket ball players have made their appearance in the game.

The College girls recently defeated the Institute team in basket ball by the score of 9—2.

"By" Dickson of the University of Pennsylvania assisted Coach Lesher during the latter part of the foot ball season.

Bucknell, 11, Franklin and Marshall, 11.—A tie game was played with Franklin and Marshall College at Reading, Nov. 12. The game was played on a muddy and rocky field and Bucknell had taken but one practise the entire preceding week.

The Athletic Association has been greatly embarrassed for a year with a large debt, which amounted to four hundred dollars at the beginning of the term but which has been reduced by the efforts of the Registrar to about three hundred dollars. Heroic measures will be adopted in order to clear off the debt by the beginning of next term. An address is being sent out to the Alumni and the friends of the University to assist in the matter.

Bucknell, 5, University of Buffalo, 36.—With four substitutes on the team and on a field on which the snow lay four or five inches deep, Bucknell succumbed to the superior strength of the University of Buffalo at Buffalo on Thanksgiving Day. The first half the teams were evenly matched but in the last half our team went to pieces and Buffalo run up the score. Dr. George Whitman, '72, gave the team a reception at his home after the game.

Bucknell, 0, Lafayette, 6.—Weakened by the loss of Captain Cober and full-back Matthewson and with the umpire decidedly on the side of the enemy, Bucknell was defeated by Lafayette at Easton, Saturday, Nov. 19, by the above score. Neither side scored during the first half. Near the end of the second half, owing to some very doubtful decisions of the umpire, Lafayette managed to score a touch down. With but three and a half minutes remaining the teams lined up and Bucknell by furious playing, advanced the ball to within three yards of the goal with twenty-five seconds remaining to play. The crowd surged on the field, some even getting among the players. Garner gave the signal for play, but Rosenberger held the ball with his foot, Ammerman not being able to put it in play; before Garner could call time the second half was up.

'98. Bruce H. Trimmer has entered the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania.

Ex-'98. J. Brown Martin is at present in Philadelphia taking instruction on the violin and harmony from some of the most eminent musicians of that city.

'98. A. M. Forrester, now a student in the Law Department of Michigan, has been selected as one of the debaters in the debate between that institution and the University of Pennsylvania. Mr. Forrester made an excellent record as a debater while taking his course in Bucknell.

Ex-'99. Frank J. Bevan is teaching in the Mt. Carmel public schools. He expects to return to Bucknell next year.

Ex-'99. Charles F. Armour is teaching in the public schools at his home.

Ex-'00. Edward Bell is engaged as teacher at Sabbath Rest, Pa.

At a recent meeting of the local Alumnae Club of the Institute the following officers were elected: President, Miss Stanton; Vice President, Mrs. Miller; Secretary, Mrs. Diffenderfer; Treasurer, Miss Josephine Lawshe; Correspondent with the Philadelphia Club, Miss Annie Van Gundy.

At an adjourned meeting of the Bucknell Alumnae Club of Philadelphia the following officers were elected : President, Mrs. Margaret Tustin ; Treasurer, Mrs. J. Reilly ; Assistant Treasurer, Mrs. Emma Clement ; Recording Secretary, Miss Carrie V. Lloyd ; Corresponding Secretary, Miss N. W. Conard. After the election of officers plans for the winter were discussed and committees on Program, Membership and Nominations appointed.

VOL. XVIII. LEWISBURG, PA., JANUARY 10, 1899. NO. 4.

A FEW FACTS ABOUT GERMAN UNIVERSITIES.

To the average American tourist many countries of Europe are more interesting than Germany. In natural scenery, it has the Bastei, the Hartz, the Rhine; for art, Germany offers Berlin, Dresden, Münich, and Nürenberg; Leipzig, Lützen, and Strassburg are mentioned, but very little is generally known of its real history. The English language and literature and our knowledge of the history of England make many hills, rivers and cities very pleasing. Our imagination builds on the historical associations clustered about them and we seem to live parts of our country's history. Germany has no Paris, neither is it Italy, nor Switzerland. For the traveler, however, who has learned to speak and read the language of Luther, who avoids the places set aside for Americans, who is willing to spend more than two or three weeks among the Germans that he may see them on the market places, in the stores and banks, at work in the fields or factories, at their beer in the parks, gardens, or inns, Germany is full of the attractive and the interesting. The college man would be interested everywhere, but especially at the universities and secondary schools.

The main buildings of the universities at Berlin, Leipzig, Jena and Goettingen are situated in the principal part of the city. They are built of stone; the different sections however are so placed that a court is formed and the recitation rooms face away from the noise of the streets. These rooms are large, easily and well ventilated; the light enters either from above or at the left of the student. The numerous maps and charts are clear and exact. Our public school desks, made long enough to extend from one side of the room to the other, would resemble very closely the desks used in the universities. There are reading rooms, offices, and special lecture halls besides places for refreshments, so frequently necessary to a German student, and the professors' waiting rooms. The dormitory is not found. The libraries, laboratories, and hospitals have separate buildings and are generally in some other part of the city. The floors, desks, windows, and blackboards are always very clean, not only because many janitors are employed in one building, but also because the students seem careful not to soil or deface the desks, walls, or bulletins.

The curriculum embraces nearly the same subjects that Harvard, Chicago, or Johns Hopkins offers. The studies of the Theological, the Law, the Medical, or the Philosophical Faculty lead to the respective degree. The class-room work consists of lectures and seminars, the latter resemble our recitations except that the student knows in advance what part is expected of him. The school year is divided into semesters, begins in October and closes in August; thirty or forty days of vacation intervene at Christmas and at Easter, the end of the first term. The day usually begins at seven in the morning and ends at seven in the evening. To matriculate at a German university seems a long, slow process to an American student. He must enter one office, make known his desire to become a student, and show his diploma, more frequently his passport; then the registrar, who generally has his office on another floor, requests the applicant's name, birth-place, and father's occupation, gives him a certificate which the student must take back to the former office where he waits till he is permitted to enter the rooms of the rector, the professor chosen annually by the faculty to act as president. After the door has been closed and the applicant stands before the desk, the rector advances, asks the student to obey the rules and regulations of the institution, shakes hands very cordially, and gives him a student's card and the above mentioned certificate of membership, honored with the official signature. The tuition is quite low: the number of hours per week with about fifty cents in addition for each course, as seat rent, gives the school expenses in dollars for the semester. The matriculation costs from five to six dollars.

The German professors are learned men. The preparation for their profession has been long, slow, and thorough; they have mastered not only the studies prescribed for the degree but have done also some original work. In Germany it does not seem to be the degree and the influence of friends that give a young man a good position, but his work, preparation, and experience advance him. He must prove himself right many times, before he is taken as authority. All are accurate and thorough in their methods; some seem cold and indifferent; however many have not forgotten that they were university students, in need of help, advice, and encouragement. They are born teachers and follow that profession because they like it and are successful: teaching is not used as a stepping-stone to some other pursuit. Their appearance is tidy; their habits and actions beyond reproach in the eyes of the German student. The professor is always very courteous and the students respect him. The university or rather the state pays the professors very little, his income depends for the most part on the size of his classes and the sale of the books he has edited. The teachers at German universities have more time for original investigation, since scarcely five hours a week of class-room work is required of them. All their energy is not given to the pupil, but used to add something new to their line of study. The American teacher gives more time to his students and does more for them directly; but he will be a mere translator, reviewer, and imitator, as long as he spends so many hours in the class-room, teaching the same grade of pupils year after year. It takes time and careful thinking to originate. Traveling is comparatively cheap for the person accustomed to the manner of living in Europe and the German professor seems to spend his vacation in that pleasant way. He knows that excellence and fitness are quickly recognized and rewarded, not so much by the university authorities, as by the greater interest and appreciation of his pupils. He is forever on the alert to know the true, the best, and the latest on his specialty.

The German student is a graduate of a Gymnasium or some other school of the same grade, when he enters the university.

Such a course would prepare him for the Junior class in our college. He spends from three to five years at the university, before he tries for the doctorate. Most of the students have three or four hours of recitation a day five times a week, study very little during the semester, but work hard during vacation on the notes and references which they took very carefully at the lectures. The professors spend but forty-five minutes in the recitation room, although one hour is set aside for each class. The bell rings when the minute hand is at twelve ; the students consume fifteen minutes to assemble in the class-room, and, as the bell rings again, all must be in their seats, ready to receive the professor. If it is a lecture, the pupils stamp their feet, as soon as the teacher enters the room and until he reaches his desk. He almost always stands before his class and reads from a manuscript ; he must pronounce distinctly and write every strange name on the blackboard, lest the members of his class scrape their feet as a sign of dissatisfaction. In case of a seminar the students rise to their feet, because a better acquaintance is supposed to exist. As the bell rings at the end of the hour, the professor leaves the room, while the pupils either stand up or stamp their feet ; the more popular the the teacher, the louder and longer is the applause. The professor bows and goes to the waiting room ; the students again spend fifteen minutes, before the next class begins.

The scars, the colored caps, the silk badges, and the peculiar bearing make the student recognizable upon the streets and in public places. He wears the cap and badge, because he belongs to a certain club ; his scarred face shows him to be a worthy member of the same. The more numerous the scars, the more highly is the student honored ; he has fought bravely, desperately, and perhaps frequently. A lonely, large mark indicates too clearly complete and sudden defeat. The fighting takes place only among the different clubs ; the least pretext may cause a challenge to be sent by the member of one organization to the offender from another society. Long and careful is the preparation, in fact the students must practise fencing constantly. The government in certain districts is trying to abolish duelling, but a quiet retreat is always found, where physicians, students, and combatants may assemble. The duel continues till one or both of the students can fight no longer. The dress, the manner of procedure, and above all the results are very interesting. There are many clubs and but few students have not been initiated. Each society has its favorite inn ; here many an hour is spent with beer and pipe. When the last song has been sung, they scatter to different parts of the city. Their rooms are generally well furnished, very comfortable, and reasonable in price : a student is charged from five to six dollars a month for two rooms and his breakfast, which consists of coffee and rolls. At the restaurants and pensions he pays about forty cents a day for dinner and supper. Theatres and concerts he attends for half price and on his books he receives a discount. The student's card, which he must always have with him or pay a fine, places him almost beyond the power of the police. Every where the students have the right of way and no one seems anxious to refuse them their requests.

The German university degree is valued very highly in America. At present many Americans study in Germany, not so much for what such a course is worth, as for the doctorate. Since so little stress is placed on the mere degree in Germany, it is not difficult to pass successfully the examinations, especially when certain subjects and professors are chosen. The experience, however, should not be under-estimated ; the manner of living, the methods of instruction and study, and the difference between the two nations will long be worthy of careful consideration.

A BUSINESS ARRANGEMENT.

Bradshaw's friends have never ceased to wonder how he became famous so suddenly. They knew that he had been writing for years, but it was only now and again that his stories succeeded in getting into print. But of a sudden several of them came out in the best magazines, and since then his name was continually before the magazine-reading public.

A few of his friends ventured to quiz him about his sudden recognition, and even went so far as to ask him how it came about. Bradshaw replied tersely, "You do as I did, and you will have the same result."

His interviewers thought he referred to his years of patient toil and questioned him no further.

Still there was a secret in his unexpected rise to fame, and his instantaneous recognition by two leading magazines. Besides Bradshaw there were but two men who knew this secret. They were the managers of the two magazines which had been instrumental in raising him to the ranks of the immortals. These men understood why there had been such a sudden demand for Bradshaw's stories, and why it was that his name now appeared regularly in two or three magazines every month; they knew but they never told.

Bradshaw's road to fame had been unusually rough and thorny. He began as a very young man to write plays. From play-writing he turned to verse and then to prose. At first his prose was very bad but it slowly improved till at last Bradshaw believed he had found his calling. He was confident that if he persevered he would reach the goal in time and claim the reward. So he pegged away with little or no encouragement, but with a tenacity of purpose that was remarkable. He worked untiringly, sacrificing pleasure and enjoyment, and turned a deaf ear to the gibes of his friends and the appeals of his family to turn his attention to something more profitable.

He had an odd way of ascertaining when he had reached perfection or rather when he had not. He scribbled for months at a time, destroying as he created. Then, when he was conscious of having made some improvement in his style, he sent his latest story away. If it was returned, as was generally the case, he settled down for another period of hard work.

At last he reached the point where, as the months passed, he could perceive no improvement in his work. His grammar was perfect, his rhetoric faultless, his style very good, and his plots—well, his friends called them extreme; he called them original.

Gradually, as the editors continued to return his best manuscripts, stories which even his friends admitted were very good, certainly up to the average magazine contribution, he came to believe in the theory that no story however good had a chance unless coming from a well known source. He believed that in spite of the fact that every magazine that he picked up contained articles by persons whose names he had never seen before. Still he did not despair. Had he not been sure of his final triumph, he never would have entered the lists.

As phrenologists would say, Bradshaw's bump of determination was developed to an extraordinary degree. If he lacked decisiveness, he lacked every other manly virtue. He had resolved to be recognized as a story writer, and his mind knew no defeat. If literary merit failed, a little business enterprise might help him to attain the goal. So he resorted to a little harmless subterfuge.

With his latest and best production in hand he approached the manager of "The American," one of the two magazines which had raised him from the ranks of the aspirants to a place among the recognized. To the manager he told his plan.

"I have been striving for years for the recognition of the press. I have written a great number of stories, but they have been rejected. Here is my latest. It is not a bad story, nothing that would disgrace a paper. In fact it is very well gotten up, carefully planned, and expressed in very readable language. I want you to bring it out for me. I do not ask to be paid for it; on the contrary I am willing to pay you."

"Our magazine prints only such stories as are accepted by the editors," said the manager, "and they are particular to reject everything not up to the standard set for this magazine. You may submit your story in the customary manner. If it is what you claim for it, we will be glad to print it for you."

"I understand, my dear sir, but you print advertisements. This is to be simply a matter of business. Print my story and I will pay you page for page what you receive for ordinary advertising. The only stipulation I make is that the story appear among the literary contributions and not with the other advertisements. When my name appears over a story in The American, my reputation is made, and recognition by the other magazines will follow. I advertise myself in your paper and reap the benefits like any other advertiser. A business arrangement pure and simple as you see."

"Well," said the manager with a laugh, "If you are willing to pay our high advertising rates to have one of your stories printed, I suppose it is a square deal. Leave your story with me and unless it is really bad, I promise you a place for it in the magazine."

"One thing more," said Bradshaw, "of course I wish this matter kept a secret; otherwise it loses its primary object. You can get my story past the editors easily enough. Tell them it belongs to a friend of yours and you would like to see it in print. They will do you the favor, unless, as you say, the story is very bad; but I have no fears on that point."

A few days later Bradshaw called again on the manager who told him he might look in the next issue for his story.

He then went to another magazine and made the same proposal only in this case he asked space for two stories in place of one, both to appear in the same number. He met with less opposition here, the paper consenting to publish any number at the figure he named.

When the two magazines appeared with Bradshaw's three stories, which by the way, were no worse than the average magazine short story, Bradshaw chuckled softly to himself and sent five newly written stories to five other magazines. They were accepted, every one, and he chuckled again. His recognition was assured. His friends stopped their gibes and gave a dinner in his honor.

Bradshaw is still writing and enjoying his reputation. He believes firmly in the motto, "Where there's a will, there's a way."

ROBIN BYRD, Ex-99.

LITERARY SOCIETIES IN KENTUCKY COLLEGES.

A Kentucky writer in speaking of the early Kentucky settlers, says: "Their leisure time was spent either in hunting or in making speeches." Their fathers, in Virginia, before them made speeches, their grandfathers, the English Squires, made speeches in England, and the Kentuckian of today—the purest Anglo-Saxon in the country—has all his ancestor's love for speaking.

To be a great orator in Kentucky is more desired than to be governor. But one, generally speaking, can neither be governor nor hold any office by the consent of the people, unless he is an orator.

The love for speaking pervades all classes of society in Kentucky, but it is seen at its best in the colleges, through the medium of the literary society.

Literary societies in Kentucky are different from any other college societies, except perhaps those at Princeton. There are generally two societies in each college, as old as the college itself. The members of these societies are not selected by the faculty for them, as in some colleges; but the societies select their own members.

Rivalry and eagerness to secure good men is so great that before a school month is over, all the students are members of these societies. The proceedings of the society, except the literary part, are secret. A member giving away the society secrets would be guilty of the highest treason. Meetings are held in the nicely furnished society halls each Saturday night.

A member is fined if not present and if attendance and behavior are very irregular, he may be expelled—a disgrace equal to being expelled from college. No member can hold office or vote whose dues and fines are not paid up in full.

To hold an office is a great honor, and so many are anxious for them that the elections are always hotly contested.

A society vear is divided into four terms of ten weeks each. New officers are elected every term. One cannot hold the same office twice. Students graduate from their societies just as they do from their colleges. On commencement day they receive their diplomas from the college in the morning, in the afternoon from the society. All society officers sign the diplomas. The president and officers of tha society bear the same relation to the graduate that the college president and faculty do. For this reason "June officers" are very hotly contested. Those who have done the best work for the society, or the best speaker, if the president, is elected. Above all things it is necessary to put up better men than the other society. On commencement day the president of the societies, before a large audience, addresses the graduating members and presents them with diplomas, and two members from the class—one from each society respond. The speakers put forth their best efforts, for the reputation of the society depends on them.

Next in importance to the June president is the June marshal. The marshal and assistants, dressed in the paraphernalia of the society, are very much in evidence during commencement week.

James Lane Allen in describing one of his Kentucky heroes, says: "In his college society they quickly chose him as a marshal at their open sessions; and on these occasions, gorgeous in sash, rosette, and white gloves, he would guide the company to their seats."

The other offices are also very much sought after, and one must have done some good work for the society before he can be elected.

Many Kentuckians, who have achieved fame, say, that their present success in life is due to a great extent to the training they received in these societies. Contests are the stimuli to this training. Nearly all pupils, who come to the college academies for the preparatory course, have had some drill in declamation. At the academy systematic work in that line begins. The contest for the "Academy Medal" comes off at the end of the year. This is the great event of the academy year, and it is a great honor to win it. The winner also represents his school at the "Inter-Academic" contest.

On entering college the societies take charge of their members' training. Besides the regular freshman rhetoricals, the freshman's first year in the society is spent in easy writing, declamation and elocutionary training. Each society has an annual declamatory contest, a medal being the prize. Hard training is necessary to win this, and only members in good standing are entitled to contest. The last two years are spent on debates and orations. Training for “Varsity” is not to be compared with the training these men do. The writing and re-writing of orations and the rehearsing would amaze a Pennsylvania student. As Spring approaches one can hear orations all day long. In every room there is a Henry Clay. Demand for the society hall “to go over my speech” is so great that each member is only allotted a certain time in which to practice. Soon after the holidays, the societies have oratorical contests to select their best men to represent them in the “Inter-Society” contest. All the resources of the soceity and alumni are employed to win.

Rivalry is so great that the “hot heads” of both societies sometimes get themselves into trouble. Every young lady in school or town favors one or the other of the societies. Every house, store and bicycle is decorated with the colors of the favorite society. It appeals to the student and community as a great personal matter. It is not an uncommon sight to see men and women weep at the defeat of their favorite society.

On the night of the contest the college hall or opera house is filled with people, cheering their favorites on to victory. The contestants themselves select the judges. Though excitement runs high, yet the speakers always have fair play shown them. Finally, when the judges appear with the decision, a deadly silence is over the hall, and as soon as the victor is announced, the cheer that goes up will drown any yell heard on the foot ball field. The victor is carried out on the shoulders of his society brothers, and then follows a night of serenading and rejoicing. The vanquished disappear swearing revenge.

Every home in town is open to the victor. No greater man is to be found in school or in town. The winner of this contest has the choice of either representing this college in the “Inter-Collegiate Oratorical Contest" or at the Chautauqua. He nearly always goes to the "Inter-Collegiate" held at Lexington the first Friday in April.

The five best men from the five leading colleges in the State —Centre College, Georgetown College, State College, Central University and Kentucky University meet there to decide who is the best college speaker of the State. Special trains run from each college town, carrying the faculty, students and the other admirers of the college.

Lexington is decorated with the various college colors, and the day is the most exciting one of the year. The opera house where the contest is held is crowded with the admirers of the colleges and the most cultured citizens of the neighborhood. Excitement is even higher than in the "Inter-Society Contests." Judges for the occasion are selected by a committee, composed of a member from the faculty of each college.

A fifty dollar gold medal is the prize. What greater honor can a man have, than to win this contest? The most admired, spoiled and envied man, not only of his own college and town, but of the entire Kentucky college world. What Kentuckian interested in the education of the State, can not name the winners of these contests? Every door in every college town is open to him; every girl wastes her sweetest smiles upon him; and every student will feel proud to walk by his side. A committee of citizens will wait upon him, when he reaches home to tell him, how proud of him they all are. This is not exaggerated. Just think how proud his fellow-members are, and the pride they take in their Society.

A society brother of the writer won the contest in 189—. The students the next day, headed by a band, marched through the town, followed by the victor and members of the faculty in carriages behind. From the sidewalks the men, from the balconies the women, cheered and applauded him.

Probably the Greek who won the Marathon race can boast of equal honors and feasting with him.

Even greater honors await the victor. He represents the State at "The Southern Inter-State Oratorical Contest" and by winning this contest he is the best known college man in the South.

Usually the men who train faithfully at the public school academy, and during the entire college course are the winners of these contests.

After having such honors conferred on the victor, is it a wonder that the Kentucky student's heart leaps faster at the mere thought of being able to compete for these honors some day?

It inspires and fills him with ambition to try hard to win. The other State contest is held at Lexington during the summer. It is not as important and is attended with less excitement.

Besides the literary training, the social life of the Society is very beneficial. Each Society has a certain tone peculiar to itself. Members of one Society would hardly be content in the other. They are very helpful to each other.

The presidents of the societies have the power to fine any member for misbehaviour or failure to perform assigned work. The power of appeal is given to the members.

At the business meetings of the members or an appeal from the President's decision, a jury is empaneled to decide on the case. The prosecuting attorney, a regular officer of the society, takes up the case for the society, while the defendant may select his own attorney.

Cases are prepared and sometimes an hour is spent on these trials to the entertainment as well as the benefit of the members present. If the defendant is found guilty, his fine is doubled; otherwise the fine is remitted. Open sessions are held frequently. At these sessions the members bring their friends and invite any others they wish. The faculty is nearly always there. Much encouragement is given to the societies by the presence of the faculty from time to time. Visitors from town attend the meetings frequently.

I have named the advantages of the Kentucky societies. If I were asked to name the disadvantages I could only name one, and that is the bad feeling the societies sometimes create between some members. This is not very serious as the sensible men in the societies are above such feelings, and the others get over it in time.

Does this training produce anything more than talking students? Compare the number of orators, and quality of oratory and the culture of the students and people of any State with that of the Blue-Grass Region of Kentucky with such men as Henry Clay, Colonel Bain, Proctor Knox, Ex-Vice-President Stevenson, Breckenridge, Blackburn, Lorimer, Henry Watterson, Governor Bradley and a host of others not so well known in Pennsylvania, and yet known through the South and South-West and the comparison will answer the question.

MAN.

Man has been defined as "the laughing animal" and the small boy has wisely described him in his essay thus: "Man is a thing that walks on two legs and can play ball, has a mouth and arms to whistle and work with."

I am not able to discuss a subject so broad and weighty as men in general, from the time our ancestors swung from cocoa-nut palms in the forest primeval to the age of Adam, who, by his rash act, implanted in the heart of small boys the love of apple stealing and so on past the age of George Washington and his little hatchet to the dawn of the twentieth century when manly attributes are being assumed by the weaker sex and men simply serve as figures on which to hang chrysanthemums.

Now, as it is not possible to talk on such an extended subject, I will confine myself to the nineteenth century style of men.

First, I see the upper-ten man or club-fellow. His life work is the study of the latest fads in hand-shaking, and how to skip his tailor. He is an adept in the art of balancing a cup of tea, and eating a lady-finger, while manipulating a gauzy fan and, at the same time, carrying on an animated conversation about Vanderbilt's yachting cap or Mrs. De Fashion's French poodle.

Then there is the "sporty fellow," who wears patent-leather shoes and parts his hair in the middle, carries a mammoth cane and informs you that he is connected with Moneybags & Co's establishment, neglecting to add that for the aforesaid connection, he receives three dollars a week.

Following him comes the cheerful bore, the man who has his pedigree and that of his dogs mingled with the threadbare jokes of his friends ever ready to inflict on the first convenient, unsuspecting individual in his path. But we know he is one of the irrepressible and necessary evils of life.

Then there is the dreadful conceited fellow, who deems he confers a favor on any one whom he is kind enough to smile at or talk with, who has an ownership air about everything he sees, from the Niagara Falls to the prettiest girl in the party. Along with him comes the self-made hero who has performed marvels and seen sights that no other living being could think of. He is always willing to tell you in his modest way how he descended from a burning building with a man in each arm, a woman held by his teeth, the bird-cage with the pet songster in it suspended from his ear, while the remainder of the family, six sweet little children, hung to the unoccupied parts of his noble personage.

But there comes now to the front the worst of all, the stingy man, who growls because his wife lets the potato peelings go to waste when they might be boiled for the children's breakfast; the man who makes it a rule to get the most for the smallest amount of money; who treats his friend to twenty-five cent cigars and storms all the evening when the household drudge asks for some flour to cook with and reminds her how saving his mother was; who, that same evening, when his friends come in while his wife is turning upside down and wrongside out her old black dress, will laugh and talk about how woman traps poor man so as to have an easy time and get her bills paid.

The most hopeless one of all, however, is the monotonous, satisfied fellow whose father was a shoemaker and whose grandfather was also and who has himself never thought of being anything else. He lives in the old home steadfast as it was when his grandfather left it. It was good enough for his mother, why not for his wife? He never wants or expects to make more than two dollars a day; his father didn't. His sisters finished their education in school at twelve. Why should not his daughters? He stands still while the world goes rushing on.

This man, the ideal one, is a bright wide-awake fellow, high-minded, vivacous, full of vigor, not ashamed of being a gentleman and of living up to what he knows is right. He admires and loves his sister. He tries to take the burden from his father who has worked hard for him. He is a comfort to his mother, who leans on him as her steps become faltering. He treats every girl as he would have his sisters treated. When he marries, he tries to let his wife and children have all the advantages and pleasures he can give them. What he could not have done when a boy, he tries to give his boys and takes pleasure in it. In business he is fair and square and progressive, strictly up to date, liberal and broad-minded. His energetic disposition enthuses all who meet him. He tries to live up to his standard of ethics; he is not always talking, but acts. The fallen brother finds his a friendly hand. Of such a man Shakespeare was thinking when he said: "What a piece of work is man! how noble in reason! how infinite in faculty! in form and moving how express and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god!" Such men are wanted. They shine like the light-house compared with the lights on the shore. It is because of such men that we do not lose faith in mankind.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Dr. Hulley was one of the instructors at the Carbondale Teachers' Institute held recently.

New electives for this term are the History of Art by Prof. Martin, and Blackstone by Judge McClure.

Major Geo. G. Groff delivered a lecture on "Porto Rico and Her People" in Bucknell Hall, Dec. 13.

Dr. Perrine lectured before the Union County Teachers' Institute on "What is an English Classic?"

Chaplain Jones, of the battle-ship "Texas," lectured on the fight at Santiago, in Bucknell Hall, Tuesday evening, Jan. 10.

Bucknell defeated the Danville basket ball team in the Tustin Gymnasium, Saturday afternoon, Jan. 7, by the score of 17–9.

The final preliminary debate to choose Bucknell's representatives for the contest with Franklin and Marshall college was held Dec. 16. The question was, "Resolved, That the nations should disarm." Professors Rockwood, Perrine and Hamblin acted as judges. Deibler, '99, and Lehman, '99, were chosen with Shipman, '99, as alternate. The debate will be held at Lewisburg. The question is, "Resolved, That the best interest of Cuba would be promoted by annexation to the United States." Bucknell has the negative.

A new regulation has been passed by the Faculty requiring the Seniors to present the subjects of their final orations to the Professor of Rhetoric not later than the second week of the winter term and the orations before the close of the term.

A student who has not completed his rhetorical work in any term will not be permitted to enter upon any of the work of the succeeding term until such deficiency is made up.

If a student has failed in the studies of a term, he will not be permitted to enter upon the studies of a subsequent term, until he has passed in the subjects in which he failed, unless a postponement of examination to a definite time is granted by the Faculty.

No student who is deficient in rhetorical or class-room work in any term shall be eligible to the office of manager or director in any student organization; or to be a member of an exhibiting organization, or of any contesting athletic team, or of any publishing or editing board during any subsequent term until such deficiency is made up.

Gymnasium Work.—The regular classes for drill in gymnasium work for this term have been organized. Attendance is required of under-classmen only. No student, however, can afford to neglect this part of his college work. Now that outdoor sports are impossible these drills furnish the best means for exercise. An especially good feature of them is the fact that not here as in foot-ball and base-ball do only those who are already proficient receive the benefit but all receive equal advantage. Dr. Babcock in a recent article in the Johns Hopkins University magazine, speaking of the need of college men giving more attention to exercise, says:

"Take heed to your body is a word for to-day. A young man hardly knows what a tremendous part of himself his body is and of what importance it will be in the work of later life. Abuse it, overtax it, sin against it, underfeed, under-exercise, or under-rest it, and you will find that nature is a minute bookkeeper, charging every item of overdrawn money, and doing heartless and heart-breaking work when she forecloses. The danger of specialization has crept into athletics. Few boilers can run more than one large engine. Few stomachs and nervous systems can support good scholars and prize athletes. This is too often discovered after graduation. The prizes are as dangerous on the campus as in the study hall. The exercise that keeps hunger healthy, the skin active, that breaks down and cleans out old tissue and gives an honest physical need of sleep is enough for the average college man. As much exercise as this a good scholar must have. If he misses some scholastic prizes in keeping his body in order he has made a good bargain. So few men can be prize winners and yet keep healthy bodies that I advise boys I know going to college to keep shoulder high with the best in their class rather than make the sacrifice that is demanded to top its head by half an inch. Of course, a man should be ashamed of himself who lets men suspect that he intends to be a chiropodist by being always at the foot of his class. To be in the nineties is hard enough work and a high enough aim for a man who does not plan to be a burnt offering at one hundred on Ambition's altar. The point is not to outpoint some competitor, but to be equipped for your life work and fairly equal to it in body and mind. An honest student with a healthy body will whip the intellectual freak in the long run."

ALUMNI NOTES.

An error occurred in the last issue with respect to the names of the officers of the Philadelphia Alumni Club. Mrs. Dora E. W. Spratt is President and Mrs. Margaret Tustin, Vice President.

Rev. Sidney Dyer, Ph. D., an honorary alumnus of the University, died at the George Nugent home, Germantown, Phila., on Dec. 22, 1898, aged 84 years. He was born in Watertown, N, Y., and was ordained to the ministry in 1842. He had several pastorates and was at one time District Secretary of the American Baptist Publication Society. He was the author of a number of books, and was a poet of marked ability. Among his poems was the Valley Forge Centennial Ode in 1878, and the Jubilee Hymn of the American Bapist Home Mission Society.

John Blair Linn, Secretary of the Commonwealth of Penna. under Governor Hartranft died at his home at Bellefonte, Pa., on Jan. 1. He was born in Lewisburg in 1831 and was the son of James F. Linn. He prepared for college in the Academy at Lewisburg. He practiced law in Union and Sullivan counties, serving one term as District Attorney of the latter. In 1871 he removed to Bellefonte. He was one of the editors of the second series of Penna. Archives, also the author of "Annals of Buffalo Valley" and "A History of Centre and Clinton Counties."

EXCHANGE.

The foot-ball number of The Susquehanna appeared in an attractive new cover.

The News-Letter of Johns Hopkins University last month contained an excellent article on "Phases of College Life" by Maltbie D. Babcock, D. D.

The December number of The Free Lance of State College is up to its usual standard in well written stories. The December number of The William and Mary College Monthly contains much interesting matter.

The Christmas number of The Dickinsonian, The College Student and The Messenger of Richmond College were deserving of high praise. Special numbers of college papers always awaken fresh interest in our exchanges.

With respect to neatness of appearance and arrangement of material, The Pharetra of Wilson College, holds a high place among our exchanges. The last issue contained a very readable poem entitled "A National Thanksgiving."

The December number of The Red and Blue of the University of Pennsylvania is up to its usual high standard of excellence. "A Trip to Sparta" is the title of a very entertaining and instructive article. The number is full of fiction of a high order and is well illustrated.

"Here, take my flag," said the man from Yale,
  To his Vassar cousin fair,
" 'Tis a jolly flag of truest blue;
  You'll be proud to have it there."

"The red's the only shade on earth,"
  The Harvard fellow said,
Cornell chimed in, "That's right, old chap,
  I swear by white and red."

On Yale she turned her eyes of blue,
  Her red lips smiled as well;
The flush that stained her snow-white brow
  Was loyal to Cornell.

"My flag's red, white, and blue," she said,
  "So there need be no fuss!
To show there's no partiality,
  I'll mark the flag just "U. S."

—Vassar Miscellany.

FRIENDSHIP.

A truce, dear friend, to idle words of praise!
  Leave them for lovers and for maidens fair,
  Whose hearts have yet the sterner test to bear
Of cold reality's all-searching gaze.
True friendship's love treads not these flow'ry ways,
  Nor favor courts, nor shuns offence with care;
  But soul with soul untarnished truth doth share,
One aim uniting, and, with passing days,

Binding yet firmer. Wasting not words on me
  To tell me what you find in me to love—
What boots it? Rather set before my view
The fault that keeps me still unworthy you,
  And teach me for your sake to rise above
That which I am, to that which I may be.

W. H. McClellan, in The Red and Blue.

MAN'S FALL AND REDEMPTION IN THE LIGHT OF EVOLUTION.

DELIVERED BEFORE THE STUDENTS OF BUCKNELL UNIVERSITY, NOV. 1, 1898, BY GEORGE DANA BOARDMAN, D. D., LL. D.

God has given us two Bibles :—An unwritten Bible, or the Bible of Nature ; and a written Bible, or the Bible of Scripture.

Bible of Nature.—I mention the Bible of Nature first, because it is first in the order of time. "The groves were God's first temples."

There are two books (says Sir Thomas Browne) from which I collect my divinity : besides that written one of God, another of His servant Nature—that universal and public manuscript that lies expansed unto the eyes of all.—"Religio Medici."

This universal and expansed manuscript to which the famous English physician alludes is that Bible of Nature of which Israel's minstrel sings in the first part of his Nineteenth Psalm :

> The heavens declare the glory of God ;
> And the firmament shows his handiwork.
> Day unto day utters speech,
> And night unto night shows knowledge.
> There is no speech nor language ;
> Their voice cannot be heard.
> Their line is gone out through all the earth,
> And their words to the end of the world.
> In them has he set a tent for the sun,
> Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber,
> And rejoices as a strong man to run his course,
> His going forth is from the end of the heaven,
> And his circuit unto the ends of it :
> And there is nothing hid from the heat thereof.
> —Psalm xix, 1-6.

Accordingly, the student of Nature ought to regard himself as engaged in a religious study. For this book of Nature, not less than the book of Scripture, is God's own Holy Bible. Perhaps this remark strikes some of us as tending to irreverence. But let us take care lest our religiosity here be in fact a sort of infidelity under guise of sanctity. Indeed, I doubt whether we ever make a distinction which, practically speaking, is more artificial, more false, or more harmful, than when we style God's works "secular," and God's words "sacred." For matter, not less than spirit, is God's creation; and therefore both are sacred. In studying, then, the Bible of Nature, let us study as though we were worshipping in God's own minister of Creation. For here, also, is a Burning Bush, wherein the Angel of Jehovah speaks to us. When, then, we enter the cloisters of any science, truly so called, let us put off our shoes from off our feet, for the ground whereon we stand is holy ground.

Bible of Scripture.—Secondly, there is God's written Bible, or His Bible of Scripture. This written Bible is the Bible of the second part of this same Nineteenth Psalm:

> The law of Jehovah is perfect, restoring the soul;
> The testimony of Jehovah is sure, making wise the simple.
> The precepts of Jehovah are right, rejoicing the heart:
> The commandment of Jehovah is pure, enlightening the eyes.
> The fear of Jehovah is clean, enduring for ever:
> The judgments of Jehovah are true, righteous altogether.
> More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold;
> Sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb.
> Moreover by them is thy servant warned:
> In keeping of them there is great reward.
> —Psalm xix, 7-11.

Nature and Scripture Complemental.—Thus our Creator-Redeemer has given us a two-fold Bible: A Lex non Scripta, or the Bible of Nature; and a Lex Scripta, or the Bible of Scripture. Let us beware of polytheism, or the worship of two Gods—the God of Nature and the God of Scripture—the latter God being on the whole the divine God. There is but one God, speaking to us in His two-fold Bible of Nature and of Scripture. Accordingly, the two Bibles are to be interpreted in light of each other. The true scientist is a theological specialist in the Bible of Nature; and the true theologian is a scientific specialist in the Bible of Scripture. For the Bible of Scripture, although later in time than the Bible of Nature, is not supplemental to it, much less antithetic—it is complemental. Had the Church more freely admitted this, there had been less infidelity in the academy. Had the academy more freely admitted this, there had been less bigotry in the Church. How much nobler to search for concord than for discord in this two-fold Bible of the Creator-Redeemer, the Redeemer-Creator! Unfortunatelv, many persons are content with the first half of God's Bible—His volume of Nature; many other persons are content with the last half of God's Bible—His volume of Scripture; whereas God's Bible is but one work, consisting of Nature and Scripture; bound in two volumes.

Two worlds are ours; 'tis only sin
  Forbids us to descry
The mystic heaven and earth within,
  Plain as the sea and sky.

Thou, who hast given me eyes to see
  And love this sight so fair,
Give me a heart to find out thee,
  And read thee everywhere.

—John Keble.

Nature Teaches "Evolution."—And the Bible of Nature teaches "Evolution;" that is, unfolding, development, progress along the line of a preconceived plan. And this teaching of the Bible of Nature is echoed in the teaching of the Bible of Scripture.

And God said: Let the earth put forth grass, herb-yielding seed, fruit tree bearing fruit after its kind, wherein is the seed thereof, upon the earth: and it was so. And the earth brought forth grass, herb yielding seed after its kind, and tree bearing fruit, wherein is the seed thereof, after its kind: and God saw that it was good.

And God said: Let the waters swarm with swarms of living creatures, and let fowl fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven. And God created the great sea-monsters, and every living creature that moves, which the waters brought forth abundantly, after their kinds, and every winged fowl after its kind : and God saw that it was good.—Genesis I : ii, 12, 20, 21.

So also it is written (Gen. 2:7), the first man Adam, became a living soul; the last Adam, a life-giving spirit. Yet the spiritual is not first, but the natural ; then the spiritual.—I Corinthians, 15 : 45, 46.

Meaning of "Evolution."—And now let us understand exactly what we mean by this word "Evolution." For clearness of conception here is absolutely essential. Indeed, it is quite astonishing to notice how loosely many intelligent persons use such words as "evolution, development, variety, species," etc. Look, for example, at this word "species." A species is a purely subjective thing, an ens rationis, a mental outline, an ideal padlock. Who ever saw or touched a species ? To talk, then, of the Origin, or Transmutation of Species is to talk of a subjective idea, which never has had and never can have any actual, objective existence in the world of matter. If there is ever any "transmutation," the transmutation is a concept existing only in the mind of the conceiver. In other words, the affair is an affair of metaphysics, not of physics. Here, as elsewhere in such matters, let us abide by the glorious rigor of the scientific method. Physical science, we are solemnly told, deals only with objective, concrete realities ; it has nothing to do with abstractions or concepts ; not but that concepts or abstract terms are useful, and even indispensable, as tools, or "working hypotheses." And with concepts as such—that is, with abstract terms as instruments of thought and investigation—physical science does have to do. Nevertheless, concepts are not objective existences ; abstract terms are not concrete realities. And "species" is an abstract term or concept. Accordingly, the only evolution or transmutation which physical science, as an affair of observation and induction, can consistently consider, is the evolution or transmutation of an objective, concrete, definite plant or animal.

And precisely here, where the proof should be decisive, is the weak point in the theory of Evolution. And no chain is stronger than its weakest link. Or look at this very word "Evolution." It is another lamentable instance of the loose use of terms. To "evolve" is to unroll, unfold, develop. But you cannot unroll what had not been inrolled; you cannot unfold what was not infolded; you cannot develop what was not enveloped. Yet these exact Gentlemen of the Balance and the Micrometer confound unrollment with transition, development with transmutation. And just because these exact Gentlemen use terms so inexactly, it happens that this term "Evolution" has become a very Shibboleth and Ariadne clew. Enough that we oracularly pronounce this magic word "Evolution," and we imagine that we have the "Open Sesame," and have explained everything. Again, I insist on the rigor of the scientific method. You cannot unroll what has not been inrolled; you cannot evolve what has not been involved. You cannot unfold a ton out of an ounce. You cannot account for the origin or unfolding of man by evolving him out of a primary bioplastic cell; for he—man—was never in the cell at all, not even as a prisoner.

But while I cannot accept Evolution as being the philosophical cause or initial force which accounts for the progress of life, there is a kind of Evolution which I must and do accept—it is an ideal evolution; that is to say, the evolution along the ideal axis of a divine plan and purpose: for example, the unfolding of a leonine ovum into the adult lion is an evolution along the ideal axis of a vertebrate mammal. It is not, as atheistic evolutionists hold, that the pickerel was transformed by vertebral metamorphosis into the tortoise, the tortoise into the owl, the owl into the gorilla, the gorilla into man. It is, as theistic evolutionists hold, that pickerel, tortoise, owl, gorilla, man, are divine modifications of the general archetypal vertebra for specific purposes, adjusting the physical application of the archetypal ideal vertebra to new necessities as occasioned by new conditions or environments. I believe that the process of creation was, and that the process of evolution is, the unrolling of a divine plan or conception. In this sense of the word (and it is the primary, etymological, fair sense), I am proud to confess myself an Evolutionist. "Premeditation prior to Creation"—this is the favorite formula of Louis Agassiz in his famous "Essay on Classification." I believe that the Bible story of Origins is the story of the unfolding of a divine plan or idea; ascending from the creation of matter-atoms, along the pathway of soil and plant and animal, to Man. The advance may have been, and in many cases doubtless was, genetic; but the advance, in so far as it was an "evolution," was ideal. And not only was evolution, in the proper sense of the term, true of the original creative process; evolution is also still true of every living thing to-day, whether plant or animal or man. The acorn unfolds into the oak--the babe into the man—the man into the Christian—along the ideal axis of a divine thought or plan. Evolution, in the sense of physical, objective unfolding of protoplast into man, is false. Evolution, in the sense of ideal, purposeful unfolding of protoplast into Man, is true. And Science has it for her stately vocation to try to read the Creator's thoughts before they are materialized into His things.

Ere, from the gloom of cycling night,
Earth woke, and knew the dawning light;
Ere from old Chaos order sprung,
And music through the ether rung;—

In thee, O one eternal Mind,
Dwelt Laws which worlds in order bind,
All forms of beauty, Love's delight,—
All reason,—all unchanging Right.

In earth and heaven, the wonder wrought
Is Evolution from thy Thought;
The potence of creative skill
Is sovereign fiat of thy Will;—

And Science, thence, Thy works to know;—
That upward stepping, patient, slow,
The reverent mind may find in Thee
Creation in its Prophecy.

Scripture Teaches "Man's Fall."—But although the Bible of Nature teaches "Evolution," yet the Bible of Scripture teaches "Man's Fall"—

Through one man sin entered into the world, and death through sin; and so death passed unto all men, for that all sinned.—Romans, v, 12.

Story of Adam a Divine Parable.—Is the story of Adam's fall as recorded in the third chapter of Genesis to be taken literally? I would not willingly offend the least of my Father's little ones. He knows that I believe that His Scripture is divinely inspired, and that I bow before it as reverently as ever did the devoutest literalist. Yet, let me frankly say it, I do not believe that the early chapters of Genesis are to be taken literally. If I take a part of them as literal, then I must be consistent, and take the rest of them as literal. For example—I must believe that the seven creative days were literal days of twenty-fours each; that the Creator spoke in an articulate voice, though there was no human ear to hear; that there was a first day with evening and morning, though there was no sun to rise and set, and so bring day and night; that it was the soil itself that originated vegetation; that God literally spoke to the sea-monsters, saying, "Be fruitful, and multiply, and fill the seas;" that He actually had a physical form, and created man in His own image, after His own likeness; that He literally formed man of the dust of the ground, and actually breathed into his nostrils out of His own lungs the breath of life; that He actually brought every beast of the field and every bird of the air to Adam in Eden, to see what he would call them; that He actually hypnotized Adam in Eden, and performed a surgical operation, and metamorphosed one of his ribs into a woman; that He actually rested on the Seventh day because He was really tired out with His creative task; that He actually endowed the serpent with a linguistic apparatus, so he could hold a conversation with Eve; that He actually cursed the serpent above all animals, dooming him to go upon his belly all the days of his life, though geology teaches that prone locomotion had always been the serpent's gait, and indeed must ever be; i. e., so long as he is a serpent. For myself, most reverently I say it, the God before whom I kneel is greater than all this. No; the story of Adam's fall in Eden is a divine parable. And parables are the very highest forms of truth. No syllogistic demonstration, no geometrical axiom, is so true as a Nazarene parable.

Distinguished Facts and Truths.—For we must distinguish between the world of matter and the world of spirit; or, as I have been in the habit of teaching, between facts and truths. On the one hand, facts belong to the physical world; they exist under conditions of space and time, having a beginning, and therefore, it may be, an ending; they appeal to the senses—to the eye, the ear, the touch; they are matters of weight, form, color, place, history, science; but facts are not necessarily moral; for example, there is no moral quality in the geometrical fact that a cube has six sides, or in the chemical fact that a molecule of water consists of two weights of hydrogen and sixteen weights of oxygen, or in the chronological fact that Jesus died on Calvary. On the other hand, truths belong to the spiritual world; they are largely independent of the conditions of time and space; they appeal to the senses of the soul—to reason, imagination, conscience; they are matters of faith, hope, love; as such, truths are intensely moral; for example, the idea of morality culminates, not in the physical fact that Jesus died on Calvary, but in the moral truth that Jesus died on Calvary to save sinners. And truths are ever more important than facts. Indeed, it requires more genuine faith to believe in truths than to believe in facts. This, perhaps, is the reason why there are so many skeptics in the Academy, and even in the Ecclesia. It is easier to believe the facts of Nature science than to believe the truths of Scripture. Now the Bible story of Adam's Fall is not so much a record of biographical facts as it is an allegory of theological truths. It is a divine parable, depicting, as in sublime chiaroscuro, the dark mystery of the entrance of Evil; and so preparing the way for the bright mystery of the entrance of Redemption.

Scripture Teaches "Man's Redemption."—For, as the Bible of Scripture teaches the truth of Man's Fall, so also does the Bible of Scripture teach the truth of Christ's Redemption. Listen to St. Paul's divinely classic Allegory:

"As through one man sin entered into the world, and death through sin; and so death passed unto all men, for that all sinned; for until the law, sin was in the world; but sin is not reckoned when there is no law. But yet death reigned from Adam until Moses, even over those who sinned not after the likeness of Adam's transgression, who is a type of the Coming One. But not as the trespass, so also is the gift ; for if by the trespass of the one the many died, much more did the grace of God, and the gift by the grace of the one man, Jesus Christ, abound to the many. And not as through one that sinned, is the gift ; for the judgment came of one unto condemnation, but the gift came of many trespasses unto justification. For if by the trespass of the one, death reigned through the one ; much more they who receive the abundance of the grace, and of the gift of righteousness, will reign in life through the one, Jesus Christ.

"So, then, as through one trespass it came to all men unto condemnation ; so also through one righteous act it came to all men unto justification of life. For as through the disobedience of the one man the many were constituted sinners, so also through the obedience of the one will the many be constituted righteous. But the law came in beside, that the trespass might abound. But where sin abounded, grace superabounded ; that as sin reigned in death, so also might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."—Romans, v, 12–21.

It is St. Paul's Theodicy, or vindication of God's ways in permitting man's fall. Not that it is to be taken literally, as though it were a bare record of biographical facts. Nor is it to be taken syllogistically, as though it were a fine instance of theological dialectics. But it is to be taken allegorically, or poetically. And poetry—true poetry—poetry that is more than mere rhyme or metre—is often the very highest logic. There is more philosophy or genuine logic in the "Te Deum Laudamus" than in the Nicene Creed. And St. Paul was a poet rather than a dialectician. And this paean of the Redeeming Adam, like his paean of the Expectant Creation, is a masterpiece of theological poetry. As such it is an arena for spiritual athletes. Take care to survey it in its scope as a whole rather than inspect it in its details ; otherwise you will speedily be "in labyrinthine mazes lost." In this paragraph great thoughts rush along with such impetuous speed that they sometimes seem to collide. To the mere rhetorician or mere logician the paragraph seems unbalanced and confused. Yet amid the seething maelstrom of truths tower here and there certain landmarks, dissinct, colossal. It is a series of gigantic parallels and at the same time gigantic contrasts ; a succession of august counterparts, yet august antitheses ; a sublime alternation of negative and positive poles of thought, separated by humanity's diameter ; Deep calling unto Deep, as the voice of Jehovah's waterspouts.

Glance at some of these sublime parallels and contrasts. On the one hand, the first Adam ; on the other hand, the second Adam. On the one hand, sin ; on the other hand, righteousness. On the one hand, condemnation ; on the other hand, justification. On the one hand, death ; on the other hand, life. On the one hand, sin abounding ; on the other hand, grace superabounding. On the one hand, one sin, many deaths ; on the other hand, one grace, many lives, In brief, on the one hand, throngh the first Adam, of the earth earthy, loss of the earthy Eden ; on the other hand, through the second Adam, Lord from heaven, gain of the heavenly Eden. That is to say—The heavenly life in the second Adam immeasurably more than balances the earthly life in the first Adam. Good Isaac Watts is right—

> In Christ the tribes of Adam boast
> More blessings than their father lost.
> —Isaac Watts.

Grace Greater than Sin.—Here, then, in this burst of heavenly poetry, we have a key to at least a partial solution of the problem of Evil. Without human sin there could have been no divine grace ; and divine grace is infinitely larger than human sin. True, to the unbeliever this solution is doubtless unsatisfactory. A natural, unspiritual, psychical man receives not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him ; and he cannot know them, because they are spiritually judged, pneumatically examined. Even to the believer, when he fails to use his privilege of rising above narrow and egotistic views of God's providence and redemption, the solution may seem hardly more satisfactory. But when he is in an exalted frame of mind ; when he feels aglow with the sense of gratitude to God for his unspeakable love of Jesus Christ ;—when, forgetting himself and earth and all that is finite, he surveys from the heights of beatific vision the plan and work of Almighty God from beginning to end ; when he adoringly falls into line with Deity's movements, as he—alike Creator and Redeemer—strides on in majesty, from aeon to aeon, world without end ; in short, when the same mind is in him which was in Christ Jesus his Lord upon His heavenly throne :—then the mighty veil is more or less lifted, and he catches momentary yet glowing vistas of the truth that God's permission of "man's fall" is a blessed token of his own far-seeing, overcoming, infinite grace. Now he understands, at least in visions of faith and love, that had there been no sin, there could have been no grace ; "no fall ;" no cross ; no transgression ; no redemption ; no evil ; no Jesus. Now he catches a glimpse into the majestic meaning of Paul's wonderful saying to the saints in Ephesus, and to the faithful in Christ Jesus.

In order that now to the rulers and authorities in the heavenly realms might be made known through the Church the manifold, richly variegated, wisdom of God, according io the purpose of the ages which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord.—Ephesians, iii, 10,11.

Yes, Church of the living God, redeemed from the "fall by the blood of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, thou art the instructor of Angels, teaching them the mysterious things into which they desire to look. Yes, the poet is right—

Earth has a joy unknown in heaven—
The new-born peace of sins forgiven ;
Tears of such pure and deep delight,
Ye angels ! never dimmed your sight.

—A. L. Hillhouse.

Ay, this "much more"—God's own "much more "—is the key to the problem of "man's fall." Jesus Christ, the God-man, disclosing through His own incarnation—(His own life, character, teachings, passion, death, resurrection)—the inmost and otherwise hidden attributes of Godhead, even His eternal righteousness and love, and filling all things with His own adorable, divine—human personality--Jesus the Christ incomparably outweighs "Adam's fall" and all its dire consequences. Thus Samson's riddle—

> Out of the eater came forth meat,
> And out of the strong came forth sweetness.
> —Judges xiv, 14.

has at length been solved. Out of the carcass of the devourer Sin comes forth the manna of Christ's redemption ; out of the dead Lion of the tribe of Judah comes forth the honey of the heavenly immortality. Ay, Sin, with Death and Hades following after, have already been captured by the second Adam, Lord from heaven ; even now they are gleaming in the girdle of His grace as the most dazzling trophies of His eternal victory. Here then, is St. Paul's Theodicy ; divinely anticipating the blind Bard of the Commonwealth as he also sings—

> To the height of this great argument
> I may assert eternal Providence,
> And justify the ways of God to men.
> —Paradise Lost, 1, 24-26.

"Man's Fall and Redemption" a Sublime Instance of "Evolution."—"Man's fall," then, is no surprise ; "Christ's Redemption" is no afterthought. "Fall and Redemption" are the sublimest instances of "Evolution" unfolding according to a Divine Plan eternally crescent. "Fall and Redemption," as a genetic process, is false. "Fall and Redemption," as a Divine Plan, is true. Here is the true song of Degrees or Psalm of Ascents. The laureate is right—

> The God, who ever lives and loves,
> One God, one law, one element,
> And one far-off divine event,
> To which the whole creation moves.
> —In Memoriam, Epilogue.

FINIS CORONAT OPUS.

WAR AS A FACTOR IN CIVILIZATION.

In all ages, the origin, rise, and fall of nations have been attended with violence. Sometimes this violence was conducive to progress and sometimes it hindered progress. Yet, all in all, the present status of civilization could not have been reached without the waging of wars. Man's nature, akin to the animal instinct of defense and conquest, had to be eliminated by slow degrees as the higher faculties of judgment and reason developed.

In the earliest tribal history the objects of war were to secure wives or to take the pastures and provisions of a neighboring tribe. This may have been the natural result of an overcrowded state of society seeking to supply the economic conditions necessary to growth and improvement. Whatever the object, one result was sure to follow : the fittest must survive. The nation that had exercised the greatest genius in the invention of implements, and used its strategy together with physical strength either replaced the weaker nation or made it tributary. With nations as with individuals, struggle for superiority calls into action all their latent energies and develops their mental and material resources. The good fortune to have all the faculties called into action so as to insure a full and free development of all the powers of mind and body, is an advantage not too dearly paid for by the labor and the pain with which it is attended. What we might call the hard fortune of European civilization, the trouble, the toil it has undergone, the violence it has suffered in its course, have been of infinitely more service to the progress of humanity than that tranquil smooth passivity in which other civilizations have run their course.

For the sake of competing successfully in arms, organization in the form of government of some kind was necessary. Theocracy, Monarchy, Aristocracy, Republicanism, all have had their place. Sometimes, yea, often, much too often, a tyrant ascended the throne. Nothing but violence could wrench the scepter from his hand. As these struggles assumed higher and higher forms the great principles of civil and religious liberty were established. Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights are the priceless heritage of the world. To enjoy their full blessing, it must be remembered, that men have paid the great price of the best English blood. Transplanted to the shores of America these principles assumed still higher forms, but it was necessary first to win them and then maintain them by the sword.

War has been the most prominent external factor in the development of exchange and commerce. The earliest collections of goods to be distributed or exchanged consisted of booty taken by marauders. Military leaders exchanged the products of war for the products of peace. War brought different peoples into contact with each other, and opened highways of communication between them. Thus the world was enlarged and men learned that their wants and the wants of their neighbors could be met most easily by exchange. In this we see that violence has ever been a path-breaker for progress and that commerce has ever been a follower in the tracks of war. Before civilization could enter the dark continent or the jungles of India, exploration and conquest preceded. First the soldier and the scientist, then the merchant and the missionary.

In the case of worn out civilization in which art, science and literature once flourished but have long since passed into oblivion, the force of out-side arms comes like refreshing showers on the sandy desert to replenish it. Let English, French and German cannons thunder and roar as though they would wake the mummies sleeping in the pyramids, open the eyes of the Hindoo gods, or call back the spirits of Buddha and Confucius if thereby they can rouse these nations from stagnation and degeneracy and show to them the upward living road to human progress.

Perhaps the grandest result of war is to teach men not to war except in rightness and as far as possible to reduce the causes of war.

Herbert Spencer illustrates the law of progress by the Nebular Hypothesis. The same theory well illustrates the relation of violence and progress. The formation and changes of the earth have been attended by turbulence and confusion of the elements. So, force has always been present in civilization. But we have come so far that mind, under the influence of brotherly love, predominates and we may expect nothing more than an occasional eruption. And if Providence will lengthen out our days a little longer we may hope to see the dawn of a glorious day in universal federation and universal disarmament. Then, and not till then, "will men beat their swords into plow-shares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." Then we may behold "Love and truth meeting, righteousness and peace embracing, truth springing forth from earth and charity looking down from heaven."

C. F. S.

THE FUTURE.

It were not well that we the folds should raise
Of that thick curtain of futurity
Which veils from us tho things that are to be
Amid the shadows of the coming days.
For who of us could tread the common ways
Of life, serene and hopeful, if he saw
The sentence of th' inexorable law,
Like the doomed king, where'er he turned his gaze ?

Kindly the All-wise has kept that prescient lore
Beyond our reach. It is enough to know
Ah ! lesson hard to learn) that, as men sow,
They reap—nor worse, nor better, less nor more.
Tnus taught the Prophets with inspired tongue :
Thus Nature warns and thus her bards have sung.

We desire to say to the student body that contributions are welcome at all times whether stories, sketches, poems, alumni notes, or whatever is suitable for publication in a college paper. We cannot see each one personally and ask him to contribute. If you have anything you think suitable for publication, hand it to some member of the staff and it will certainly not be considered presumption on your part. If you are too modest to have it published over your own name, you may adopt a nom de plume. It is only by all taking an interest in and contributing to the paper that the best results can be secured and we can have a paper truly representative of the intellectual life of Bucknell.

On the twenty-second day of this month—a day formerly noted for the occurrence of scraps between the two lower classes—Bucknell will meet Franklin and Marshall College in the arena of intercollegiate debate. Our various contests with Franklin and Marshall in the past, whether of an athletic or intellectual nature, have been of a most friendly and interesting character. The debate was held last year at Lancaster and so will take place this time at Lewisburg. The judges will not be graduates or in any way connected with either institution so that no unfairness can in manner be charged. The question for debate is: Resolved, That the best interests of Cuba would be promoted by annexation to the United States." There is no doubt but that Bucknell's representatives will ably and nobly sustain the negative side of this question. The system of training through which they have gone has been most excellent and one that cannot fail in providing the best results. Every student should consider it his duty not only to be present on that occasion, but also in the meantime to give assistance in every manner possible to our representatives in order to make victory doubly sure and add another laurel to the many Bucknell has already won in the line of intercollegiate debate.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Another pleasant "At Home" was held in the Institute parlors, Monday, Feb. 6.

Rev. Robert Lowry, D. D., has presented the University with a lot of hymn books.

The Bucknell—Franklin and Marshall debate will be held in Bucknell Hall, Feb. 22.

Bucknell will play State College in basket-ball in the Tustin Gymnasium, Friday evening, Mar. 3.

Mr. S. M. Sayford, of Boston, Mass., addressed the students in Bucknell Hall, Wednesday evening, Feb. 8.

Dr. Perrine lectured at Williamsport, Feb. 2, in a course given by the First Baptist Church of that place.

Arrangements are being made for the annual minstrel show which will probably take place the early part of next month.

An organization has been formed by several upper-classmen in the college for practice in extemporaneous speaking exclusively.

President Harris will deliver the address before the Wyoming Commemorative Association at the Wyoming Monument, Wilkesbarre, July 3.

The Freshman and Sophomore banquets held at the Hotel Haag, Milton, the latter part of last month, were attended with the usual interesting circumstances.

Father Ganss concluded his most excellent and successful series of lectures on "The Evolution of Music" with "The Music of the Future" in Bucknell Hall, Jan. 30.

The greater portion of the electrical equipment of the Central Foundry and Equipment Co., has recently been acquired by the University for our Laboratory. This is a valuable addition.

Major George G. Groff is at present stationed at San Juan, Porto Rico. In addition to his position as brigade surgeon in the army, he is also school commissioner and sanitary inspector for Porto Rico.

Lemuel Moss, D. D., LL. D., of Philadelphia, delivered a series of lectures before the students of the University on "Christian Economies," Feb. 6 and 7. His subjects were: "The Point of View—Postulates"; "Society, Cooperative"; "Religion and the State, Soul Liberty"; and "Our National Perils".

The annual college relay races, held under the auspices of the University of Pennsylvania, will take place this year, April 29, at Franklin Field, Philadelphia. Bucknell is grouped with Franklin and Marshall, Dickinson, Gettysburg, and Ursinus Colleges. The pennant has been won by Bucknell the last two years.

Col. Howard L. Calder, '87, will lecture on "Porto Rico" and Hon. Frank B. Hargrave, '89, on "Manilla," for the benefit of Athletics. The former was Captain of Co. I, 4th P. V. I., and was on provost guard duty at Arroye, Porto Rico, and the latter served with Co. I, 10th P. V. I., in the Philippines. This command participated in the battle of Malate and the fall of Manila.

The Junior Ball was held in the Armory, Friday evening, Feb. 3. The Armory was tastily decorated and the ball was a success in every respect. Music was furnished by Chappel's Orchestra of Williamsport. The patronesses were: Mesdames J. T. Baker, J. C. Bucher, J. F. Duncan, A. A. Leiser, Wm. Leiser, G. B. Miller, N. C. Marsh, T. F. Russell, T. C. Thornton, T. S. Norton, W. C. Walls.

The week of prayer for colleges was observed in the usual manner. Meetings were addressed during the week by Profs. Rockwood, Perrine, Hamblin, and Hulley. The sermon on the day of prayer was preached by Rev. E. M. Poteat, D. D., of Philadelphia, on "The Temptation of Man, and of the Son of Man." He also addressed well attended meetings on "God's First and Final Purpose Concerning Man," "The Highest Life and the Power of the Highest," and "Looking unto Jesus." President Harris also addressed the students at the final meeting.

ALUMNI NOTES.

'52. Rev. A. B. Still, of Danville, Pa., has been greatly bereaved in the death of his wife. She passed away at her home, Dec. 21, 1898, aged 78 years.

Ex-'56. The Rev. Robert Atkinson died January 16, at Ottawa, Kansas, aged 75 years. Some time ago the Standard of Chicago, published a sketch of his life, the sketch being accompanied by a photograph. Mr. Atkinson was one of the pioneer preachers of Kansas, and did much to contribute to the growth and welfare of Ottawa University.

'59. Rev. A. D. Hawn, D. D., recently celebrated the twentieth anniversary of his pastorate of the Presbyterian Church of Delaware, Ohio.

'69. The Rev. Edmund Wells has removed from Kershaw, S. C., to Lake Helen, Fla.

'73. Rev. J. W. Allen, formerly of Lake City, Ia., is now located at Decorah, Ia.

'74. Dr. David J. Hill, First Assistant Secretary of State, contributes an article to the February Forum on "The War and the Extension of Civilization."

'74 and '84. Hons. Ward R. Bliss and F. B. Hargrave, members of the Penna. House of Representatives, are among those who are opposing the re-election of Senator Quay.

'75. Robert D. Evans, of Wilksbarre, died February 1st, from injuries received in escaping from a burning building. He was a son of the late T. G. Evans, of Lewisburg. For several years he has been a practicing attorney in Wilksbarre. In the death of Mr. Evans Bucknell has lost a loyal alumnus.

'80. A picture and sketch of the life of S. Lewis Ziegler, M. D., appeared in a recent issue of The North American in a series on the leading physicians of Philadelphia.

'82. W. M. Datesman is Manager of the United States Life Insurance Co., of New York, and has an office at 312 Bullitt Building, Philadelphia.

'85. W. P. Beaver is at present connected with the American Tin Plate Co., Chicago, Ill.

'87. Col. Howard Calder will lecture in Bucknell Hall in the near future on a subject pertaining to the war.

'87. Prof. W. A. Harley has resigned his position as teacher in the Public schools of Reading where he has been engaged for five years. A considerable increase in salary induced him to accept a position in the Erasmus High School of Brooklyn.

'88. The Rev. Geo. W. Hatch has resigned the pastoral care of the Wynn Memorial Chapel, Camden, N. J., and removes to Cherry Valley, Ashtabula Co., Ohio.

'89. The mother of Hon. F. B. Hargrave died at her home in Greensburg, Pa., on Jan. 8, 1899.

'89. Rev. T. W. Booth at the close of his first year's pastorate at Jeannette, Pa., reports 63 additions to the membership.

'89. Hon. Edwin Heister Guie has been elected speaker of the House of Representatives of the state of Washington. Mr. Guie is a successful lawyer in Seattle.

Ex-'89. The Rev. J. W. Neyman has removed from Aberdeen, Wash., to Chicago. In addition to his duties as the new pastor of the Englewood Park Baptist Church, he has assumed the position of Eastern Manager of the H. Parmelee Library Co.

'90. The Revs. W. C. McNaul and Howard Hanson, Ex-'91, pastors respectively of the Grace and Messiah Baptist Churches, Chicago, have tendered their resignations. Hanson will be remembered as one of Bucknell's champion football players, who completed his course at the University of Chicago.

'95. Joseph Carey is principal of the Pottsgrove High School.

'95. Benj. K. Brick is a senior in the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania.

'97. Herbert B. Moyer is taking a special course at the University of Pennsylvania.

'97. W. M. Bunnell has opened a law office at 301 and 302 Mears Building, Scranton, Pa.

Ex-'99. Ned L. Kaufman is reading law in one of the prominent Philadelphia offices.

Ex-'99. Miss Laura L. Allen is Assistant Principal of the Ulysses High School in Potter Co., Pa.

Ex-'01. A. A. Earle has been given a position in the weather department at Ithica, N. Y.

Rev. R. M. Roderick, a former student, has been called to the pastorate of the Dudley St. Baptist Church, Dunmore, Pa.

THE COLLEGE WORLD.

The gross receipts taken in for the year by the Harvard foot ball team were $48,490. The expenses of the team amounted to $10,750.

Among our latest exchanges are found The Western University Courant and The Allegheny Literary Monthly both of which creditably represent the schools that issue them.

An interesting feature of the January number of The College Student is a symposium on "Should Franklin and Marshall College become a University." The majority of the writers seem to favor it remaining a college.

HOPE.

A PIANO AT A NONIMAL PRICE.

Chicago's largest music house, Lyon & Healy, have bought for a fraction of its cost, the entire stock of Lyon, Potter & Co. These splendid pianos, are offered without reserve until all are sold. In this stock are a number new Steinway pianos, and hundreds of new and second-hand pianos including instruments of the following well-known makes: Sterling, Huntingdon, A. B. Chase, Vose, Fischer, Weber, Chickering, G. W. Lyon, etc., etc. In square pianos there are fine-toned instruments at $25, $40, $60 and upwards. In Upright Pianos neat instruments at $100, $120, $140, $150, $165, $190, $200 and upwards. In Baby Grands some nice specimens at $250 and upwards. Nearly all these pianos were intended to sell for at least double these clearing sale prices. A good plan would be to order a piano, leaving the selection of it to Lyon & Healy. However they will send a list and full particulars upon application, Any piano not proving entirely satisfactory may be returned at their expense. Address simply, Lyon & Healy, Chicago. Distance is no obstacle in taking advantage of this remarkable chance to obtain a piano, for in proportion to the saving to be made in freight charges are insignificant.

Write to-day so as to avoid disappointment.

The Senora's Granddaughters

By Janie Prichard Duggan. 12mo, 328 pp. Price, 90 cents net; postpaid, $1.00.

This is a fascinating and exceedingly well written story of Mexican life. It pictures school girl life, and gives some idea of the Romish Church.

In the Way.

By Grace Livingston Hill, a niece of the famous "Pansy." 12mo, 377 pp. Price $1.10 net; postpaid, $1.22.

This is a tale of the influence of a cultured Christian girl on two rough and somewhat uncouth brothers.

It is a good book for girls. Giving us a glimpse of a life really worth living.—The Christian Mirror.

Lone Point: A Summer Outing

By Grace Livingston Hill. Illustrated. 12mo, 320 pp. Price, $1.10 net; postpaid, $1.22.

"Draws the characters of two daughters of a father once rich, but reduced to moderate means. One of the daughters is by nature and habit a true Christian, the other becomes one through the experience related in this charming story. It is a most valuable book for Sunday-schools."—The Boston Globe.

Shar Burbank: Her Love Story

THE EARLY DAYS OF THETA ALPHA.

BY ROBERT LOWRY, D. D., '54.

The genesis of the Literary Society in connection with Lewisburg was without ostentation. At a time when all the departments of the University were bivouacked in the basement of the old Baptist church, a few advanced spirits met together for literary purposes. They took a name from the Greek grammar, and called themselves Tau Delta Theta. Admission to membership was at the will of the organizers. The accommodations were meagre, but the impulse was high. The survivors are few, but their memory of those humble days is pleasant.

When the University abandoned the lowlands and took possession of College Hill, a new order was established. Professor Stephen W. Taylor, then at the head of the institution, believed that the boys needed a paternal government. Two lists of names were made, as nearly equal in numbers and calibre as might be, comprising all the College students, and these two lists were made to serve as the bases of two Literary Societies. This mechanical division was not subject to any alteration. The student had the option of entering the Society to which he had been allotted, or enjoying himself outside of all Societies. There was some demurring at first, but the order was inflexible. Ultimately nearly all the students conformed to it, the obvious benefits of the association being sufficient to overcome any natural reluctance at entering into what might turn out to be an uncongenial fellowship.

In determining the question of name, one of these Societies adopted two Greek words which stand for piety and morals.

Theta Alpha was the expression of a lofty ideal in the domain of faith and rectitude. Though neither sonorous nor mellifluous, it was heartily accepted for its significance, and no one was found who wished to change it for something more scholastic or pretentious. The Theta Alpha boys always believed that they constituted the better half of the College. It was a great comfort to have that conviction, and nobody seems to have been hurt by it. Doubtless a like inspiring thought was entertained by the other Society. It is always encouraging to be able to hurrah for our side. For many years, the Theta Alpha graduates were accustomed to point with pride to the increasing number of their fellow members who were attaining positions of distinction and usefulness. Perhaps they still indulge in this pardonable exultation.

It was a great day when the West Wing was completed, and Theta Alpha took possession of the new home in the northwest corner. Dignified with the appellation of "Hall," it was nothing but a room of modest dimensions, in which, perhaps, four students might have found breathing space for study. But, compared with all that had gone before, it was spacious and sumptuous. Furnished with carpet, chairs, desk and curtains, it became a field for forensic combats and parliamentary discipline that could not fail to inspire and develop the intellectual acumen of the entire body. The keen-edged comments of the imperial Censor were anticipated with mingled eagerness and dread, and were followed by long breaths of relief or waves of exhileration, according as the "winged words" glanced or struck home. No one of the early boys will ever forget those Friday afternoons when such men as George I. McLeod, Malachi and E. G. Taylor, Charles M. Deitz, George Frear, Jerome B. Morse, Ira Foster and many others, stripped for the fray and made things lively. Nearly all these men have passed away, but the remembrance of them has a vivid place in the minds of those who survive them.

One of the favorite exercises of Theta Alpha was the frequent tinkering with the Constitution and By-Laws. The desire for change was a constant factor, and the ability to make things new was inexhaustible. Sometimes a mere verbal modification would suffice; at other times the whole organic law would be demolished, and a brand new structure erected in its place. When the present writer was graduated, the Constitution was supposed to be so near to perfection that the sharpest eye would fail to find a serious flaw in it for many years to come. Two years afterward, happening to get a sight of the then fundamental law, he found that not a scrap of that perfect Constitution remained. The substance, indeed, was there, but the old forms had vanished. Nor should this iconoclasm be wondered at, for the student, held steadily for nine hours a day to the hardest of hard work, feels, when the pressure is removed, as if he must go out and break something. And the Constitution can stand it.

With great enthusiasm the Theta Alpha boys entered upon the project of founding a Library of their own. Much money was collected, many books were contributed, a convenient book-case was ordered, and everybody was proud of the successful enterprise. Gradually it dawned upon the boys that a Library was more bother than it was worth. The Library was necessarily limited in scope, and must ever remain so. Those who had time and taste for reading wanted books other than those which the Library provided. Few additions were made after the first spurt. The Library became a problem. Finally, after a full discussion of the matter in a regular meeting, it was voted, unanimously and gladly, to transfer the whole collection to the Society for Religious Inquiry, with whom it found a quiet resting place on the fourth floor of the West Wing. It was a great relief to get rid of it.

When an evening in Commencement Week was set apart by the authorities as the Anniversary of the Literary Societies, Theta Alpha rose to the occasion. One of the great questions was the devising of an appropriate badge. The committee of arrangements taxed its combined skill in producing an emblem which the boys called a stunner. From across the big Hall the spectator looked upon a body of graceful youth, each one bearing on his lapel a parallelogram of bright red, from which shone in glittering white the two Greek letters which formed the cabalistic anagram of the Society. This artistic triumph was achieved not without the aid of the village maidens. A few yards of cloth, some sheets of pasteboard, a few pieces of glazed cardboard, a choice selection of deft fingers with needle and thread, some light refreshments thrown in, smiles and suavity at intervals, and the thing was done. What wonder that, next year, there was eagerness for place on the committee? And what wonder that, all through the year, the gentle girls of the village lived in hope that they might have another chance of glorifying Theta Alpha? Bright days were those in the far-off olden time. It might be difficult to recall the distinguished strangers who filled the Hall with their oratory, but no one who lived the life of Theta Alpha in those primitive days will ever forget his comrades, or the dear friends who, more than once, helped to make the Theta Alpha life beautiful.

THE EARLY DAYS OF EUEPIA.

BY FRANKLIN H. LANE, EX-'53.

In tracing the history of a Literary Society, certain primal causes leading up to its organization must be considered, much in the same way as we would consider the circumstances that led to the founding of the institution of learning with which it is connected; as the history of the one must necessarily be in part the history of the other. Without going into the details of the herculean task that involved much anxious thought, skillful planning and earnest prayer to found and establish the University at Lewisburg, it will suffice for our present purpose, briefly to state that the Northumberland Baptist Association felt the need of an institution of learning in central Pennsylvania and in 1845 appointed a committee consisting of William H. Ludwig, M. D., Rev. Charles Tucker, Rev.

J. E. Bradley, Rev. J. G. Miles and James Moore, Sr., which reported August 14th, that "a high school for males, another for females, a college and also a Theological Institute," should be established in central Pennsylvania. On the 27th of the following December, Prof. Stephen W. Taylor agreed to act as General Agent. On the 5th of February, 1846, the Charter of the University at Lewisburg was signed by Francis Rawn Shunk, Governor of Pennsylvania. Prof. Stephen W. Taylor was elected Principal of the school. October 5, 1846, the school was opened in the basement of the Baptist church in Lewisburg Pa., which furnished three good sized rooms for assembly, chapel, lecture, study and recitation purposes; also a good sized yard in the rear of the church, where many a tussle testing strength, games of ball and other athletic sports afforded physical exercise and gave keener zest for study. In 1847 College classes were organized. Students thirsty for forensic power and ambitious to surpass Demosthenes, Cicero, Webster and Clay organized the Calliopean Literary Society, which met once a week in the south recitation room of the church.

To relieve the congested condition of the main room, the young men, who could be trusted, were provided with a room on Main Street where, under a monitor selected by themselves, day by day their lessons were prepared and at stated hours they went to their respective classes in the church to recite. About that time a crisis that threatened the life of the young institution had to be met, as a large percentage of the more advanced students, not satisfied with their environment and out-look, secretly arranged to leave in a body and enter older institutions, believing that diplomas granted by an old college would give them better standing and many advantages in after life. But Prof. Stephen W. Taylor discovered the plot and, with the aid of some of us who were loyal to the young institution, succeeded in retaining the dissatisfied students and thereby at a critical moment saved the University at Lewisburg

In 1848 the Academy building on College Hill was completed; its size, fifty by eighty feet and three stories high, gave us the much needed room. The long expected day for moving came at last; it was an eventful day in the history of the University, full of interest and hope to every student and friend of the institution. On the upper floor of the new building, each student, male and female, was provided with a chair and desk, and arranged in rows from front to rear of the room. The ladies occupied the west side of the room and faced to the west. The gentlemen occupied the east side of the room and faced to the east, so that the sexes were back to back, but this arrangement did not prevent the sly glance over the shoulder, or the winning and sometimes blushing smile from each to each. As soon as we were well settled in the new building, the faculty divided the young men into two divisions as nearly equal in numbers and ability as possible, each division to organize itself into a literary society. I have not been able to obtain a full list of original names in either of the divisions and having only a small amount of suitable data at hand, I must depend largely on memory running back half a century for the names, incidents, and facts connected with the "Early Days of Euepia."

Original Euepia members as far as I can recall them are as follows: David F. Carnahan, Lewis Merrill, James Anderson Kelley, Joseph P. Tustin, Asa P. Weylert, George Good, Reeder M. Fish, William H. Armstrong, Agustus H. Long, John H. Lukens, Francis P. Beck, Obijah Rittenhouse, S. H. Wilson, Joseph G. McMeen Washington Barnhurst, John A. Grier and Moses Heath. New students were allotted so as to keep the two societies nearly equal. Euepia was temporarily organized at the close of the summer session of 1850, in the Academy building. Joseph P. Tustin, Reeder M. Fish ank James T. Lane were appointed as a committee to draft a constitution. On the 9th of November, 1850, the society met and appointed David McM. Gregg to the chair and William H. Armstrong, Sec., pro tem. The committee reported a constitution, which was adopted in sections. The child having been born must have a name. "Literary Adelphi" was proposed as a name by Joseph P. Tustin. "Philophradean," by David F. Carnaham, "Eurotopean," by James

T. Lane, and "Philotopeàn," by Reeder M. Fish. They could not agree and laid the naming on the table. At the next meeting (Nov. 16th), "Euepia," was adopted as the name of the society. The constitution was finally adopted at the meeting of Nov. 30, 1850. At the meeting of Dec. 7, 1850, the following officers were elected: President, Reeder M. Fish; Vice President, James Anderson Kelly; Rec. Sec., Joseph P. Tustin; Cor. Sec., David F. Carnahan; Treas., Edward W. Moore; Librarian, John H. Lukens; First Critic, William H. Armstrong; Censor, James F. Lane; Chaplin, James Anderson Kelley. The first]uestion for debate in Euepia was: "Is a Protective Tariff Conducive to National Prosperity?" Aff., Lane; Neg., Fish; meeting of Dec. 7, 1850. It seeme that some minds are not yet clear on that old question. The "Theta Alpha" Literary Society was oaganized about the same time.

The west wing of the college building was completed in 1850, and the two literary societies moved into the rooms provided for them on the second floor of the new building. Each society furnished its own room.

In the early days of Euepia, facilities for acquiring a liberal education were very few, especially in the rural districts, where public schools were kept open only three months in the year, and many of them were but little better than play houses. There were comparatively few High Schools, Academies or Colleges, and but few of them well equipped. Comparatively few young people could get away from home to attend school until they were twenty-one years of age; consequently Euepians and most all students were well advanced in years and could fully appreciate their opportunities. In the early days of the University at Lewisburg, outside of a thoroughly educated, skillful, and devoted faculty, students had but few helps; the library was small and scientific apparatus quite limited. But the spiritual influences were healthful and many students were led to Christ, especially so by the able and soul-stirring preaching and consecrated life of that noble man of God, Prof. George R. Bliss, D. D., LL. D.

In the early days of Euepia there were only a few miles of rail-road in the country, and students as well as others had to travel on foot, by private conveyances, stage or canal-boat. Our country was at war with Mexico. California gold excitement turned many heads. The slavery question would not down, but was disturbing the public mind, and a decade later culminated in secession and the War of the Rebellion, which was the most sanguinary and expensive war known in modern history, resulting in wiping out the curse of slavery and firmly uniting our country under one flag. Certain Euepians distinguished themselves in the War of the Rebellion. It would be interesting to follow Euepians along their eventful and useful lives; but this article is already overgrown.

THE REAL GENIUS OF HOME.

"Blow high, blow low, not all your snow
Can quench our hearth fire's ruddy glow!"
Sang one, detailing in sweet rhyme
Quaint stories of the olden time.
Control my thoughts I never could,— Perverse I ask, "Who got the wood?"

"What matter how the North Wind raved!
What matter how the night behaved!"
The poet saith, since threats so dire
Were set at naught by glowing fire.
But still saith my prosaic soul,
"That may be true,—who got the coal?"

For even Home's ideal light
Can't elevate a zero night,
And stories, though pronounced "hot stuff"
Can't keep the hearers warm enough;
Give honor where's it's due.—Rate higher
The faithful soul who tends the fire!

O. M. W.

ZETA LITERARY SOCIETY.

BY MAUD ELIZABETH HANNA, A. M., '97.

"This Society shall be called, 'The Zeta Literary Society of Bucknell University.'

"The object of this Society shall be to cultivate liberal principles, to diffuse knowledge among its members, and to secure their advancement socially, intellectually and morally.

"The Motto of this Society shall be 'Utile Dulci.'

"The colors shall be light-blue and gold."—Thus tersely expressed in her constitution do we find the first chronicle of Zeta Literary Society.

Co-education had become an established fact at Bucknell, and by its very growth had fostered the constantly increasing desire for the all-round development of the college woman.

Why should the harvest of advantage, derived from voluntary participation in formal debate be reaped solely by the men of the University? Is not the womanliness of the college girl increased rather than lessened, by the self-possession surely to be acquired by the essayist, orator or impersonator, who seeks to give her best in the presence of college associates? Then, too, the representative young women of many of our leading centres of education were enthusiastically advocating the literary organization as a great factor in the social and moral life of the student. Could Bucknell rightfully remain longer indifferent to this phase of the question?

In response to queries such as these, Zeta made her debut in literary circles on the tenth of October, eighteen hundred and ninety-five. Nor was her "coming out" unattended with eclat; for Euepia and Theta Alpha played the chivalrous to the debutante during the entire year in quite approved fashion. Her recognition by the Faculty of the University was also encouragingly cordial.

The first few weeks of Zeta's history is largely parliamentary in character. After due deliberation, the constitution, framed much like that of her brother societies, was submitted to the Faculty of the College, and the prompt recognition by this body of a literary society for college women was interpreted as an auspicious omen.

The youthful organization was first known to the world as "Hyperion." More sober judgement, however, suggested the advisability of a Greek letter title expressive of the purpose of the new society. In accordance with this generally accepted amendment the change was made to "Zeta," "seekers."

The charter members of Zeta numbered twenty-five. These were chiefly young women registered in the regular collegiate courses, but included in addition a few friendly "specials." At this time Bucknell was fortunate in enrolling among her graduate students Miss Mary Belle Harris, daughter of President Harris. Eligible, according to the constitution, to any office in the society, Miss Harris was made president, in which capacity she served most efficiently for two terms. At the same initial election the remaining offices were filled as follows: Vice-president, Maud Elizabeth Hanna; secretary, Mary Cotton; treasurer, Anna May Gilchrist; critics, Mary Moore Wolfe, Rosa Louise Hartley; executive committee, Laura Louise Allen, Clarissa Louise Fowler.

The duties of the above committee are defined thus: "To care for the Society Hall, and see that it is kept in order; also to see that the hall is warmed and lighted at the regular time of meeting." Deeply appreciative of habits of industry acquired during the first year of college residence, the organization conferred this honor upon members of the freshman class, to be their peculiar right and that of the "generations following."

That a permanent place of meeting be assured the society, the use of Buckell Institute parlors was granted for every alternate Thursday evening. Here, with almost uninterrupted regularity Bucknell's college daughters have gathered during the past two and one-half years.

Essay, oration, debate, dramatic impersonation together with music, vocal and instrumental, have furnished entertaining and helpful programs. A feature especially worthy of mention is the "Blue and Gold," an original sheet comprising the leading departments of journalism, which is read at the final meeting of each term by the editor-in-chief.

The progress of the society, although not always uniform, has been constant, and at the present writing there is every evidence of energy and interest in the conduct of the meetings.

It was the privilege of her friends to attend a short time ago a Mock Trial given by Zeta. The increased seating capacity was taxed beyond measure. The audience was expectantly attentive as the case proceeded with fitting dignity. The clever and humorous evidence produced, the earnestness of the legal participants, the deliberation of the jury, and the guidance of court transactions by the judge, testified more eloquently than words to the value to college women of such an organization.

Zeta, moreover, has been by no means indifferent to the social interests of herself and friends, as from time to time she has heartily enjoyed holding a reception in costumes of "ye olden tyme," entertaining with pantomime or other varied festivities.

Zeta Literary Society is however still young in years and experience. In cognizance of this fact it is with modesty and diffidence that her historian enters the records of so comparatively recent an organization upon the page favored by the honored representatives of Euepia and Theta Alpha.

Memory readily calls to mind the happy associations of college days when the experiment seemed a somewhat hazardous undertaking, when the query, unuttered or expressed, "Will Zeta live?" demanded constant affirmation. With pleasure truant Fancy wanders in the early days of Zeta, where the Misses Wolfe, Cotton, Rohrer ('96), Hartley, Goddard, Taylor and Owens ('97), Slifer, Chambers, Sprague, Rodgers and Bolenius ('98), proved her staunch adherents in every crisis. These are now passed beyond our classic walls, while the Misses Sharpless, Watkins, Dewolfe, Stevens and

Sprague ('99,) many of whom were charter members continue faithful to the present, lending heart and head for the welfare of the society so dear to every recent alumna.

> "'Tis a fragrant retrospection, for the living thoughts that start
> Into being are like perfumes from the blossom of the heart;
> * * * * * * *
> Yet with eagerness and rapture all my visions I resign,
> To greet the living presence of that old sweet-heart of mine."

The past of Zeta Literary is a fragrant memory to those who loved her "maiden effort." To-day she is a "living presence." Her future, who can tell ?

A SURVEY OF THE LITERARY SOCIETIES.

BY LLEWELLYN PHILLIPS, A. M., '92.

Let us view the Literary Societies by observing what they were in their best days, their decline, their revival and their present status.

The Literary Societies in eastern institutions saw their best days before 1876. In 1870 there were only sixty-four students in Bucknell ; but the membership of the societies was sixty. In 1851 one of the societies laid a capitation tax of six dollars upon each member to defray the expenses of furnishing its room in west wing, and most of the furniture in the room occupied at present, including the library now deposited in the general library, was bought before the late seventies.

Formerly all business was transacted behind closed doors ; sub rosa were the words. The old constitution emphasized secrecy, and the minutes tell us that on one occasion a member was dismissed under this solemn charge : "You must not make known what you have seen or heard within these walls."

Secrecy breeds rivalry. The student to-day cannot appreciate the desire of the old graduate to have his Society well represented on the platform at the Commencement Anniversary. The clash of the Societies in all kinds of contests was sometimes intense. This rivalry led to the abandonment of the publication of the "College Herald," which had been in charge of a board composed of an equal number of members from each Society.

Organization tends to sociability and the recognition of social ties. On the minutes are spread many expressions of sympathy and good will; resolutions of condolence, entertainment by a member of the Society, farewells to the Seniors. Then there was a presentation of a large cake by the retiring president. Here is one report: "In accordance with the old established custom Mr. Martin, the retiring president, presented the Society with a large and excellent cake, bearing the inscriptions, "Euepia" and "Fit Via Vi." During the cutting of the cake several members were called upon and responded in neat little speeches. Resolutions of thanks were presented and general good feeling prevailed." Perhaps it would not be out of place to remark in passing that the same kind-hearted person to-day presents to the students palatable, delicious and solid food.

But numbers, finances, secrecy, rivalry and sociability did not constitute the Societies. The cementing power was better and stronger. The living aim may be summed up in these words: Literary culture, oratory, extemporaneous speaking and debate. These were the sine qua non.

Within and without the college halls marvelous changes have taken place and every phase of college life has felt the effects. Athletics, fraternities, departmental students and professors, and new ideals of school life have grown up in the soil from which the Literary Societies drew their vitality, and this growth of specialization has assimilated most of the nourishment—perchance the Societies died that they might live again.

In all colleges the decline was a gradual one. About twenty-five years ago signs of decay appeared in our institution. In 1875 we read, "There has been a gradual decline for two years," in 1878 a union of the two Societies is suggested; in 1882 the "Mirror" wails, "they have been languishing for some time." The record of meetings for the spring term of 1884 and the two succeding spring terms is respectively six, four and one. Excepting an occasional spurt, as in 1889 during the inter-society debate for the "silver cup," they continued in a languid state until the early nineties.

With the decreased interest the spirit and traditions passed away. Rivalry and finances were allotted to athletics, secrecy, to fraternities; the "College Herald" fell into the possession of a more representative body; the libraries, containing 1000 volumes, gradually diminished, and the remnant was deposited in the general library; the rooms were slightly neglected; in short, at one time it was suggested that the Societies be transferred to Dr. Groff with the request that they be properly classified among the fossils in the museum.

However they have risen as they fell, gradually. The causes of the revival are three : first the spread of intercollegiate debating ; second, the increase of students, making it unnecessary for a few men to assume all the duties outside of the classroom; third, the character of the students who have devoted themselves to the Societies. In the halls on the second floor of the main building there assemble on Friday evening men who are here to get and give the best.

It is difficult to select with accuracy the salient characteristics of the Societies of to-day. There are slight indications of a new social spirit. Literary culture, in the sense of belles-lettres, has been consigned to the classroom. There is an occasional bust of oratory, but most of the speaking is like Mark Antony's. There do abide with their original force, extemporaneous speaking, the cure for weak knees and tied tongues, and debate, the developer of clear and rapid thinking; and the indications are that within a year or two the Societies will produce a large number of debaters of whom the institution will be proud. In one respect the present differs from the past; the thought in debate and in other work is centered almost entirely on current questions.

Now what ideal should be kept before the mind? More emphasis should be laid upon preparations in form and matter, and this can be done now since a member is not assigned work every other night. Every subject considered should be made scholarly in itself, but the man and the method of handling make it scholarly. By supplying an outlet for thought and reading, literary, scientific and practical, the Societies should teach the student to unite culture and life.

THE VALUE TO A LAWYER OF TRAINING IN A LITERARY SOCIETY.

BY JUDGE MARTIN BELL, '69.

It is sometimes said that the age of oratory has passed. This, to a certain extent, is true. The daily paper is found in almost every home, and it has become a more potent factor in moulding public sentiment than is the public speaker. The press, to a great extent, has supplanted the rostrum, Moreover, this same influence of the press pervades the jury box, and jurors, in important cases, are not so likely to be moved, by the fervid appeals of counsel, in the present day as they once were.

But, in no period in the history of the bar has there been greater need, on the part of the advocate, for the power to speak clearly, concisely and forcibly, than at the present time. Clearness of expression is almost an indispensable requisite to success in litigated cases. A legal proposition perspicuously stated is half argued; oftentimes requires no elaboration; sometimes proves itself. Let the same legal thought be expressed in a bungling manner, with want of precision, and the words used only tend to becloud the idea, and to engender doubt instead of conviction. Clearness and aptness of expression is valuable not only in the technical legal argument to the judge, but likewise in addresses to the jury. The attorney who is able in a clear manner to state his facts to the jury, and, in addition, has the ability, by the use of apt and expressive language, to fit such facts to the law applicable to the case, is in a fair way to win such of his cases as ought to be won. If in addition his manner of speech is forcible he will, almost inevitably, win all of his cases which are meritorious. By forcible speaking is meant not mere volume of voice, not mere empty bellowing, but that characteristic manner of speech, exemplified in various types and phases, which seemingly indicates that the speaker himself believes what he is saying, and is endeavoring, to the best of his ability, to impress his hearers with the truth of his assertions. In these days, when appellate courts enforce a time limit, and when, even in the trial court, judge and jury alike grow restive under a long drawn out argument, the quality of conciseness is likewise of value to the advocate.

The art of clearness, aptness and forcefulness in written composition will not suffice. Most of the speaking of the legal advocate is extemporaneous. His addresses to a jury are almost always necessarily so. Before a legal argument he may have ample time to thoroughly saturate himself with his case, but, even then, his prepared line of thought may be interrupted by the rasping voice of the judge, "Oh, we all agree with you on that point; don't waste any time discussing it; turn your attention to this legal proposition, which it strikes us, is the pinch of the case." Under such circumstances the lawyer must be quick to adapt himself to the new phase of the argument, fertile in resources. In a moment he may be compelled to abandon not only the prepared verbiage of his speech, but even its very analysis. The successful lawyer must be prepared not only to talk while on his feet, but also to think while he is talking, and that too with the least possible showing of discomfiture or embarrassment.

How shall the lawyer acquire these qualities, this power? How shall he become a clear, forcible and persuasive extemporaneous speaker? In exceptional cases the power is a gift of nature, but in most instances it is an acquired one; acquired by practice and hard work. When shall such practice be indulged in? Before a court, at the expense of clients, with the mortifying accompaniments of embarrassment and failure, or in some preliminary training school ? In most cases some of this practice must be had in the court, in the trial of the actual case. The most able debater generally finds the court room vastly different from the debating society. But if the ability to speak extemporaneously, in a clear and forcible manner, has been acquired by preliminary practice, the trained debater soon learns to adapt himself to the changed condition of the actual court.

This brings me down to the thought which I desire to emphasize, and to impress on the mind of each young man at Bucknell, who aspires to become a successful lawyer. Don't neglect your literary society ; avail yourself of every opportunity therein to acquire the ability of clear and forcible extemporaneous speech. In my college days the literary society was the only place, known to the curriculum, set apart for the acquisition of such ability. Remember that in most cases practise, and practise alone makes perfect. Better far for you to endeavor to overcome your lack of coherent thought while on your feet, and the refusal of your tongue to respond to the thought of your brain, in the literary society, than in the actual forum with an actual issue involved. Rest assured of this, if you cannot speak extemporaneously, with some degree of fluency and force, in the literary society, you need not hope or expect to be suddenly endowed with that power when you are first called to the bar. You will then be required to acquire such power, not in the literary society among friends, where your mistakes are harmless, but, possibly before a criticising public and at the expense of, and loss of, clients.

My own college literary society days were pleasant, and, to a certain extent, profitable ; my only regret is that I did not fully avail myself of the opportunities then and there afforded. Stephens, Harris, Humpstone, Forgues, Phillips, (pardon me gentlemen for not appending your present titles) Bogert, Grier and Leiser were some of my contemporaries in Theta Alpha. We debated the question, "Shall President Johnson be impeached ?" and kindred topics then occupying the public attention, with as much earnestness as the present college student, doubtless, is discussing, "Shall we retain the Philippines ?"

THE VALUE OF THE COLLEGE LITERARY SOCIETY.

BY HON. DAVID J. HILL, LL .D., '74; REV. J. S. WRIGHTNOUR, D. D., '69, AND REV. A. J. ROWLAND, D. D., '62.

EDITOR BUCKNELL MIRROR :

MY DEAR SIR : Your letter of Feb. 3rd, asking me to write something for the March number of the MIRROR was duly received and I had intended to comply with your request but, owing to the pressure of other matters, I fear I have postponed it too long. I have, therefore, only time to say that when I was a student at Bucknell University from 1870–74, I was an enthusiastic member of the Euepia Literary Society, rarely missing a meeting and almost always participating in the exercises, especially in the debates. I have always considered the debating society a most important adjunct to an educational course and have regarded the apparent general decay of these societies in our colleges and universities with extreme regret. Nothing is more useful to an American citizen than the ability to stand up without previous preparation and to speak intelligently upon public subjects. The older I grow, and the more experience I have, the deeper is my aversion to merely extempore talk. I feel more and more that no man has the right to claim the attention of his fellow beings in public discourse without the most painstaking and conscientious preparation, and this quite irrespective of his age, eminence or previous familiarity with the subject; but at the same time, ease, grace and facility do not come from any specific preparation but from long experience in public speaking. This cannot begin too early, for the period of crudity is sure to be somewhat extended. I am glad to understand that at Bucknell University the Literary Societies still have a hold upon the time and attention of the students. I hope they will always continue to have. Personally, I look back upon my hours in the debating hall as among the most profitable of my college days. Very truly yours,

DAVID J. HILL.

Department of State, Washington, D. C.

EDITOR BUCKNELL MIRROR: I have been much interested in what has been said in the MIRROR about the value, to the student, of the Literary Societies. No one can realize this fully till in later life. Those who fail to avail themselves of the privileges afforded by these societies miss what the writer, at least, found to be one of the most valuable of the means of training in the whole college course. To no one thing, in that course, does he owe so much, in the way of practical helpfulness, as to this.

In the knowledge of parliamentary law, and of the ordinary rules of order in deliberative bodies, attained thereby, and in the training secured for the speedy and correct dispatch of business in public meetings, it has proved to be helpful, scores of times.

In cultivating the habit of extempore speech, of "thinking on one's feet," and so securing greater readiness of utterance, this training in the literary society was of uncounted value to the young Freshman, the timid boy of fourteen, who, thirty-three years later, writes these lines.

None of the rhetorical exercises, or essays, of the college course afforded exactly this training. Athletic training is valuable, no doubt, and there probably is no real need of making a choice as between the two, but if there were any need of making one, let not the literary and intellectual training of the literary society be sacrificed, to "Foot-ball," at all events.

Perhaps if excellence in the work of the Literary Society (as determined by some public meeting) were to be made to contribute to the grade of the student on graduation, it might be well. Yet, after all, there is a special value in the purely voluntary character of the work done in the Literary Society which adds greatly to its moral and educational value.

In short, those who miss this training will do so to their lifelong loss, and future regret. Let me, out of my own experience of its value, again urge upon every student, who wishes to make his future life count for the most, not to miss this means of culture, at whatever sacrifice.

EDITOR BUCKNELL MIRROR: The Literary Society in a college is, in my judgment, almost equal to an extra professor. By the written essay or paper and the oral debate it gives students an opportunity to cultivate their powers of expression, which they cannot find elsewhere. It offers a certain freedom which the ordinary class-room lacks and which is very necessary if men are to do their best. It will be found, I think, that the men who are most prominent in the college Literary Society are the best fitted for subsequent public life. One reason why so many fine scholars fail after leaving college is the fact that they took no advantage of the Literary Society while in college, and thus deprived themselves of a form of preparation needed to make their knowledge available.

In my judgment, also, college fraternities, in which I heartily believe, cannot take the place of the Literary Society. They are adapted to the cultivation of the social side of student life, and on this account are valuable. But they do not supply either the opportunity or the incentive to literary or forensic work to be found in the literary society, which brings the entire student force into the arena. It is my sincere conviction that college life suffers greatly when the fraternity displaces the Literary Society or practically brings it into contempt. I see no reason why the two should not flourish side by side and be mutually complementary.

When I was in college, nearly forty years ago, the two literary societies, both of which I think still exist, were maintained with great vigor. I have no doubt that many men, then students at Lewisburg, look back, like myself, to the Saturday morning hours spent in Theta Alpha and Euepia Halls as among the most delightful and helpful of the college course.

INTER-COLLEGIATE DEBATE AT BUCKNELL.

BY J. R. L. DIGGS, A. B., '98.

The spirit of an institution finds full expression only when every phase of its life is set forth. The dispositions of students are so varied that their highest development can be secured only by such manly contests as will call forth the physical and intellectual powers under the most favorable conditions.

In the various fraternities, clubs and associations of a musical, athletic or literary character, there is ample scope for the proper development of many essentials to a noble and exalted manhood. At Lewisburg all these interests had a share of attention.

The reputation which Bucknell's brave sons have won in athletics is worthy of maintenance. An institution that has won victories from such Universities as the University of Pennsylvania, Cornell, Colgate, and such colleges as Dickinson, Franklin and Marshall, State College and Lehigh, may well cherish its laurels.

But a college with such a record in athletic sports can make its power felt in other spheres also. Bucknell stands for the development of the whole man, and to this end, she has also put representatives upon the rostrum to discuss, in manly rivalry with sister colleges, the questions of the day. In this field she has been successful and has crowned herself with honor.

The first debate was held in Bucknell Hall, May 29, 1896, with Dickinson College as the opposing institution. The subject discussed was, "Resolved, That a Despotism is the Best Form of Government for Russia." Hon. Edward W. Biddle and Hon. Harold M. McClure, president judges of Cumberland andUnion counties respectively,and Ex-State Senator Wm. H. Hackenberg were the judges. There never was an audience, perhaps, more uncertain as to the result. This was due in a measure to the nature of the question. Several days prior to the debate, a member of the College Faculty told the writer that victory seemed impossible since the visitors had the popular side of a very one-sided proposition.

On this evening of the first intercollegiate debate held at Bucknell, the weather was beautiful. The house was soon well-filled with one of Lewisburg's most cultured and most appreciative audiences. Professional men, merchants and students alike were present. Among the visitors were alumni of other colleges, resident in Lewisburg, and a goodly number of Bucknell's own sons and daughters. It was just the audience for such an occasion.

When the debate began, the speakers on either side were received with applause, and, throughout the struggle, strong points well put, and skillful turns given to any phase of the argument to the disadvantage of the other side, were demonstratively appreciated by the audience. No college community can excell Lewisburg in its treatment of strangers, and but few can be so generous. The students and town's people have ever made visitors feel that they come to oppose friends who can and do appreciate excellences whereever seen. The debate closed, the judges retired to weigh and determine the value of the arguments, and O, what suspense!

At length the learned gentlemen completed their deliberations and awarded the palm to Bucknell. It may be well to say that of the judges who determined the merits of the debate one was an alumnus of Dickinson, one a son of Bucknell, the third a mutual choice and not a former student of either college. This, in the main, is the plan upon which the judges were chosen for all the debates held under the auspices of the Literary Societies.

Up to the close of the year, 1897-8, Bucknell had met the following institutions on the rostrum: Dickinson College, Allegheny College, Franklin and Marshall College (twice), and Lehigh University. Of these debates, four were under the entire control of the literary organizations and three of them were won. Thus it is seen that once only has a contest been lost by the representatives, pure and simple, of the literary societies.

The men who represented the Orange and Blue in these debates in their order were Herring, ex-'97, Johnson, '96, and Diggs, '98, vs. Dickinson; Collins, '97, and Dutton, '98, vs. Franklin and Marshall, (first contest); DeWitt, '00, and Carringer, '00, vs. F. and M. (second contest); Dutton, '98, and Wiltbank, '98, vs. Allegheny college; Forrester, '98, and Diggs, '98, vs Lehigh University.

The students always rewarded the victors with many congratulations whenever the Orange and Blue triumphed. These victories, like those won on the Athletic field, do very much toward uniting the student body in spirit and sentiment.

Victories in inter-collegiate debating are the result of faithful labors. Let him who thinks that they are won with ordinary effort follow such a thought as Railroad Pooling through encyclopaedias, congressional debates, reports of congressional committees, the enactments of legislatures and the decisions of courts and it will be very evident that such victories are not easily won. The best debate requires that the contestant prepare every probable, if not every possible, argument pro and con, in order that he may fully anticipate every form of argument that may be brought against him; he must be prepared for tricks and be fortified against what military men might call flank movements. He must have reserved force and reserved arguments; he must be fertile in expedients. In short, the debator is never ready for the contest until he feels that he knows his subject and can make others see it, at least in a measure, from his point of view.

In 1897–1898, Bucknell conducted debates with four different institutions, three of which were colleges. This is a record not equalled, we believe, in America. It is a filial duty to say that Bucknell's excellent showing is due, in a large measure, to her fine courses in Logic, History, English, Elocution and other important branches.

Among those who have represented Bucknell, Merton R. Collins, Ph. M., held an honored place. How sad was the news of his tragic death! Collins, whose life was so full of promise, and whose powers were so rapidly developing. He and Dutton defeated the representatives of Franklin and Marshall, Jan. 22, 1897. Our lamented fellow alumnus and friend honored his Alma Mater and himself. His argument for a national board of arbitration was strong, clear and convincing; and as he interspersed his well-rounded periods with spicy jokes, the audience burst forth into loud applause. The same fluent, earnest Collins had a place in the college sports and in the Young Men's Christian Association. Collins was a fair sample of the men whose mental toil has brought some honors to the old institution so dear to many loyal hearts.

The men who have tried to maintain the honor of Bucknell do not willingly give up the mantle to others; but, since "the old order changeth, yielding place to new," they do so, urging their successors to win even greater victories and never let the royal colors touch the ground, never, never!

'63. The "Commonwealth" for Feb. 16, has a picture and an extended biographical sketch of Rev. W. W. Case, of Rutherford, N. J.

'79. E. M. Purdy has removed from Atlanta, Ga., to High Point, N. C., where he has become manager of a large furniture factory.

'71. Rev. James Rainey has resigned at Laceyville, Pa., after a pastorate of nine years.

Ex-'83. The South Broad St. Baptist Church of Philadelphia, Rev. B. L. Herr, pastor, has recently burned a mortgage of $8000.

'86. L. S. Walter, Esq., of Mt. Carmel, Pa., recently returned home from St. Luke's Hospital, Bethlehem, Pa., where he was confined on account of injuries received about two months ago in the disastrous wreck of the Lehigh Valley Rail Road. Mr. Walter had a very narrow escape from death. He was riding in the forward part of the car next to the engine. The tender of the engine ploughed through the car to within a few feet from where he sat. The man who sat next to him was instantly killed. Besides cuts and bruises, Mr. Walter suffered from a compound fracture of the left leg below the knee.

'88. Rev. F. H. Senft, of Philadelphia, accompanied by his wife, has started on a four months' tour of Palestine.

Ex-'90. Rev. J. A. Knowlton has resigned the pastorate of the Baptist Church, Franklin, Ind., the resignation to take effect April 1.

'91. Prof. I. H. Minick is a candidate for Superintendent of the Franklin County public schools.

'91. The Spruce St. and Chester Ave. Churches of Philadelphia, have consolidated into one, under the pastorate of Rev. A. Lincoln Moore.

Ex-'91. Rev. Howland Hanson, whose resignation of the Messiah Baptist Church, Chicago, was announced in last month's MIRROR, has become pastor at Beloit, Wis.

'91. SCHREINER—DONALDSON: On Monday, February 13th, at her home in Philadelphia, Miss Blanche A. Schreiner, Institute, '91, and Dr. Harry J. Donaldson, were united in marriage by the Rev. George Dana Boardman, D. D. Mr. and Mrs. Donaldson will reside in Williamsport.

'95. Rev. T. C. Hanna is preaching at Union City, Conn.

Ex-'98. H. M. Roth, who has been teaching in the Shippensburg State Normal School, is a candidate for Superintendent of the public schools of Adams County.

EDITORIAL.

The next issue of the MIRROR will be a Y. M. C. A. number. But little space has been hitherto accorded this important organization in any of the college publications and it has been considered fitting to devote the literary department of the April issue to its interests.

Much more interest seems to be taken in the literary society in the smaller colleges than in our larger institutions. There is however, no good reason why this should be so. In the smaller colleges there are fewer other organizations to attract the student's attention; but the need for the training which the literary society gives is just as great in the large college as in the small one and it is furnished so well by no other organization. It is only by the general student body realizing the importance of the literary society in college life and by each contributing according to his ability that our literary societies can be improved and the student body reap the benefit which is theirs if they but take advantage of it.

Owing to the renewed interest manifested in the literary societies at the present time, it was thought advisable to publish a "Literary Society Number," setting forth the history of the various college societies and showing from the experience of those who are competent to judge their great value to the student who faithfully participates in their work. The societies at Bucknell had been for some time in a languishing condition. Greater interest has been taken this year than heretofore. However, the societies are yet far from what they should be or are capable of becoming. Not more than one-fourth of the students attend with any degree of regularity. By the establishment of prizes, by giving credit for work done in the societies and in every manner possible, the Faculty have sought to improve them. All efforts in this direction, however, seem to have fallen somewhat short of the mark. What seems to be needed most is the creation of a stronger sentiment among the student body in general of the importance of the literary society in college work. We frequently hear a student reply, when asked why he does not attend society, that so few do attend and so little interest is taken that there is no incentive for him to take part. This is, unfortunately, to a certain extent, true. But the cause is very apparent. So long as the majority of the students take this view of the matter the societies will languish and be of little value. If each student would attend regularly and faithfully perform his part when placed upon the program, he would soon find no cause to criticise the society and would himself be greatly benefitted by the training he received.

In glancing over the history of Bucknell during the past decade, one is astonished at the progress she has made. Ten years ago, when Dr. Harris assumed the Presidency of the institution, there were less students in the entire college department than there are to-day in the Freshman class. There was then no Gymnasium, no Laboratory, no School of Music, no courses leading to the degree of Bachelor of Science or to Master's degree, the requirements for admission were low, few scholarships were endowed, and the elective system of studies was but a shadow of what it is at the present time. The school was then comparatively little known. Bucknell of to-day is one of the most widely known colleges in Pennsylvania, is the most heavily endowed denominational institution in the state and offers courses of study second to none. She has loyal sons and daughters in the foremost rank in every vocation of life. That she may continue in her progress and in order to meet the demands of a rapidly increasing attendance, a new building is absolutely necessary. The Alumni and friends of the institution who have thus far been approached have nobly responded. Ground will be broken as soon as sufficient funds are raised by subscription to warrant going ahead. It is indeed fitting that in this, the decennial anniversary of President Harris' administration and the last year in the nineteenth century, a new building should be erected, commemorating the past progress and assuring the future welfare of Bucknell.

COLLEGE NOTES.

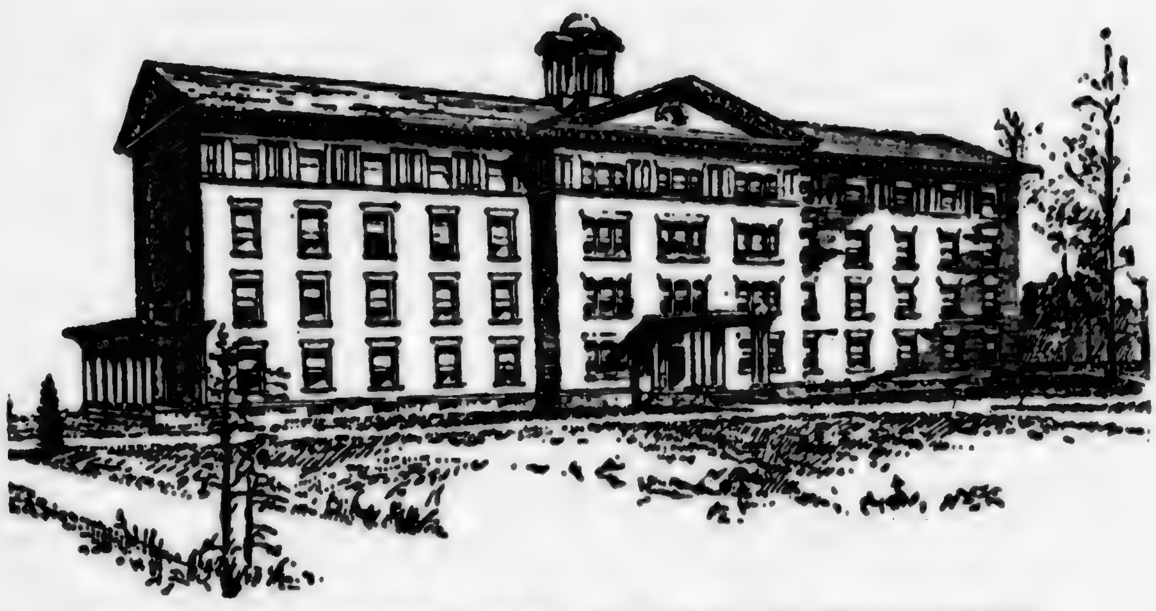
We regret to announce the fact that Prof. Heim is quite ill at present.

The debate on Washington's Birthday was won by Franklin and Marshall College.

The oration on Washington's Birthday was delivered by the Hon. Emerson Collins, of the Williamsport bar.

The girls of the Senior Class of the College tendered a most enjoyable reception to the boys of the class, Saturday evening, Feb. 25.

The University Catalogue for 1898-1899 has made its appearance. It shows a total attendance in the University of 426, of which number 269 are in the College of Liberal Arts.



THE PROPOSED NEW COLLEGE BUILDING.

The proposed new dormitory for men for Bucknell, a picture of which is above shown, will be 44x140 ft. in dimensions and will be four stories high. It will be contiguous to the West Wing, and will face toward the west. The porch shown on the left will lead into the door of the West Wing. This wing and the new dormitory will form a right angle. The new building will be built of brick, and will contain all modern improvements. It will have accommodations for upwards of one hundred students. The cost, including furnishing, will be about $50,000.

Bucknell defeated the Williamsport Y. M. C. A. in basketball at Williamsport, Feb. 21, by the score of 14–12 and State College in the Tustin Gymnasium, March 4, by the score of 12–8.

One of the prettiest social events of the season was the ball given by Kappa Chapter of the Sigma Chi Fraternity in the Armory, Feb. 24. Music was furnished by the Chappell Orchestra of Williamsport.

A BIG BOOK ABOUT BAND INSTRUMENTS.

If you are interested in a band instrument of any kind, or would like to join a band or drum corps, you can obtain full information upon the subject from the big book of 144 pages that Lyon & Healy, Chicago, send free upon application. It contains upwards of 100 illustrations, and gives the lowest prices ever quoted upon band instruments.

What will you do after Graduating?

If you desire to engage in a profession that is not overcrowded and that offers some opportunity for an immediate income, study

OSTEOPATHY

at the Boston Institute of Osteopathy.

OSTEOPATHY, (Drugless Healing)

Is a science based upon an accurate knowledge of anatomy, and is an art as well. Its marvelous results are reached by scientific methods not known or practiced by any other school of healing.

THE COURSE OF STUDY

In this school is of twenty months' duration, and embraces Anatomy, Histology, Physiology, Chemistry, Hygiene, Therapeutics, Pathology and Pathological Anatomy, Obstetrics, Theory and Practice, Clinical Osteopathy, Gynecology, Minor Surgery, Dphthalmogy, Otology, Dermatology, Neurology and Mental diseases.

BOSTON AS A RESIDENCE

During study offers SPECIAL ADVANTAGES in its fine public library, its museum, lectures and concerts, and in the opportunity for intercourse with some of the bright people of the country.

EASTER.

Our Lord arose !
When angels roll'd away the stone,
The Mighty Prince came forth alone
A conq'ring Son.
No longer sin holds earth in chains ;
Let sea and sky rejoice in strains
For vict'ry won.

Our Lord arose !
Lo hope and joy take place of grief,
For death has met a loyal Chief
Who on this morn
Proclaimed His reign o'er all the lands ;
Roll back ye clouds, behold He stands
A Spirit born.

Our Lord arose !
That righteous man of peace and love,
Who wore invisible a dove
From heaven's shrine.
Celestial messenger disowned,
Triumphant now and King enthroned
From David's line.

THE Y. M. C. A. IN COLLEGE.

BY PRESIDENT HARRIS.

President Andrew D. White at the close of his twenty-five years administration of Cornell University said that if he had his official life to begin, he would insist on two things, a hall large enough to accommodate in general convocation all the students of the university, and daily religious services. So all colleges and universities, state as well as others, have come to favor religious culture. They come to the conclusion by different routes, but they all reach the same goal. Nor has the conclusion reached remained merely a conviction or feeling, but it has become embodied in buildings and halls.

Both of the ends suggested by Dr. White's remark are attained by the Young Men's Christian Association. It is a promoter of the religious life and a center of unity. Other societies are exclusive. They pick and choose on some principle, generally good, sometimes bad. The Christian Association is inclusive. It opens its doors to all members of Evangelical churches, as active members, and to all others as associate. Indeed, some college associations accept all Christian students as active members. The Christian association is altruistic. It seeks the welfare primarily not of those who are in the society, but of those who are without. Most college societies are restrictive and mutual benefit. With Christian associations the chief aim is the good of others ; the benefit of self is secondary.

But while the association is inclusive in theory, it may become otherwise in fact. As in every human institution and custom, there is a tendency in it to narrowness. It may become restricted to a class. It should include all members of the college—those preparing for the old-time learned professions and those fitting themselves for the more recent learned callings of technology and business. There needs constant care to keep all these classes of students interested. Students for the ministry, because of their special interest will almost necessarily lead in the work, and consequently need to labor assiduously to gain the support of other students. All members of the association, and in fact all students, should be above petty ambitions and petty envies, and join cordially in the noble work of elevating morally and religiously the whole life of the college. While the work is altruistic, yet for the individual's benefit, no other organization offers so much of good. And as to numbers, property, influence and world-wide extent, any other society a college man can enter, is infinitesimal beside the general Young Men's Christian Association.

AN ASSOCIATION PROGRAM.

The Christian Associations offer the valuable helps of their organizations to all the various workers for the young. Nowhere, perhaps, are the prospects for success brighter than in the Colleges of our land. Let us consider some of the work possible of accomplishment by these organizations.

Unity of direction secures unity of program, of effort, and of enthusiasm, with multiplication of power and efficiency. Unity of organization gives fellowship in effort, and sympathy with fellow workers. Thus a social bond may unite thousands in what were else a selfish occupation. The Christian Associations are the successors to the "Societies for Religious Inquiry," and may well revive and foster the inquisitiveness of the early pioneers in College Christianity. Discovery is ever a joy to the true student, and the associations can turn this characteristic to good account.

Devotion is not an end in itself, but a means of spiritual culture. It is most helpful when most spontaneous. Christian devotion will be the atmosphere of young people who strive for the spiritual help of their associates, or seek worthy equipment for future service.

The study of the Scriptures must ever be prominent in the culture of the young Christian. The associations have fostered this study by systematic method and concerted action.

Many institutions of learning are offering instruction in the "Neglected Classic" as part of regular college study. The work herein outlined for College Christian Associations does not ignore, but presupposes adequate and constant attention to Bible study and to worship, as the vital air and food of the individual and the associated life, in College or elsewhere

The Associations stand for that best thing God ever gives to any one,—opportunity. In the student's journey through History, Literature, Science and Philosophy, this is the modern "Interpreter's House," where the secret of the order and development and significence of the great panorama may be learned. It is not meant to claim that religious services, as ordinarily conducted in College meetings, will contribute such vital and comprehensive knowledge as is here suggested: it is claimed that the true spirit and conduct of the Associations may accomplish this for the student; for they furnish opportunity for systematic and persistent study of a special curriculum supplementary to the regular courses of study.

Christianity is a life, and is manifested in human character and experience. Here opens the door to the study of "Biography," which has been well defined as "Philosophy teaching by example." Here is embodied and actualized the development of Christian experience in the Heroes of Faith. With this guiding principle the Associations can select a comprehensive list of subjects for the course in Christian Biography. This will acquaint the graduate with the continuity of apostolic life and character in the church, through the centuries; while in the mirror of individual experience will be reflected the dominant thoughts of successive generations, their interpretations of life and destiny, of the church and the world, of the present and the hereafter.

In intimate association with this study of the chief personalties of Christian history, may be viewed the Crises of that history; the reforms, the revivals, the agitations, the conflicts. Here the student will gain a true perspective of the progress of Christianity; its ebb and flow of doctrine and practice, its creeds and sects, their local and racial origin and influence, their modifications, their survivals, and their contributions to the totality of progress. Viewed as fragments, without relations, causes or results, these are liable to appear distorted and problematical; but placed in the kaleidoscope of a true historic method, the same fragments assume the varied and beautiful patterns of the Master-Designer, through all whose work "one increasing purpose runs."

Another theme of associated study would be the Field. Christ has transformed the Tempter's panorama of the world and its kingdoms into a vision of opportunity and inspiration for every disciple. He doubtless remembered the wilderness vision when he said: "Lift up your eyes and behold the fields white unto harvest!" And yet again did it return when he said: "Go ye into all the world!"

That the Associations can undertake the guidance of their members in this study of the field is demonstrated by the Student Volunteers' study of the foreign field. The religious needs of our own land will not appeal to the sense of novelty so strongly as those of regions remote, seen in the mirage of distance and unfamiliarity; but the religious map of the United States should become as familiar to the College student as the political one.

The study of the field will include actual conditions, work and results. Here will centre all missionary interests,—local, state, home, and foreign: all knowledge of ethnic religions, of comparative theologies; of man's universal need of the universal faith, that destroys nothing truly moral or religious, but fulfills all. The Student Volunteer will gain new comprehension of the peoples and faiths he hopes to win by the all-comprehending Gospel. The student who never expects to become a missionary will quicken his interest in the progress of Christianity. All alike will be impressed by the truth of the Savior's statement "The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few!"

There is yet room for the study of the Method by which Christianity offers its benefits to mankind. The study of Christian activity cannot be divorced from its practice. "He that doeth the will shall know of the doctrine," is as true of the student as of the reformer, or the missionary. In the laboratory we discover biological, chemical or physical truth at first hand. Every Christian Association in College will soon become a laboratory for practical investigation,—a true university settlement, where the student may receive in enlightenment many-fold return for his "doing the will;" where he may attempt solution of every problem confronting the Christian worker in city-slum or in mining-camp. Here will arise a quickened devotion as he discovers the methods of the Divine operation in saving men. Here will be perceived the social adaptations of the Gospel that unifies the race, while it saves the individual; that regenerates man's life in the mass by allying each man to a personal Savior.

In such a special curriculum, pursued with the zeal of devotion to a loved organization, the student will move as if in a great Christian Observatory; in whose glass room at the top he will view, as in a camera-obscura, the world of actuality about him and behind and below;—its complex movements resolved into the harmonious development of a Divine purpose; its conflicts quieted by Him whom the waves obey, and peace and righteousness crowning the toil and anguish of apostle, and martyr, and missionary.

THE COLLEGE ASSOCIATION.

BY J. C. HAZEN, '99.

If college men are to become leaders and the great need of the world to-day is Christian leaders, then there is no work more vital than the Christian work among college students. The companions chosen, the decisions made and the habits formed in college mark the course of after life. It is stated that but one out of every ten non-Christian graduates ever come to know Christ. Then is it not doubly important that our work be carried on in a more thorough and systematic way?

We cannot do better than to quote the following words from Mr. Wishard, a pioneer in this great work, who says:

"The aim of the movement is to make the colleges Christian in the most positive and aggressive sense; in other words, it is to lead every student to do his whole Christian duty to his fellow students, to his country and to the world."

When the young man leaves for college he holds himself open, largely, to the environment in which he is placed. He believes he is entering into a new life. If then the new student can be welcomed by strong Christian men, made to understand that he has the same or greater responsibilities than at home and to know his full duty as well as enlisted in active work, he may be saved, not only from an aimless life, but to one of great influence and Christian activity. This the Association attempts to do by meeting all new students at the train with a hearty welcome and helping them to locate in their new home.

The regular weekly meetings held by the student body afford perhaps the only opportunity of public prayer and praise for which they alone are responsible. This also affords opportunity for conference and practical experience in conducting such work. And the man who can successfully lead college men has proved his ability to lead men from any position of life. Once a month the meeting is devoted to missions or some other practical question, thus giving instruction along different lines of work the same as in any church home.

The Volunteer Band, Mission study class and Mission work among the churches, which are discussed in another article of this issue, open the way for a thorough and practical study of, and an active part in, Missions.

There is nothing so essential in the life of an all-round student as a familiar and good working knowledge of the Bible. And as a result of negligence, overwork and required studies, there is nothing so neglected as the thorough, systematic and devotional study of the Bible. The Association attempts to overcome this fault by offering a progressive course of four years. This course is open to the student body, each member of which receives a personal invitation to a place in these classes, and in addition to this, pledges are secured to keep the "Morning Watch," by spending at least the first thirty minutes of each day in secret Bible study and prayer.

The committee system as it now exists makes a thorough division of the work, for which men are carefully selected and made responsible for the success of that department.

These methods, if we may speak of them as such, are not observed for the sake of the system but that the student may be enabled to perform his full Christian duty while in college and thus be prepared to follow the same or better methods when he has passed beyond its walls.

The course of many lives has been changed as a result of the Association work, many have been lead into that higher life of greater activity, usefulness and self-surrender, while others have gone to fill positions in other lands. This is but a beginning of what there is to be done, but when we all come to realize our full duty and unite in carrying out the great aim of the Association, the colleges will become the centre from which shall flow a stream of pure young men into all places of life that shall be capable of leading all people to the church of the living God.

THE YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

BY MISS ELIZA BELL, '94.

In the year 1885, having realized that better results are to be obtained from organization of effort, those who were interested in Christian work among the young women of the university, established the Young Woman's Christian Association of Bucknell.

The advent of this association did not imply that, previous to that time, such work had been neglected, but merely threw over the work already begun the mantle of a state and national organization, the Tuesday evening prayer meeting with all other functions being continued under the auspices of the new society.

That the infant association was received with earnestness and enthusiasm by its membership is shown by the minutes of those early meetings, which record many plans for work. Among these interests was the substantial relief during several winters of a number of needy families in the town and the vicinity of the Institute. The spirit of benevolence then bred in the association, was demonstrated, as the years went on by providing annually thirty dollars for the maintainance and education of a native girl in India; in recent years by the payment of a specified sum into the treasury of the Students Loan Fund to aid worthy girls in gaining an education.

As an association we have not failed to reap the benefits belonging to a State organization. The relations with Sister associations in other institutions of learning have been suggestive of methods of work and helpful in creating interest. Twice in the fourteen years of its existence, an active member of the association has served on the State committee.

Of those who have gone forth from this institution to active labor much might be said. Many are working in a quiet way in their native towns or cities. Many are the efficient wives of prominent men. Some are well known in the circles of Christian work.

Of the latter, Mrs. Annie Evans Coe is laboring in Alaska; Mrs. Eva Squires Baldwin, Mrs. Margaret Thompson Carson, Miss Susie Kurtz are all actively engaged in Mission work in India, at the present time.

Mrs. Nannie Wilson Stephens was for several years after her graduation a missionary in Japan. Among others we might mention Miss Leidy, Miss Flora Clymer, who have wrought earnestly in the city of Philadelphia, Mrs. Cora, Perry Finn, who was for a time a city secretary in Scranton Pa., and last of all our beloved Annie C. Carlisle, who faithfully served this association during the four years of her course, being secretary one year and president the remaining three. After her graduation in 1892, Miss Carlisle was appointed College Secretary for the State and she paid this tribute to her mother association, saying that only through the training received in it, was she enabled to work in a wider field. On the twenty-fifth of September, 1893, after having delivered an address to the girls of Geneva College, Beaver Falls, Pa., in the midtst of her labors Miss Carlisle passed from this life to the life everlasting.

When the association was inaugurated at Bucknell, the young women in the College numbered less than ten, but the Institute had for years been in a flourishing condition. That number of College girls, having been more than tripled in as many years, all other departments progressing as well, there comes to the association, with increased numbers, increased responsibility. Every vocation now open to women is calling for Christian women trained in methods of procedure in Christian work, for training gives power in the performance of duty.

Many students in planning a course of study have no time for religious training and development. Especially is this true of young women, who are so carried away by ambition and thirst for knowledge that they confine themselves to hard study, not realizing that the aim of their course is not alone acquisition of knowledge but growth toward higher plains of thought, breadth of mental vision and greater refinement of character.

It therefore becomes the province of the Christian Association to coöperate with the curriculum in providing that which will influence such students to seek the highest culture, namely, Christian culture.

The problem is no whit lessened in importance at Bucknell because the numbers are fewer than in some other institutions.

When we think of Bucknell's daughters who to day are filling positions as clerks or teachers, who are wives and mothers, who are taking up the study and practice of medicine and of law, then it is that we realize what it means to have implanted in each a sense of Christian service ; to have sent each forth charged with a realization of the need of Christian influence in the world, and imbued with a desire for that which represents the truest, purest culture.

In some respects our Association has not lived up to its opportunities, because its members have not understood the importance and extent of its influence in setting the standard of the school; but we trust that with each year interest in the Association and its objects may increase and that its power may thereby be strengthened.

THE ACADEMY ASSOCIATION.

BY LE ROY HALL, '99.

The life of every student is confused at its beginning with conquest, deliberation and indecision. The course of study is begun without knowing definitely whether effort is to undergo triumph or to suffer defeat. But, as no one has defeat for a common motive, the all-absorbing thought in the mind of every student at the beginning is, and always should be, the perfection of self.

The factors in and about an institution for the satisfaction of this urgent craving are numerous. Among them the Young Men's Christian Association, especially of the preparatory departments, stands ready to help and to welcome the student in the beginning of his school career, besides designating to him perhaps the real significance of that greater school of life in such an impressive way as to cause it never to be forgotten.

The life of the Academy student marks a period of separation. All changes conceivable take place here. Friends and associates have been dropped; old habits and customs are slackened and the former life is severed in order to enter into the hope and expectations of the new one. It is a separation which marks the beginning of a good or evil life. Then is the student most susceptible to the moulding influences offered by the Association.

This period is closely followed by a period of formation which is in itself limitless. It does not end with friends and associates, but extends to character, habits and all the researches of scholarship. But true knowledge is only obtained through Jesus Christ. Hence a completed scholarship in any institution cannot be obtained outside of the instruction gained from that Great Teacher. The Academy Association is an institution given to us in which our Lord acts as the presiding officer and He has a care over men for the formation of right motives. Here in this time of formation the Association acts in one of the most strategic opportunities for the student.

Then there is the period of decision. Here the student stands at the forks of the long road of his course, deciding many life questions. How much depends upon this particular period! But let him consider that with a choice of Christ comes a power in after life which will enable him to act as only one can who has a clear conception of the personality and character of God.

Hence during these periods the Academy Young Men's Christian Association stands in a strategic position before the life of every young man in pressing upon him higher ideals than can be otherwise gained, by leading to right decisions while in school and by helping in the formation of the perfect self.

CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION BIBLE STUDY.

BY PROFESSOR PHILLIPS.

In considering the Bible Study of the Christian Association in our College three facts must be kept in mind: first, there are in the regular curricula two terms of Biblical Literature; second, the Bible classes meet only one hour a week for about seven months; third, the Bible Study is a part of the general work of the Association.

With these limitations let us look at the nature of the Bible Study and its relation to the student.

The method grows out of the subject, the Bible and the Association. Every text-book, every subject suggests its own method ; the pervading purpose determines the point of view. Whatever beauty in literary form, whatever interest from historical setting, whatever other value the Bible may have, its supreme worth lies in its moral and religious teachings ; it is the Word of God.

The Association holds an unique place in our school. In colleges situated in small towns, whether for good or ill, the students withdraw from the churches and make the Association the center of their Christian activity ; so that religious life among the students depends to a large degree upon the maintenance of a Christian Association. High life, individual and organized, springs from certain well-defined principles, and the Bible should furnish these and be a corrective for perverted teachings, which steal into and narrow the views of young men.

What method is the best guide to these religious truths? The method that leads into closest touch with the Bible itself. If the time spent in mastering plans, charts, systems, and all such things had been spent in reading carefully the Bible there would be to-day a greater diffusion of Biblical knowledge and less muddled ideas of Scriptural truths.

We have in our College graded studies in the New Testament and we believe this is the best plan. The Freshmen study the life of Christ based on the Gospels ; the Sophomores, the Acts of the Apostles ; the Juniors take up work based on one or both of the previous courses.

With the Bible before us what attitude shall we take? What shall be our point of view? Shall it be intellectual, devotional or practical? It must be intellectual, devotional and practical. Great harm has been done in placing too much emphasis upon one of these to the exclusion of the others. In addition to the classes named above there is in our school also a class in personal or practical study, and the danger in misusing the Scripture is averted by a wise leader. There can be no true intellectual study of the Bible that is not at the same time devotional and practical ; for the aim of the Book is moral and religious. There can be no true devotional study apart from intellectual study. One is led to think sometimes that devotion is entering a closet after leaving the brains on the outside. Devotional study is the application of truth to the individual life; and this implies first, close attention to comprehend the truth, and second, a sympathy with the spirit and purpose of the subject studied. There can be no practical study, a search for truth to be used in influencing others, unless the truth has been grasped and applied to the individual life, and he who has experienced the value of a truth will eagerly pass it to others. Intellectual study is basal; devotional study is individual; practical study is social, and no moral or religious truth is known until it has been adjusted to this three-fold relation.

So much on the nature of Bible Study; now a word on its relation to the student. The aim of the Association is not to develop prigs, saints or preachers, but men. There is no manhood apart from religion and religion is not simply doing good or not doing harm, but it is a recognition of a "Personality in the highest principle in the universe" and in its highest form, Christianity, the recognition of Jesus as the incarnation of all that is best and noblest in the race, the supreme purpose of God in man. Personal Christianity cannot be sustained and developed without constant reference to the Book containing the history and teachings of God's gradual unfolding himself to man.

The Bible Class trains the student to meditate upon serious and profound subjects and to work outside of assigned talks; a habit of inestimable value from an educational stand-point. Furthermore, he who would exert a Christian influence must be to some extent a Bible Student; he who would be a trained, active Christian worker must be a close Bible Student; and he who would be either, should, while in college or likely he never will, acquire the habit of systematic Bible Study.

NORTHFIELD AS AN OPPORTUNITY.

BY C. W. HARVEY, 1900.

College life is a life of opportunities. So varied are these privileges offered that no one need go out with an unevenly developed character. Northfield may properly be classed as one of the valuable opportunities of a college life. The name needs no introduction to any body of American students. It is everywhere associated with Mr. Moody and his schools, but especially with the annual Summer Conference of college students. The idea originated in the ever active mind of Mr. Moody and was inaugurated by him at Mt. Hermon thirteen years ago. This makes an epoch in the history of the Christian Church; the beginning of a new life in the college world; and a new missionary movement, called by many thoughtful men, the greatest in history.

The value of such a conference is confirmed by the rapid adoption of the idea throughout the world, the increasing number of students in attendance each year, the universally favorable testimony of those who have attended, and the endorsement of the leading Christian workers of our time. Its value may be stated from three stand-points: educational, social and spiritual.

The trip offers many and varied opportunities for observation. There is the stop in New York, the moon-light trip up Long Island Sound, the ride through rugged, picturesque New England, and then historic Northfield, a typical old New England village lying along the Connecticut and nestling in the foot-hills of the White Mountains. Its beauty is proverbial and has so frequently been told as to need no repetition. Once seen, it leaves a picture never to be forgotten. To an observing student, there is much to learn. All about are historic spots, monuments and inscriptions, remains of forts and trenches in connection with the Indian wars of early New England life. Across the river is King Philip's lookout tree, the watch-tower of this famous Indian chief.

The old Northfield cemetery in a study with its ancient tombstones and quaint epitaphs. A flat marble slab marks the resting place of Ezekial Webster.

Then, the daily contact with the students from all of our Eastern Colleges, large and small, has a great educational value. Here are men from Harvard, Yale, Cornell, Princeton, University of Pa., Brown and a hundred other institutions of every grade. One cannot meet such men, day by day, in the halls, on the campus, in the public services, and in the various forms of recreation, without receiving a stimulus to know and to be.

The masterful addresses by the foremost of our Christian leaders are known and fully appreciated by all so as to need no comment.

The social feature is most valuable. This wider acquaintance with the leaders in our educational centers is very helpful. Here are broad, all-round men; students, athletes, and at the same time intensely spirited men. Here are the leaders of the Christian life of the American colleges, and the future leaders of the national and world movements. To know these men, is soon to know men in every land, for Northfield is at the same time a rallying and a dispersing center. It is the West Point of the Christian army.

The chief value of Northfield, however, is its spiritual value. One comes away with a larger conception of the Christian life; its reality, its practical bearing on all life, its possibilities, its opportunities, and its responsibilities. One gets a clearer vision of the world, or as Mott says "a world wide vision"—a New Testament conception in which there is no foreign field, no home field, but only a world field. Then one gets a clearer vision of God. There is something about the place and people and purpose of this gathering which gives to it a spiritual atmosphere, a consciousness of the Lord's presence, and yet all in a perfectly natural way.

Every clearer vision of God brings of course a clearer vision of duty. Round Top, the little shaded knoll where the daily sunset meetings are held, is the spiritual battle-ground of the Conference. The secret victories over sin and selfishness won here belong to the individual and his Lord and eternity alone may reveal their full significance.

And yet after all, would we know the value of Northfield as an opportunity, there is but one way—"Come and see."

BUCKNELL VOLUNTEER BAND.

BY F. J. RAWLINSON, '99.

As a rill starts from a mountain cleft on its journey oceanward, so the Student Volunteer Movement started from Mt. Hermon, Northfield, in July, '86, on its journey towards the vastness of heathendom. The rill has swelled into a wide river. Now, like the mighty Amazon, its living waters have gone far out into the great ocean of sin-blighted people. Bucknell, from whom we trust representatives will be found in the front rank of every noble crusade, early took a part in this world-embracing movement. Rev. F. H. Senft, '88, was one of the original one hundred volunteers. Soon after his return to college the Bucknell Band was organized.

The band has grown steadily in numbers and power. Some of its members are already at the front. Rev. Elton S. Corson, '92, and wife are engaged in medical missionary work in Burmah, Rev. E. C. Pauling, '93, and wife are laboring in Seoul, Korea, Rev. Raymond J. Davis,'94, spent some years in Madras, India, representing the international committee of the Y. M. C. A. He is now taking a course at Crozer Theological Seminary. Miss A. Kate Goddard, '97, is with her father in Ningpo, China. Other members are waiting for an open door, being meanwhile actively engaged at home.

It is generally recognized that the man who is best suited to be a foreign missionary is the one who has proved to be a good home missionary; that ability to overcome difficulties at home is indispensable to the one who proposes to wrestle with the vastly greater difficulties abroad. Acting upon this principle the Band has been engaged in various lines of work. During the present year the sphere of its labor has been considerably enlarged. The number of male Volunteers at present studying at Bucknell is eight.

Last fall the Band decided to hold a weekly prayer meeting. This was done in order that it might retain its distinct character as an organization and that the life purpose of the members might be kept vividly before them. A little later a committee was appointed to look after the Sunday afternoon services in the jail. By these means the Volunteer is constantly reminded that he is preparing to fight gigantic evils in a distant land and is also prevented from forgetting the great and vital needs of his home land.

The Band is working along an educational line. Every two weeks a class, open to all, meets for the purpose of studying the missionary question. The two books studied this year have been, "Dawn on the Hills of T'Ang" by Rev. Harlan P. Beach, formerly a missionary in China, and, "Social Evils of the Non-Christian World" by Rev. James S. Dennis, D. D. Both of these works are of a high order of merit and give a comprehensive view of their respective subjects. The Band also superintends the monthly missionary meeting of the Y. M. C. A. The subjects discussed in these meetings are usually along the line studied by the class. The students are thus enabled to get an insight into world conditions that materially assists in broadening their view.

The Volunteers have endeavored to assist in bringing the needs and claims of missions before the Christian people of surrounding towns. In a circular letter, issued during the last fall term to the Baptist churches in the Northumberland Association, it was shown from the Association statistics what had been done for missions by these churches and what yet remained to be done. Coupled with this was an urgent request that more earnest attention be given to this sadly-neglected world-wide work. Wherever there has been opportunity churches and Christian Endeavor societies have been visited and missionary rallies held with them. This work has been conducted in much the same way as that done by the Yale Band now travelling through the country. There have been about forty-five distinctly missionary addresses delivered by the Volunteers during this school year. More is expected to be done ere commencement. The present contingent of Bucknell Volunteers has been more active than any of its predecessors.

Bucknell furnished a larger percentage of volunteers during the recent war, and has also enrolled a larger number of student Volunteers for Foreign Missions, than any other college in Pennsylvania. We are glad to see that this volunteering spirit plays such an important part in our college life. Since several of the Band are leaving this year, we hope that others will soon rise to take their places and to enlist in this, "the grandest movement of the age."

EDITORIAL.

As no Y. M. C. A. Number of the MIRROR has ever been issued or at any rate not for some years and as but little space has hitherto been usually accorded that organization in any of the college publications, it was thought appropriate to devote this issue to its interests. A somewhat different plan has been followed than in the preceding number, nearly all the articles in this number being from the pens of students who are actively engaged in the work. We desire to take this opportunity of thanking all who contributed both for their promptness and the excellence of their productions.

On the twenty-ninth day of this month at Franklin Field, Philadelphia, the annual college relay races, held under the auspices of the University of Pennsylvania, will take place.

Bucknell has won the pennant during the past two years in the class with Dickinson, Gettysburg and Franklin and Marshall and, although both times eligible to enter a higher class, yet, at the request of her competitors, remained in her old position. If the press is to be believed unusual efforts are being made by her rivals to defeat her this year. Under the present circumstances it behooves every man with ability in this line to come out and train faithfully for the team. With all of last year's team in the college and several new candidates with excellent records there is no reason why a team cannot be sent forth to repeat the success of the past two years. By her records, Bucknell is entitled to be in a higher class. Her representatives have broken several intercollegiate records and in one event equalled the national intercollegiate record. She must again win this year and then enter the class to which she rightfully belongs.

While we do not wish to be continually harping upon the subject yet to the students of literary ability who modestly refrain from contributing to the columns of the MIRROR we can do no better than commend the following editorial which appeared in a recent number of the Lafayette : "In the course of his college life, every student encounters numerous advantageous facilities for developing and augmenting his intellectual faculties, and for preparing himself for the work to which he thinks he is best adapted. Although his daily routine of study and instruction is, perhaps, the most potent factor which is conducive to his success in the battle of life, nevertheless, there are various other departments of work in which he may become engaged, and which he also tends to add to his culture.

One, among these, which is worthy of mention, is the experience that he may gain in outside literary work, not only by exercising his abilities in the literary societies, but also in contributing to the college papers. From such sources many of the men who have engaged in literary and journalistic work after leaving college, have received the preliminary practice which has enabled them to successfully exercise their abilities in these broader fields. In this work many have received their first inspiration to enter upon such a career, having here discovered latent capabilities in the way of keen observation and originality of expression, which had hitherto remained undetected. By engaging in such labors many have, therefore, been prepared for achievements which have rendered them worthy of a name in the world of literature.

Stephen Crane and Richard Harding Davis are the names of two college men which immediately present themselves to our minds in this connection. Both have recently come into pre-eminence by reason of their efficiency in literary work. Eight or nine years ago Crane was engaged in writing sketches for The Lafayette, as some of the students are now doing, while at the present writing he is too conspicuous a figure to require further description. As for Davis—fourteen years ago he was editor of the Lehigh Burr, then published at Lehigh University. He, too, has gained distinction in literary and journalistic fields that are too well-known to require rehearsal.

The literary spirit of the college should be reanimated by the examples of these two men, who may be cited as prominent instances of successful writers, who have taken advantage of the opportunities for writing while in college."

COLLEGE NOTES.

A new elective for this term is Finance under Prof. Heim.

Prof. Heim, who has been ill with typhoid fever, has resumed his work again.

Harry B. Wassell, '00, has been elected captain of the basket ball team for next season.

Evarts C. Conover, '99, has been elected captain of the baseball team for the season of '99.

Registrar Gretzinger has been invited by Post 52, G. A. R., to deliver the address on Decoration Day.

The first of a series of three balls for the benefit of base-ball was held in the Armory, Friday evening, April 7. The others will be held April 21 and May 12.

Col. Howard L. Calder, '87, of Harrisburg, delivered an excellent lecture on "The Porto Rican Campaign" in Bucknell Hall, Mar. 16.

The annual stag dance was held in the Armory, Mar. 13. The make-ups were unusually good. A considerable sum was realized for the benefit of the Athletic Association.

The Glee Club gave an excellent concert at Northumberland, Mar. 16. Dates have been secured for the near future in Sunbury, Milton, Williamsport, and Lock Haven.

Prof. F. H. Green, of the West Chester State Normal School, delivered the annual sermon before the Christian Associations April 9. He also lectured the preceding evening in Bucknell Hall on "A Literary Ramble Around Boston."

The second preliminary debate of the Junior Class was held in Bucknell Hall, Mar. 17. The question was: Resolved, That the United States Should Form an Alliance with Great Britain. The judges, Prof. T. F. Hamblin and F. E. Bower, Esq., chose Carringer, Harvey, Morris and Pearse for the final debate.

Beginning with the present Senior Class, all candidates for graduation will be required to present their graduating thesis, of not more than one thousand words, written on "thesis paper" of uniform size, to be deposited with the Professor of Rhetoric not later than June 1, of each year. The theses will be bound and placed in the Library.

A dual meet will be held with State College at that place, May 19. The following events will constitute the program: 100 yard dash, 120 yard hurdle race, two mile run, 440 yard run, one mile run, 220 yard dash, half mile run, high jump, putting the shot, broad jump, hammer throw and pole vault. The points in the contest will count: first, 5; second, 3. A banner will be provided for the winning team.

Preparations are being made for the annual festival in the Armory this term. It will be held sometime in May.

The following members of the Class of 1900 have been named for the Junior Exhibition in Oratory: Misses Black, Lee, Martin, Pooley, and Roos; Messrs. Dewitt, Hottenstein, Miller and Edgar Reed.

Ground was formally broken for Bucknell's new dormitory building, Monday afternoon, April 3. The exercises were of a very interesting nature. After a selection by the band, prayer was offered by Rev. J. T. Judd. The address of the occasion was delivered by Hon. J. Thompson Baker, of Lewisburg. The stakes, marking the four corners of the main portion of the building, were then driven by the presidents of the four college classes. Hon. Harold Murray McClure, President Judge of the 17th judicial district, then formally broke ground in behalf of the board of trustees and William Cyrus Bartol, Ph. D., Professor of Mathematics, on behalf of the Faculty. The work of excavation is now being rapidly pushed forward.

ALUMNI NOTES,

'60. Ex-Congressman, Hon. Simon P. Wolverton, LL. D., of Sunbury, has been appointed Judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, by Gov. Stone. Mr. Wolverton is a member of the board of trustees and is one of the best known and most successful lawyers in the State. He has not yet decided whether or not he will accept the appointment.

'73. The Davisville Baptist Church at Southampton, Pa., Rev. D. W. Sheppard, pastor, has just celebrated its Semi-Centennial anniversary.

'80. Rev. J. M. Ashton, of Chester, Vt., has accepted the pastorate of the Church at Collingwood, N. J. He will assume his new charge May 1.

'88. The only son of Rev. D. M. Jones, of Warrensville, Pa., has been dangerously sick, but is now recovered.

'89. Registrar William C. Gretzinger was recently unanimously elected president of the Lewisburg Town Council.

'91. The reported consolidation of the Spruce St. Baptist Church of Philadelphia with the Chester Ave. Baptist Church has not taken place, as was recently announced. A controversy concerning it has been carried into the courts. Rev. A. Lincoln Moore is pastor of the former church.

'94. Rev. Perry S. Calvin has accepted a call to the First Baptist Church of Neenah, Wis.

'95. Rev. F. I. Sigmund has resigned at Ebensburg, Pa., and has accepted a call to Westover, Pa.

'95. PAULLIN—LIST.—Invitations are out for the wedding of William Theodore Paullin, of Philadelphia, and Miss Ida List, of Lewisburg, to take place April 12, 1899. They will reside at Cedarville, N. J., where the groom is pastor of the First Baptist Church.

'95. B. M. Wagenseller is Principal of the schools at Centre Hall, Pa.

'96. Albert W. Johnson, Esq., has opened a law office in the Wolfe block on Third and Market Street, Lewisburg, Pa.

'97. School of Music. Miss Eleanor Potter is teaching music in Perkiomen Seminary, Pennsburg, Pa.

'98. Frank W. Dillon is writing a series of interesting letters from England for the Lewisburg Chronicle.

'98. Roy B. Mulkie, who had an operation performed upon him for appendicitis recently at Medico-Chi, Phila., is getting along nicely.

Ex-'98. Miss Flora Sigel has accepted a position as teacher of English in the High School of Hamburg, N. Y.

Ex-'01. Rev. A. W. Anderson has accepted a call to the pastorate of the Sea View and Somars Point Baptist Churches.

A CHARMING BOOK ABOUT OLD VIOLINS.

Violinists everywhere will hail with delight the beautifully printed and authoritatively written book about Old Violins, published by Lyon & Healy, Chicago. Good old Violins may now be obtained for $25.00, and a violinist is foolish indeed to remain handicapped with a poor instrument.

What will you do after Graduating?

If you desire to engage in a profession that is not overcrowded and that offers some opportunity for an immediate income, study

OSTEOPATHY

at the Boston Institute of Osteopathy.

OSTEOPATHY, (Drugless Healing)

Is a science based upon an accurate knowledge of anatomy, and is an art as well. Its marvelous results are reached by scientific methods not known or practiced by any other school of healing.

THE COURSE OF STUDY

In this school is of twenty months' duration, and embraces Anatomy, Histology, Physiology, Chemistry, Hygiene, Therapeutics, Pathology and Pathological Anatomy, Obstetrics, Theory and Practice, Clinical Osteopathy, Gynecology, Minor Surgery, Dphthalmogy, Otology, Dermatology, Neurology and Mental diseases.

BOSTON AS A RESIDENCE

During study offers SPECIAL ADVANTAGES in its fine public library, its museum, lectures and concerts, and in the opportunity for intercourse with some of the bright people of the country.

VOL. XVIII. LEWISBURG, PA., MAY 10, 1899. NO. 8.

VOICES NOT ECHOES.

Voices not echoes, all the world around
Is filled with echo's vain unmeaning sound;
But voices are too few, and oft in vain
We listen for the ringing clear refrain
Of voices, yet echoes mock again;
Until we fancy all the earth so wide
Is one vast cave, where all true voices hide,
And echoes walk abroad.

Voices are too few, The men who stand
Steadfast, unmoved at duty's stern command
Are only great; While he who lives for gain
Performs great deeds to bring upon his name
The glory that he covets, may win fame
And may be faintly heard, and still
'Tis only as an echo of that will
Born in the truly great.

Echoes are too many. Deeds of men
Who lived and spoke are echoed o'er again,
Shall we speak forth in truth by word and deed
Words, living words to keep in time of need,
Living a life of courage without greed?
Or blind and deaf to duty's call so clear
List only to another year by year
And echo back the sound?

Voices not echoes, all the world around
Is filled with echo's vain unmeaning sound;
But voices aretoo few, and oft in vain
We show before the world our empty name
And if we live on daily without blame
Think we have done our part, and still
The one who walks before with steadfast will
Is truly great.

STEPHEN W. TAYLOR, LL. D.

BY WALTER N. WYETH, D. D. (COLGATE)

Mr. Editor:—I am reading the Mirror with interest, and the March number, just perused, has attracted special attention on account of the references it contains to the early days and first Faculty and students. My first and only visit to the institution and town occurred on July 3 and 4, '96, as guest of Rev. J. T. Judd. It being vacation time, I could not observe the "workings" of the University, yet the special courtesies of Pastor Judd and some members of the Faculty, enabled me to obtain a view of "matter" if not of mind—to see that which had often been presented to me in picture and word. The visit also awakened some memories of men and things, and these have been re-awakened by reading the Mirror.

My diploma bears the signature of the founder and first principal of your University, Stephen W. Taylor, LL. D. He had been the principal of one of the leading academies of New York, that at Lowville, for about seventeen years; then (1834) accepted and held the principalship of the academic department of Madison (Colgate) University, from which (1838) he passed to the professorship of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy and held it eight years; then (1846) went to Lewisburg, and during about six years there planned and put into operation your noble University, "through the resources of his mind and indomitable energy"; then (1851), was called to the presidency of Madison University, and in this office died, January 6, 1856, aged sixty-four. He graduated from Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y., with the first honors, and from that institution received the well merited, honorary degree of Doctor of Laws. Dr. G. W. Eaton, coadjutor, and author of our Historical Discourse of Madison University, said that while he was "originally endowed with a huge mass of brains and a corresponding breadth of intellectuality that would have ensured distinction in whatever sphere of mental activity he might have engaged, he chose as his vocation the profession of educator......and his conscientious purpose and indomitable will made everything subserve this end. He had the gift and inspiration of poetry and successfully courted the muses in his early years"—a gift he seems to have passed to "Ben" and "Alf"; he to manifest a "massive and unadorned mental power," and his character to be like "a Doric pillar of marble, for solidity and simplicity."

He entered upon the presidency of Madison University with full knowledge of its workings and affairs. It had recently emerged from a four years' siege, by a powerful combination of professed friends who were determined to remove it to Rochester, and after a prosperous history of more than twenty-five years was obliged to begin, almost de novo, with thirty-three students. It was a suitable situation for a man of Dr. Taylor's character. He rose to the occasion. He knew the opposing force. Within three years the number of students had increased to 216, and the heart of the denomination in the State was still at Hamilton. Endowment began to increase. Yet the old Faculty had gone to Rochester, except Profs. Eaton and Spear, and the body been supplemented by former students. The attendance appeared to be a lot picked up and hurried together to help the institution; some of the "boys," over forty years of age. The property had been scrambled for and had a depleted and hard appearance. The institution as a whole, as characterized by a now distinguished man who could not be kept there as a student, "was a perfect shell." Still, Dr. Taylor was there, and as Dr. Eaton said, "he was the most felicitous choice for the University which could have been made from the whole denomination." He took command; allotted the rooms; presided over the allotment of members to the literary societies. (This allotment was intended to be very exact, fractionally so, often leaving a due of half of one man to the side deficient. Deponent, taken in as soon as he arrived and without having been consulted, has ever carried the impression that he was entered as a one-half, or, possibly, two-thirds.)

Dr. Taylor was by nature a disciplinarian. His very presence was disciplinary. The crossing of his feet (he disapproved crossing at the knees), the erection and junction of his thumbs, his neat attire and a firm, intent countenance caused us to feel that we were under discipline. He wished us to be thoughtful and gentlemanly, everywhere; saying, one day, "even a goose will cover her nest." A boor or dolt in the class was sure to hear from him. Sometimes we pitied a fellow who seemed to do as well as he could, especially after the Doctor had become seriously affected by accident. He bowed us out of chapel, and if there was hesitation we knew that he had something to say and we sat down. He was supreme, incarnate law. A prominent member of the Faculty who had a mind of his own and was determined, was shortly bowed away. Then came in Prof. Dodge, who would not quarrel with any one and was very popular with the Doctor and the rest. We were in Prof. Dodge's first class in Butler, and who should appear in the lecture room if not Emily Taylor, the Doctor's only daughter and great ideal. How her presence could be made compatible with the traditions of that "sacred institution" we could understand only in the light of her father's sovereign will. She had been kept from the kitchen and was princess in the studio, doing secretarial duty and studying. She was brainy and Butler was easy to her; was handsome and modest, and had some disciplinary effect, unconsciously, upon the class as a whole. (As the only survivor of her father's family and wife of H. H. Sanford, LL. D., alumnus, long time teacher of high standing and now retired with honor, she has an elegant home at Syracuse, N. Y.)

Some students followed Dr. Taylor from Lewisburg to Hamilton; notably, three fine fellows who entered our class. And as ours was the first entering class after the removal controversy, and was made up of some recruits from other institutions and from prominent Baptist families and were fine fellows, anyway! the Doctor and others doted on us, just a little. This naturally "spoiled" us. And after we had passed and were awaiting Commencement, what should we do but raise a rebellion. This gave to Dr. Taylor a good occasion for the exercise of his prerogatives. It is a lovely story, but space admits only of this :—

One of the Faculty with heart enough for two and who ever managed to help the boys, circumvented the Doctor, and when we were brought before the committee and he had crossed his feet and posed his thumbs in regulation style and had delivered his exordium, he was non-plussed, suddenly, by discovering that the chance for a sweep of his disciplinary hand had departed. It was left to him, simply, to withhold the delivery of the customary address to us, on the stage, and we requested its publication ; but he made no reply. He could not omit, however, the usual Commencement dinner in our honor, at his house. The roast pig was eaten with as much relish as though nothing had happened, and one of the special guests, Dr. J. Lansing Burrows, proposed to us the name of "Phoenix Class," because we seemed to be the first to spring from the ashes of the removal controversy ; and that is our name to-day. The minutes in possession of the writer show other tilts with the Faculty. They gave us our desire and sent no leanness into our souls, or into the institution, either.

President Taylor was a man of fine build, physically, mentally and morally. His principles were high and unswerving. His piety was of a simple type, yet his sovereignty found room even in religion. Some will recall, in B. F. Taylor's description of "The church in the North Woods," the circumstance that he took his sons to Saturday church meeting when they were too small to appreciate anything better than the playing outside and in which they were "dying" to engage. He was a pillar to the Hamilton church and consistent in all things, at all times. His neat, ruddy, robust appearance made of him a picture of health and endurance. But, alas ! In such an hour and way as no one would suspect reversal, a fatal injury was experienced. In descending the stairs of one of the old buildings, a defective part, unobserved, caused him such an effort to save himself from falling headlong as to wrench the spine. It was in October, 1852 ; the first effect seemed to have passed in a few minutes ; suffering occurred, however, in a few weeks and from that time his pains did not subside. Medical skill was sought far and near, to determine the nature of the trouble. He began to hold his back in the class room; never obtained requisite sleep; became thin and morose. But teach he would. The Juniors were about to petition for a different instructor; and when the suggestion reached him, they soon felt the weight of his foot. He would not be carried to the hill so long as he possibly could walk, nor cease to make his round while able to ride and to climb the stairs. When confined to his home he arranged to have his classes meet him there; yet finally desisted, selected a strong and tender student to stay with him and continued to contend with death. After three years and nearly three months of unremitted and increasing suffering, he was compelled to confess: "I am conquered now." The post mortem examination showed that two of the lower vertebrae were carious and that the ligament which bound them together was decayed.

It was a cold winter day when he was borne over the familiar walk, up the hill and to the rostrum of the chapel where he had sat and spoken and conducted worship. Dr. Eaton, a master in funeral eulogy, delivered a discourse, by arrangement of deceased, and it was one of his best. Taking for a text II Sam'l, 22:47, he spoke in eloquent periods of the great loss sustained in the death of the man "with nerves of iron and sinews of steel," while his well selected scripture enabled him to minister comfort and hope in full measure. We laid him away, our good President, on the bleak hillside, where now are the companion graves of such members of the Faculty as Drs. Eaton, Dodge, Harvey and Beebee, with Profs. Hascall and Nathaniel Kendrick in advance of him there; also members of their families and some students. Having long anticipated this event the students were prepared for other instructors; they returned to their books, the work went on and the institution has grown to be one of the most noted Universities of the land.

A FRAGMENT.

It is late to-night and somehow the stillness and the solitary lamp and my thoughts have made me restless. I want to write to you before it is too late, for you see I am dying—there, dear, do not start, it is an old story with me and to-night I feel that it has come. It is hard to be alone when one is dying, is it not? To feel the chill waters close round one's feet, to feel the breath from that swift river, with its unceasing, relentless flow, come cold in one's face and to know that no one is by to help one go down with the shadows and say a prayer, perhaps. But there—I am not complaining; one is just a little curious sometimes, that is all. As I sit here with the cold creeping, creeping slowly but so relentlessly, I wonder what it all means—why it must be so. To-morrow I shall not be here, but where? Ah, that is as hard! Infinite compassion! it is a beautiful thought, but it is so hard to tell whether one deserves compassion. There are so many doubts, and life is so hard; but I am not afraid, do not think so, only curious and a little sad. Odd, is it not, dear, that I should be sad at leaving the bitterness and the heartache and the days one never forgets. Have you forgotten those old days, dear? Do you ever think of the way the sun set over the hilltops and the cool freshness of the evening? How sweet you were then, dear, in all the unconscious innocence of your youth! I can talk as I will to-night and you will not be angry I know for one always forgives the dead. I used to think you cared a little then but I will never know now—not until I have gone out into the darkness alone and then it will be too late. It is awful to long all one's life for something and know it is useless—nothing but a wild dream, too beautiful to last, yet the dream was sweet, so sweet while it lasted. It is the one bright spot left in all the bitterness. If you only knew how cruel you were, how every word stung and stabbed and tortured beyond endurance,—but, dear heart, I will not reproach you—you did not know then, how could you? But now when I am quiet at last, you will understand and perhaps you will forget the bitterness and miss me a little for the sake of the sweetness forever gone from my life. It is my only comfort as I sit here with the shadow growing deeper and the cold creeping so steadily, that you will at last realize that it was because I loved you, loved you—that I acted as I did. Perhaps I was wrong but your happiness lay so far beyond my own that I lost sight of other things—was it right, dear? Sometimes I have fancied your eyes were troubled and wistful. If I had thought you cared. Ah, how long it takes to die! I thought the old agony was over—it cannot be for long now—surely I have suffered enough and alone too. If I could only see you once and know that you were happy, it would be easier then. It is the doubt, the uncertainty, which tortures. But, dear, however it may be, you will believe it was what I thought right and forgive me. The lamp has burnt low and the room is full of strange shadows. It grows so cold, so cold! If I could only feel your hands—Oh, God!

ENGLISH, THE FUTURE LANGUAGE OF THE WORLD.

Every thoughtful man has felt the need and desirability of a universal language. By this, we mean a language understood and used among all civilized peoples in their intercourse with each other. In the past, Greek and Latin, in their time, have each held sway over a large part of the civilized world, yet neither has ever been what we could call a universal language. Recently some attempts have been made to suggest and formulate a language for universal use, but with no success, for a language cannot be mechanically contrived and forced upon a people, like a ready-made suit. It must be a matter of growth and development. It really becomes a part of their life and is not easily put aside or supplanted by another. Hence to become a world-language, it must be the possession of a strong race and must itself have elements of strength. The English is likely to become the language of the world.

The characteristics of the English people strongly favor the universal spread of their language. They are the leaders of the world in intellectual development, civil liberty, and spiritual Christianity. Each of these qualities is dependent on the others; neither can reach its full development without the others; and no race so completely embodies them all as the English. Hence, since the highest ideas of modern civilization are the product of this race, their language is likely to be the principal vehicle for the transmission of this civilization to the rest of the world, especially the educated portion of the world. The tendencies of the English or Anglo-Saxon race are towards expansion in territory, commerce, and religion. They are the great colonizing race of the world. In fact, they rule over two-fifths of the colonies and dependencies of the world, containing one-half of the entire colonial territory, and more than one-half of the people. In commerce, they stand at the head of the nations, carrying about two-thirds of the entire tonnage of the merchant navies of all nations, and touching almost every part of the globe. These two facts bring their language before the masses of the people, and tend toward making English the language of political and commercial life as their civilization tends to make it the language of the scholar or educated classes everywhere. Another marked factor, in introducing this language into the life of other nations, is the missionary spirit of the Anglo-Saxon race. Because they possess the purest type of Christianity, they are the most missionary in spirit. At the General Conference of Foreign Missions held in London in eighteen hundred and eighty-eight representing nearly all the important societies of the world, eighty-seven per cent. represented the Anglo-Saxon race. There is hardly a land anywhere untouched by English or American missionaries. Wherever they go they carry their language. The character of their work makes them leaders among the people to whom they go. The advanced civilization resulting from their work creates a demand for increased knowledge, and naturally the people turn to the language of their leaders for this knowledge.

The nature of the language itself fits it to be a universal language. It has a wonderful power of assimilating to itself the words and ideas of other races. Archbishop French said that, "supposing it to be divided into a hundred parts, sixty would be Saxon, thirty would be Latin including French, five would be Greek, and five be divided among all languages from which we have adopted isolated words." Because of this characteristic, it is especially adapted for expressing the ideas of all nations. Marsh in his "Lectures on the English Language" says: "We have rifled the world of words to augment our overflowing store, so that every speech and nation under heaven has contributed some jewels to enrich our cabinet," and hence he says: "The same composite structure renders it less difficult for foreigners and thus it is eminently fitted to be the speech of these two nations, one of which counts among its subjects, the other among its citizens, people of every language and clime." Dr. Strong in "The New Era" quoting from an eminent German-American scholar, says it is "most easily acquired and most easily used." The experience of missionaries verifies this fact. Even the natives of Africa acquire it very readily and some use it easily. This fact renders it possible to become a world-language. It is also concise and practical. Mr. Orton, late president of the Western Union Telegraph Company, says "English is twenty-five per cent. cheaper for telegraphic purposes than any other." Since commerce and business are important factors in the world's development, a language to be universal must be suited, not only for the use of the scholars, but preeminently for the use of business expressions. It must have the power of expressing the ideas of all nations, must be easily acquired, and at the same time be direct, concise and practical. These qualities the English possess.

Its rapid spread shows the likelihood of its universal use. At the beginning of this century, it stood fifth in the list of the great languages, being used by about twenty million people. To-day, it stands first, being used by one hundred and fifteen million. This number includes only those whose mother tongue is English and does not include those who have acquired and speak it. The only real competitors of English are German, Russian, French and Spanish. In the last century the percentage of those speaking German has remained stationary, while all the others have decreased, excepting English which has advanced fourteen per cent. There is no record of any considerable number of English speaking people being absorbed by any other race, while America is absorbing those of every other language in her territory, and England is fast doing the same in their possessions. The languages of the Eastern nations need hardly be considered, for although spoken by great numbers of people, yet they are entirely too cumbersome and difficult for universal use.

The past has never seen such a combination of favorable circumstances for the universal spread of any language as the English. Here is a world-people, possessing a world-language and giving every promise of world-supremacy. Therefore it seems likely or probable that the English will be the future language of the world. C. W. H., '00.

ON GRANDMOTHER'S GARRET.

This is the age of electricity and nervous prostration. Many of our time-honored customs and institutions are passing out of sight with a rapidity that is bewildering.

Probably it's best that there should be a change in our modes of living; at least we are not willing to become chief mourner for the old customs.

But we do wish to raise our voice against the tendency in modern house building to do away with the garret. "The modern up-to-date dwelling must be a flat and if a roof garden can be added, so much the better," says a recent work on architecture.

It may be that this is the latest type in the "evolution of the house," and that the garret is an unnecessary, and therefore a useless adjunct, but we'll still sigh over its passing.

Think of the children, who must live in a house where there is no big, roomy, tent-like house top of a garret; no place where big brass-bound trunks and chests make the stories of pirates seem very real.

Happy is he who on a rainy day has a garret, to which he can go and there commune with the spirits of the past ages.

The spirits are there and the boy who used to imagine that there were ghosts in that roomy apartment, wasn't altogether in the wrong. The principal mistake the Chinaman makes in his idea of ancestral spirits is one of location, for he is foolish to suppose that they will dwell in the living room of his house. Let him build a garret to his house and the spirits will find an abode to their liking.

Have you ever thought that the garret in your house, if you are fortunate enough to live in a house that was built before the advent of modern ideas, "is the habitation of the past?" Those quaint old chests and cupboards, that box of old magazines, books, that smaller one with the bundle of letters with the queer stamps and seals, all belong to your grandparent's day. That spinning wheel, unless you've taken it down to the parlor where it has no right to be, tells a story of the olden time.

We're going to give you an invitation to visit one of the old-fashioned garrets that has not been turned into a "nursery" nor changed into a dormitory with its accompaniment of paint and plaster. It's a wide, roomy place and there are a some chinks in the shingle roof which let in a few stray sunbeams, and, in the winter, little heaps of snow.

The time is too short to invade all those formidable chests this afternoon, besides there are relics there of clothing and a man cannot describe that unless he is writing for the joke columns, and even then he will succeed better as a humorist if he tries seriously and earnestly to write a description of a woman's dress.

In that small box are stored Grandmother's books. She didn't have very many, but she knew how to take care of them. The first book to catch the eye is one with its title in bold type across the cover, "The Good Little Girl's Keepsake." Inside, scrawled in a feminine hand, is Grandmother's name with the further statement, "Presented by her Grandmother, 1807." The book is illustrated in colors and each illustration shows the rewards or punishments of "The Kindhearted Girl," "The Proud Girl," "The Selfish Girl" and so on. The author evidently had a moral purpose in view and he laid on his moral instruction with a trowel.

Of course Grandmother had a New England Primer and if she didn't have pretty positive opinions on the question of original sin, it was because she rejected the doctrines of the little book which was at once a catechism, Sunday School lesson book, speller and reader combined. The alphabet offered a splendid opportunity for bibical and general ethical instruction, and there is a curious little card, "a reward of merit" which Grandmother received from her teacher for "reciting perfectly the entire alphabet with its significations." How proud she must have been as she went over the list from

A—"By Adam's fall
We sinned all,"

to Z.—

"Zaccheus, he
Did climb a tree
The Lord to see."

There is a picture of John Rodgers, the martyr, being burned to death, surrounded by his wife and family. The last words of Rodgers are given in several stanzas of rhyme not poetry. We fear Grandmother wasn't impressed with the solemnty of the pictured scene, for below the picture is scrawled: "My, what a big family!"

It is entirely possible that the girl who lived when the present century was new didn't know much about the Rubaiyt, but she had read Pilgrim's Progress. We do not know with how much profit Grandmother read it, for on the page where Christian is pictured as fleeing from his weeping wife and children, there is written, "You bad man, to run off from your family." Probably Grandmother wasn't the only one who questioned that desertion.

Our time is flying, and we have not more than begun our exploration of the garret. We can only glance at the titles of the books before us: Fox's "Book of Martyrs," Pollok's "Course of Time," and others of like gravity.

We fear people in those days were rather Puritanical in their tastes, but there is a two-volume book here, evidently much read, if one may judge from its appearance. The title is effaced from the cover, but look within: "Tom Jones, by Henry Fielding." Grandmother! Grandmother! didn't you know it was wicked to read that book or was that the reason you read it? But your "Course of Time" was an excellent palliative. But look here! After the first ten pages many of the leaves of Pollok are uncut—no uncut ones in "Tom Jones."

Here is a little volume of "Popular Poems." Burns and Byron seem to have furnished the most. This book was evidently much read by Grandmother when she was

"Standing with reluctant feet
Where the brook and river meet
Womanhood and girlhood fleet."

There is a picture of Burns and Highland Mary, but there are two other names written there. The name of the woman is carved on a tombstone almost covered with mold, in the village grave yard and her age is marked as nineteen.

She was Grandmother's girl friend. The man's burial place is unmarked and will so remain until the sea shall give up its dead. He perished in one of the naval engagements of the War of 1812. His promised bride survived him six months.

Grandmother kept a diary. She confided her inmost thoughts to its pages. Here are packages of her love letters, but she didn't write them for future publication as some croakers are mean enough to say some of our poets did, and some of our would-be poets are doingn ow, and so their contents shall not be revealed.

It's time to go now, but you haven't seen the spirits! Well, if you haven't felt their presence it's because you are not a fit subject to visit a garret and live over the past with its romance and its realism, its tragedy and its comedy.

But we made one statement that we must recall. We said that everything was changing, but our wandering into the past has proven to us that there is one thing that doesn't change. Human nature is much as it was eighty or ninety years ago.

We have been talking about Grandmother, some other day we'll talk about Grandfather.

WALTER VIVIAN.

MAN, THE FIGHTER.

Just outside the gates of Eden a little streamlet was flowing merrily on. By its bank stood two men; the one, pure and upright; the other, with anger depicted in every line of his countenance. Ten minutes later, one lay silent and motionless, and the fresh water of the brook was colored by the blood of Abel. The sun hid behind a cloud, and the leaves whispered in little frightened murmurs, for this was earth's first fight.

Years went by, and old Sol became accustomed to such sights. Cain was dead, but his spirit still walked the earth, troubling mankind. Man ran against man, brother against brother, until even the waters of the Deluge were unable to cleanse the blood-soaked earth. Soon fighting became an acknowledged occupation, later still, an honorable one.

Greece rose to a position of supremacy in the earth. Alexander, the Great, on a flimsy excuse, gathered a large army, and took it far away from home, leading his men to trouble, danger and death—to fight. Yet men admired him. Truly, he was a great man! How courageous he was! He well knew that the Greeks were the best soldiers on the earth, and felt certain of victory. How noble his purpose! He wished only personal honor and wealth, seizing and ruling with a rod of iron all the cities which force or strategem could conquer. How marvelous his self-control! In a fit of anger, he killed his best friend. Surely he was well-fitted to rule others. Yet to this day, he is admired and honored, and his fame still inspires the school boys heart to "go and do likewise."

Seemingly a few years, and Greece is fallen. The name of Julius Caesar is on every tongue. He plotted with Crassus and Pompey to gain the rule of Rome. His share was Gaul. Raising an army, he marched into his new possessions, forcing the barbarians into submission. He has kindly left us a record of his wondrous exploits in his "Commentaries," (for which we thank him exceedingly). In these books, he shows his victories in brilliant lights, explains his defeats, in short, "blows his own trumpet" with a strong and mighty blast. But even Caesar, the invincible, must die. May he rest in peace!

We claim, now that we see the gray dawn of the twentieth century, that fighting days are over. This is an age of arbitration. Yet, but a short time ago, the country was filled with the names of Corbett and Fitzsimmons. Crowds gathered to see "the show," though what pleasure they found in watching two men try to disable each other, is beyond comprehension.

Another scene presents itself. A college campus is black with a moving mass of students. Fifty or sixty young men, who are supposed to have "put away childish things," are engaged in the interesting occupation of knocking each other down. See! here is a victim prostrate, while two men are assisting him in his ablutions by the use of snow. Over yonder, a zealous church-goer has thrown aside his coat and is fighting like mad. On Sunday with a black eye and many honorable scars he will pray fervently for "peace and quiet on the earth." Let him fight now. It is the relaxation of his religious zeal.

Is fighting right? If blows and brains will heal wounded feelings, indulge in them rather than tongue-fights. Perhaps this element is essential to a man's character, and therefore must occasionally rise to the surface. However, on the whole, it is better to follow the advice of Paul: "As much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men."

EDITORIAL.

We regret to announce the retirement from the MIRROR staff of Mr. H. E. Stabler, '00, who was compelled because of weak eyes to leave school. Mr. M. A. Carringer, '00, was elected to the vacancy.

For the first time in three years Bucknell failed to win first place in the annual relay races held under the auspices of the University of Pennsylvania. Dickinson this year came in first, with Bucknell, second, Franklin and Marshall, third, Gettysburg, fourth, and Ursinus, fifth. The blame attaches, however, to no member of the team that represented the Orange and Blue. They trained faithfully and put forth every effort to win. Dickinson had this year been determined to defeat "proud Bucknell." She scoured the preparatory schools of the country for speedy men and then put them through the most rigid course of training. A prize of twenty-five dollars was offered the team by an alumnus of that institution if they should win first place this year. At Bucknell, on the other hand, some of the fastest men in college did not come out and the team was put through only the ordinary course of training. No special inducements other than the honor of the institution were offered them to win. Under these conditions we succumbed to the superior strength of Dickinson, She won the race fairly, simply because she was represented by a speedier team. On the nineteenth of this month we have a dual meet with State College at that place. She, too, is putting forth every effort to defeat Bucknell. If we are able to take a lesson from a defeat and we wish to be victorious, every man in the University, who can do anything, must come out and train. If the student body do not take an interest in the matter and are unwilling to make the effort, of course we will not win. It is only by all taking part and putting forth their best efforts that we can be truly represented and hope to gain the victory.

COLLEGE NOTES.

The first "At Home" of the term was held in the Institute parlors Monday, May 1.

The annual Soiree of the Fourth Year Class of Bucknell Institute was held April 29.

The work of excavation for the new building has been completed and the mason work begun.

Hon. John T. Hyatt addressed the Chemical and Physical Society on "The Sugar Industry in Cuba" recently.

The College Girls' Association tendered a very pleasant reception to their friends in the Institute parlors, April 14.

Dr. Aviragnet and Miss Aiken are among the instructors for this season at the Penna. Chautauqua at Mt. Gretna.

Dr. Hulley lectured in Bucknell Hall, April 27, to a large and appreciative audience on "Eugene Field." The proceeds were given to the Northfield fund.

Fire escapes, of an improved pattern, consisting of outside balconies and stairways, will be placed this spring on the College, Academy and Institute buildings of the University.

The Ninth Regiment Band of Wilkesbarre, under the leadership of J. I. Alexander will furnish the music during Commencement Week. The usual twilight concerts will again be given.

The Faculty have announced the following as the Commencement speakers of the Class of '99: Ballentine, Buckminster, Decker, Miss Dewolfe, Rawlinson, Rentz, Miss Sharpless, Shipman, Miss Mary Stephens, and Miss Watkins.

Bucknell took second place in the relay race at Philadelphia, April 29, with Dickinson, first, Franklin and Marshall, third, Gettysburg, fourth, and Ursinus fifth. Silver cups were given the members of the team taking second place.

The Williamsport Concert Company composed of: Miss Blanche E. Derr, Soprano; Miss Susanne M. Krape, Contralto; Mr. Roscoe Huff, Pianist; Mr. Trevette B. Maffett, Baritone; Mr. Charles E. Krape, Cellist; and Mr. James D. Hawley, Reciter, gave an excellent musicale in Bucknell Hall, May 5.

The Registrar of the University will gladly pay for the following copies of the Commencement News:

Vols. I and II entire; Vol. III, No. 4; Vol. V. No. 3; Vol. VI, No. 1; Vol. VII, Nos. 2, 3, 4; Vol. VIII, No. 4; Vol. IX, No. 2.

These numbers are needed to complete files. So far as known, there is no complete file of the News to be found.

The Mirror Association election for officers and editors for the ensuing year resulted as follows: President, Miller, '00; Vice President, Bechtel, '01; Secretary, Alexander, '01. The following were elected editors of the Mirror for the school year, 1899–00: Editor-in-Chief, Carringer, '00; Assistants, Bunnell, '00, Miss Pooley, '00, and Bidlespacher, '01;

Business Manager Pierson, '01. Carringer, '00, and Kress, '00, were elected Editor-in-Chief and Business Manager respectively of the Commencement News for this year, vice Decker, '99, and Pierson, '01, resigned.

The base-ball games thus far this season have resulted as follows:

			B. U.	OPP.
April 11,	Susquehanna,	Campus,	12	5
April 15,	Demorest,	Campus,	12	4
April 21,	Gettysburg,	Campus,	7	12
April 22,	Indians,	Carlisle,	8	6
April 29,	Demorest,	Williamsport,	6	7

Bucknell Academy defeated Central Penna. College at New Berlin 11–9 and the Milton High School 11–6.

ALUMNI NOTES.

Ex-'54. Rumors are rife in political circles that Gen. D. McM. Gregg, of Reading, will receive the Republican nomination for State Treasurer of Pennsylvania. Such a nomination would be an honor both to the party and the Commonwealth.

'59. The Baptist Church of Indiana, Pa., will dedicate its new house of worship on May 14th. Rev. A. J. Furman is the pastor, through whose leadership this effort has been accomplished.

'62. The silver anniversary of the Pastor's Bible Class of the Sunday School connected with the Mantua Baptist Church, of Philadelphia, was celebrated on April 6. The present, and for all these years the only teacher of the class, Rev. J. G. Walker, D. D., was presented with a silver loving cup and twenty-five silver dollars.

'71. Rev. W. R. Patton, of Media, had recently a very narrow escape from being crushed to death under a trolly car. He was about to board the car, when an iron culvert covering was tipped by the car wheels, throwing Mr. Patton almost under the car. He was caught in the culvert and considerably bruised. He was painfully but not seriously injured.

'79. Rev. A. J. Irey, of Warren, Pa., has been elected President of the Oil Creek Sunday School Institute and B. Y. P. U. Convention.

'80. Rev. J. M. Plonett, pastor of the First Baptist Church at Tipton, Mo., has just completed the new church edifice at that place. Rev. Plonett is very well known among the Baptists of the Western States.

'82. Rev. H. C. Hall has resigned the pastorate of the Erie Avenue Baptist church, Williamsport, Pa.

'84. Ernest L. Tustin has been elected Vice President of the Black Warrior Copper Co. This company owns one of the largest copper mines in this country.

'84. Rev. M. G. Smith has resigned his pastorate at Towanda, Pa.

'85. Rev. J. Madison Hare, formerly pastor of the First Baptist Church at Burlington, and Chaplain in the First and Third New Jersey Volunteers during the recent war with Spain, is an applicant for the position of Chaplain in the Regular Army.

'87. Lieut.-Col. H. L. Calder was one of the staff of Gen. Geo. R. Snowden in the procession at the dedication of the Grant Monument in Philadelphia, on April 27.

'88 Rev. W. H. Clipman has resigned the pastorate of the Tabernacle Baptist Church of Harrisburg, and on June 1, will assume the pastorate of the Peter's Creek Church at Library, Pa.

'91. Rev. R. B. Dunmire has been called to the pastorate of the church at Vintondale, which makes four churches under his pastoral care.

'94. Raymond J. Davis, who is about to graduate from Crozer Theological Seminary, has been called to the pastorate of the Wissahickon Baptist Church, Philadelphia.

'94. Rev. P. S. Calvin and wife, are now residing at Neenah, Wis., where Mr. Calvin is pastor of the Baptist Church.

He received the degree of B. D. from Univ. of Chicago, Jan. 1, 1899.

'95. Rev. F. I. Sigmund is now located at Westover, Pa.

'96. L. C. Walkenshaw, Asst. Principal of the Jeanette Public Schools, has recently been bereaved by the death of his mother.

'96. Miss Mary Bartol, daughter of Prof. Bartol, has been elected to the headship of the Classic Department of Rockford College, Ill. Miss Bartol, after graduating at Bucknell, pursued her studies in Univ. of Michigan and Univ. of Pennsylvania from which institution she will receive the degree of Doctor of Philosophy this year.

'96. H. H. Bower is completing the term of J. E. Williams as Principal of the Mt. Carmel High School.

'96. Miss Mary Cotton is teaching in the Birmingham Seminary, Alabama.

'98 Prof. F. W. Robbins, Principal of the Towanda public schools, has been elected Dean of the Chautauqua Faculty at Eaglesmere for this season.

'98. Roy Mulkie is engaged in the general office of the electric street car line in Scranton. He expects to learn the electrical business.

'98. Frank A. Golder is at present pursuing graduate work at Bucknell.

Ex-'98. H. M. Roth has been elected Superintendent of the public schools of Adams County.

Ex-'99. Edgar K. Shumaker graduated from the Western University of Pennsylvania in the Department of Pharmacy with the class of '99. He has been appointed assistant professor of Chemistry in that institution.

Ex-'99. Miss Clarissa Fowler received the appointment from Vassar to attend the Marine School of Biological Science at Ward's Hill, Mass., the best school of its kind in this country.

I. Martin Kieffer is a member of the Tunkhannock Manufacturing Co., one of the largest concerns now making silk mill supplies.

Mr. John D. Tustin died at his home in Philadelphia on April 6. He was a brother of the late Prof. F. W. Tustin, '56, and the late Rev. Joseph P. Tustin, '63.

DIED.—April 11, 1899, at Delaware Water Gap, Pa., Rev. Isaac W. Haghurst, in the 87th year of his age. He was a member of the old Board of Curators of the University from 1854 to 1859.

At the semi-annual session of the Ministers' Conference of the Centre Association held at Milesburg, Pa., on April 17 and 18, a paper on "The Scriptural Idea of Sin" was read by Rev. J. H. Haslam, '90; an address on "The Bible in the Home" was made by Rev. A. C. Lathrop, '94, and a sermon was preached by Rev. C. A. Walker, '89.

Rev. George M. Spratt, D. D., a member of the Board of Trustees of the University, and Corresponding Secretary of the Pennsylvania Baptist Education Society, passed his 86th birthday on April 7. When he was born George III was King of England, Napoleon was Emperor of France, James Madison was President of the United States, and the War of 1812 was raging. There were then only eighteen States in the Union.

EXCHANGE.

The Dickinsonian always contains a good variety of high-grade productions.

One of the best exchanges that came to our table last month was the Amherst Literary Monthly. It is a model of neatness and its contents possess high literary merit.

The April number of The College Student was devoted for the most part to fiction. It was all the work of undergraduates and reflected considerable credit on the student body.

The Red and Blue for April is up to its usual high standard. It abounds in excellent fiction. A noteworthy feature and one seldom found in college publications is the number of illustrations it always contains, the work of student artists.

FRIENDSHIP.

Upon the dreary waste of life we tread,
Scorched by the heat of many a fervent sun,
With nought to hide the ever-throbbing head,
And, yet, around no limpid waters run
To cool the parched lip and weary frame
Which, loaded down by care and many a grief,
Some green spot seeks, some tempting shade to claim
Whose sparkling streams can offer some relief,
When just before our sad and straining eyes,
Tall stately palms, with verdure all around,
Are seen to beckon on to fairer skies,
And fill the soul with ecstasy profound ;
Thus may we on the journey ever find
The tender sympathy from a heart that's kind.
—William and Mary College Monthly.

EVE ACQUITTED.

Injustice deep has always been the birthright of our sex ;
We're twitted with our faults in long procession;
But we won't submit to listen any longer to the tale
That records our fair fore-mother's indiscretion.

The story is a true one—there is no denying that;
"But it points out woman's weakness?" we refute it !
Nay, it rather shows her vast superiority o'er man.
We have arguments for those who dare dispute it.

For the serpent realized it as he wriggled through the weeds;
(And with all his faults, you can't deny he's clever).
"If I give the fruit to Adam, he will eat it fast enough,
But is Eve to be seduced by Adam ?—Never !

"Now Eve once won, my work is done," the wily serpent said,
And he hurried through the shrubbery to find her.
Of the deep far-seeing wisdom of that wily serpent's words
The fallen human race needs no reminder.

So our brothers need not murmur if we glory in the fact—
After past humiliation 'tis but human—
That only Eve it took to bend the pliant will of man,
But the very Devil himself to tempt a woman.
—Vassar Miscellany.

What will you do after Graduating ?

If you desire to engage in a profession that is not overcrowded and that offers some opportunity for an immediate income, study

OSTEOPATHY
at the Boston Institute of Osteopathy.

OSTEOPATHY, (Drugless Healing)

Is a science based upon an accurate knowledge of anatomy, and is an art as well. Its marvelous results are reached by scientific methods not known or practiced by any other school of healing.

THE COURSE OF STUDY

In this school is of twenty months' duration, and embraces Anatomy, Histology, Physiology, Chemistry, Hygiene, Therapeutics, Pathology and Pathological Anatomy, Obstetrics, Theory and Practice, Clinical Osteopathy, Gynecology, Minor Surgery, Ophthalmogy, Otology, Dermatology, Neurology and Mental diseases.

BOSTON AS A RESIDENCE

During study offers SPECIAL ADVANTAGES in its fine public library, its museum, lectures and concerts, and in the opportunity for intercourse with some of the bright people of the country.

TO JUNE.

O, the glow of the golden summer
That shines in thy first fair dawn!
O, the glint of the gracious verdure
Lavished o'er mead and lawn!
O, the balmy south wind, scented
With the breath of the forest flowers!
O, the wave of woody fragrance
That follows the summer showers!

O, the slope of the sunny meadows,
Glittering with buttercup gold!
O, the scent of the wild sweet-brier,
Recalling the days of old
When we rambled over the pastures
Guided by tinkle and chime,
And the wild-rose blossomed round us,—
We think of that far-off time,

And the fragrance of many summers
With the blessed present blends,
And the incense of grateful emotion
To the boundless blue ascends,
Till we thrill with the passionate poet
Who cried at the year's high noon
In a peal of the purest rapture,
"Now God be praised for June!"

ORIANA M. WILLIAMS.

THE FORMATIVE PERIOD.

BY ROBERT LOWRY, D. D., '54.

The first decade of the University must always be regarded as its formative period. The institution began with a lot of ground and a big hope. Men were in the front who knew what they wanted, and who laid plans for the future which they themselves should never see. There was a measure of devotion and sacrifice on the part of the founders, of which the present generation can have but a feeble conception. They saw the vision from afar, but died without the sight.

In the middle '40's Lewisburg was unknown beyond its vicinage. No railway connected it with the outside world, no telegraph, no telephone. A canal two miles away brought a few goods from distant parts, with a passenger or two to break the monotony. A stage coach rattled over the hills, carrying some sleepy travelers to or from the periphery of active life. The daily paper had no existence, except as a copy might be handed around as a transcript of ancient history. It was a tremendous venture to plant a great University amid so unpromising surroundings. To see the outcome, look around you!

It was a day of small things, but the potency of a great life was in it. We old fellows wonder sometimes how we bore the privations and limitations of those early days, but we were too intent on our work to take time for complaining. Professor Stephen W. Taylor was a disciplinarian of rare powers. He gave the impulse which fixed the character of the institution. With no buildings, no campus, no library, no apparatus, he inspired the students to avail themselves to the utmost of the facilities within reach. He drew straight lines, and the boys followed them. He was a father to the homeless orphans. We did not know our poverty, so rich did he make us with his instruction and his sympathy.

Class distinctions were but faintly recognized in that Arcadian period. The boy in English Grammar consorted with the boy who read Virgil. The Freshman linked arms with the Senior. A sort of family feeling pervaded the whole University. The atmosphere had the aroma of home. This did not, however, prevent the formation of fellowships which might, or might not, develop into cliques. For instance: Washington's Birthday was officially celebrated with patriotic exercises, consisting principally of orations by two or three students. On one occasion the orators were out of favor with a large number of the students, and the latter resolved to dodge the whole show and have a picnic at Blue Hill. Professor Taylor heard of it, as he heard of everything, and so effectually did he move upon the leaders, taking them one at a time, that the recalcitrant students waived their hostility to the orators, and gave their unanimous presence in honor of the Father of his Country. At another time, in the early '50's, it became noised abroad that one of the Professors had invited some students to spend a certain Saturday afternoon and evening at his house. Investigation revealed the fact that all these prospective guests belonged to a section known as the "royal family." It did not require many hours to organize a counter demonstration on the part of the non-elect, and get up an enthusiastic entertainment at Denormandie's, on Market-street, the same evening. This was long before the advent of Fraternities; which illustrates the fact that, in any considerable number of students, there will be a drawing of lines along more or less artificial bases, and mimic war be waged until the end of College life dissipates the phantasm. The Literary Societies, however, were never disturbed with internal factional contests.

One of the devices for meeting the inchoate condition of things at the beginning was the "Taylor Club." This was formed by a body of ministerial students, who rented an old mansion at the corner of Fifth and Market-streets, opposite the present Station of the Reading Railway, furnished it for study and sleeping, laid in a stock of provisions bought wholesale in Philadelphia, and engaged Mother Morris, who lived next door, to attend to the culinary department. From 1848 until the West Wing became habitable, this was an ideal life for the young theologs. Far from the madding crowd, they enjoyed without espionage their otium cum dignitate. Wood for the kitchen was dumped down in the open road, and each fellow had a week's exercise in sawing and splitting. Each one in turn also became caterer for the club for a week, and at the end of the term the accounts were footed up and the expenses equalized. It may be worth mention, that the cost of running this establishment for the long term (six months), including rent, fuel, laundry, table and attendance, was less than one dollar per week for each member.

Athletics were rudimentary. Alley-ball was practiced in the rear of the old Baptist church, and subsequently at the east end of the West Wing. An occasional game of shinney enlivened the landscape. Swimming parties went out to the first pier of the old bridge. Something called foot-ball was tried, without much success. Excursions on foot were made to neighboring points. The present writer once got caught in a craze for five-mile walks in the early morning. After one brave effort, he reverted to the good old rule from which he has not since departed—a bee-line from bed to breakfast. After the completion of the West Wing, some temporary equipment in the open air answered a useful purpose. The old boys did not know what they missed. They had a limited curriculum, but what they learned was solid and nutritious. They remember their Professors as the best of men for the time and the work. They do not regret the life they lived in that day of meagre appliances. They rejoice in the expansion of Alma Mater, and the present enlarged facilities for University work; but they know that no dicipline could be more thorough than that which they received in the olden time. The old Commencement Day in August is always ready to stand up and be counted alongside of the Commencement Day in June.

SOCIAL LIFE AT BUCKNELL.

Bucknell's social life is the index to the university life, as a whole. Can we be sure that we are not under-rated ? Few realize the end social life subserves in a complete system of education. Have you ever seen a college graduate (Bucknell's graduates excluded, of course) who was mentally a bright and shining light, but whose brilliancy was lost in society because socially he was dwarfed ? Have you seen him standing alone in his misery, absorbed in the care of his hands and feet ? Have you seen him blush and fall all over himself, when some philanthropic maiden has served him with sherbet, which he receives as if it were a dynamite bomb ? He is put down as a bore, when, in truth, he could far outshine that other fellow, who exhibits his whole mental stock-in-trade in such an artistic way that the brains of a Solomon are attributed to him, whereas, carefully tucked away in his vest-pocket, is his "Def." report.

Why should this be ? Why should not our students be all-round men and women ? Are not opportunities provided for the development of the student's whole nature—his social nature not excepted ? "But what time has a student for society, if he conscientiously does his required work ? How can a man spend a couple of hours talking about the weather and the last game ?" says the grind. Much time, to be sure, is wasted in "small talk ;" but this is largely the fault of the men themselves, who fail to realize that women are sometimes interested in topics more worthy of discussion. It is entirely possible to make social intercourse a profitable as well as an enjoyable diversion from the ordinary routine. A man owes it to himself to cultivate grace and ease of manner in society as much as to plod away over his Greek and Latin.

Now, since Ruth Ashmore is no more, and we no longer have an infallible criterion, we must learn the ways of society by observation and experience. The monthly "At Homes" give the girls an opportunity to learn the art of entertaining and the boys, of appearing to be entertained. These and the more formal annual receptions at the Institute, at the home of the President and at the Academy, the occasional dinner parties, the informal Hallowe'en and Thanksgiving gatherings, the open meetings of the literary societies, the social and party calls afford social privileges to all. If any student is neglected, he has himself to blame. At a recent reception, several men, who were near the end of their course, proudly boasted that this was the first social event honored by their presence. The statement was unnecessary, as the fact was self-evident. Freshmen, do not wait until you are Seniors and then expect to make a startling impression at that senior reception, for you are in danger of making an impression not less startling but vastly different from the one you anticipate. Make up your mind, at the beginning of your course, to participate in the school functions. Have the courtesy to at least acknowledge the invitations you receive, even if you are obliged to send regrets, and so spare your hostess the annoyance of uncertainty as to your intentions.

Fortunately, these suggestions are not needed by the majority of our students, who are what might be called "social comforts,"—those who can be depended upon to do and say the right thing at the right time.

THE BUCKNELL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

BY J. B. MARTIN.

The Bucknell School of Music was organized in the year 1888, during the presidency of Dr. David J. Hill. Previous to this time music was taught in the Institute, but confined to piano and voice; and without regard to graduation courses. Although the department was well patronized and turned out a large number of pupils, it was not until after Professor Elysée Aviragnet, A. M., was called to preside over it that the necessity for a regular graded course was realized.

From his long experience as teacher, he soon perceived the power that a Music School might become in the town and neighborhood if established upon the proper basis. He realized that the prime need was the equipment of qualified teachers of both sexes. This involved not only instruction in piano and voice but also in string and wind instruments.

Dr. Aviragnet has thus made the School of Music a nucleus about which he has gathered choral classes, orchestra, mandolin and guitar clubs and brass band ; thus utilizing all the musical talent of the University.

Believing strongly in the value of public performance in all branches of the art, Director Aviragnet furnishes music for the numerous exhibitions of the University, thus saving to the students many dollars heretofore paid to outside organizations for this purpose. He has been assisted in the department of piano by the following teachers : Misses Tustin, Foster, Wells, Morgan, Pretzman, Burke, Hall and Miss Juliet Aiken, the present instructor, who has filled the position for the past eight years with marked ability and success. The course of study of the piano department covers a period of four years. The work is thorough and tested by frequent examinations.

The department of vocal culture has always been under the especial care of the Director who was trained in the old Italian School under Lamperti. Dr. Aviragnet has been ably assisted by Misses Kremer, Morgan, Gould, Crawford and for the past year Miss Gertrude Knox, who is a most successful vocalist and teacher. Three years of study in this branch are required for graduation. The Baptist Church is greatly indebted to the Music School for supplying the choir with good singers, and great credit is due Dr. Aviragnet for his unceasing interest in this part of church worship.

The courses for the pipe organ and string instruments cover periods adapted to the pupils' need. Since the introduction of pipe organs into nearly all the churches of the town, the need for players has been met by the graduates. Harmony, Musical History and other subjects are taught in connection with the various courses.

The University Brass Band was organized ten years ago, and has fully justified Director Aviragnet's expectation of its helpful contributions to student life and culture. To it he has devoted leisure time from days filled with instruction, happy if thus he could extend the influence of his art. To it he has generously contributed the entire equipment of instruments now made the property of the University in trust for the Band. With its well officered organization, and its marked esprit de corps, the Band may be regarded as a permanent helper in the interest of good music. There being no fund available for meeting the cost of sheet music and scores for the numerous public occasions, our generous Director has furnished them without burdening either the performers or the public.

It is difficult to find an opportunity wherein a true friend of the institution and of the Art of Music could put a few hundred dollars to more fruitful service than in establishing a "Score-fund" for the School of Music. Indeed a few thousands of dollars would endow and maintain a much needed Music Library, of which the score-fund would be a most helpful part.

Such a contribution, whether by one or by many, would most fittingly express the deeply felt appreciation of Dr. Aviragnet's whole-souled devotion to the interests of music in school and in town.

ATHLETICS AT BUCKNELL.

The day has come when athletics play a part which cannot be ignored even by those who are not favorably disposed toward anything but class-room work. Whether athletics are carried to extremes in our large institutions of learning or not, the physical department is a part of the college curriculum. But it is the purpose of this article to consider the athletics of Bucknell. What is true of the larger institutions, is in a large measure true at Bucknell. The evolution of athletics has been marked by gradual stages of progress. However, the early forms of athletics have been discussed in former articles of the college publications. This article, then, will be concerned with the athletics within the last three years.

During the spring term the national game of base-ball is is one of the forms which athletics assumes. Every evening from four to six the diamond is alive with lovers of this sport. The whole line of work is outlined before the season opens. Several years ago a base-ball cage was fitted up in the Gymnasium and long before the weather permits out-of-door work the men practise batting and throwing, This gives them the much-needed preliminary work which would be very injurious if done out of doors. In this latitude the changes in temperature are so sudden and the spring with its settled warm weather does not come until May. The record our base-ball teams have made has been very creditable.

But base-ball is not the only game during the spring term. Track athletics and tennis are popular forms of amusement. Field and track athletics are only beginning to come into prominence. Several years ago a man could break the Bucknell records in any event without training. Now none of the records can be broken without considerable work. With the new advent in this department—the dual meet with State College—the records in track athletics should be lowered very much.

There are many students in college who cannot take part in such games as base-ball or foot-ball but who would make fine runners, jumpers, or hurdlers. The Relay Races at Philadelphia have become an established thing and our teams have represented their favorite institution in no mean way. The students certainly appreciate the kindness of the alumni in putting down a cinder track and are showing it by their constant use of it.

Several of the tennis courts were destroyed by the building of the track but tennis still remains a favorite game. A tennis association has been organized and with good results. Tennis, however, has not received the recognition among college athletics that it deserves. However, for exercise for all classes, no game can furnish the recreation that tennis can give.

But the game that every college man becomes interested in before leaving college is the game of foot-ball, probably because the danger seems more imminent in this than many other sports. Every man in college is proud of the fact if he has at any time downed the canvass. At Bucknell during the Fall term foot-ball is the game and practically the only form of athletics. The game of foot-ball is no longer characterized by the long-haired giants. It is no longer necessary for a man to be a pugilist in order to make the 'Varsity eleven. Every afternoon at four o'clock the gridiron is the scene of friendly contests in foot-ball. The foot-ball teams have competed with some of the leading teams in the college world and the result has usually not been as uneven as you would suppose.

Possibly some person who expects to enter college will read this article and decide that athletics ought not to be a part of his work. Every one must seek recreation in some way. Make it a point to be a participant in some form of exercise each term. True, the test required to secure a position on any team is greater now than ever before. That is the way it should be. But no one can say that his efforts will not receive due consideration from those in authority. The candidates for the different teams are selected by an executive board composed of two professors an alumnus, the captain, manager and coach of the team. So but one board has charge of any one team. Athletics at Bucknell are governed and controlled far more systematically than years ago. The captain's and coach's word is law not only on the field but in diet and in general conduct.

We must, however, not lose sight of the fact that a man must be a student in order to be on a team. According to a special ruling of the Faculty, no person who is deficient in his work can be played in any intercollegiate contest. He must be a bona-fide student to receive any recognition by the executive board.

Through athletics the moral tone has been raised, the general health improved, and college life made more pleasant both to the contestant and the observer.

TWO SONGS.

There comes to me Sir Robin's strain
A carolling
His lay of Spring;
The liquid notes o'er reach the plain.

A brook takes up the sweet prelude,
The echo breaks;
While Nature wakes
To green its banks where flow'rs protrude.

The notes that came to me to-day
Were just the same
As that acclaim
Which made fair Eden glad and gay.

Are we as blithe as bird, or free
As rippling rill,
That rounds the hill,
And never pines its crown to see?

The best of life is not, "be glad,
Rejoice and sing."
They praise, who bring
The sheaves, or cheer the worn and sad.

THE FRATERNITY AT BUCKNELL.

The Greek letter fraternity is distinctively an American institution ; it belongs to American college and university life. Some fraternities are founded upon a literary basis ; others are purely social in character. The latter type seems to predominate in this generation. The first Greek letter society in this country was founded at the College of William and Mary, in 1776, and was called the Phi Beta Kappa. It was based upon social and literary features. Phi Beta Kappa to-day stands out pre-eminently as a literary fraternity, membership in which is based on scholarship, and only such students who attain high rank in courses leading to the degree of Bachelor of Arts are eligible to membership. No student is received into Phi Beta Kappa until he has completed a required amount of work ; usually this covers the entire four years in college.

The fraternity system has developed in the American colleges, with the exception of Princeton, until it forms an integral part of undergraduate life, The first college fraternity to enter Bucknell was Phi Kappa Psi, in 1885 ; then came Sigma Chi in 1854 ; Theta Delta Chi, 1866 to 1873 ; Phi Gamma Delta, in 1882 ; Sigma Alpha Epsilon, in 1893 ; Kappa Sigma, in 1894 Pi Beta Phi, in 1896; Theta Delta Tau, a class society, in 1895.

These organizations, especially the four oldest, have had a large share in the development and progressiveness of undergraduate life at Bucknell. As each new fraternity entered the institution it became at once a factor in breaking down that intense spirit of rivalry that had existed among the fraternities here in the earlier history of the university. To-day pan-hellenic intercourse among the fraternities at Bucknell is of a most friendly character The recent legislation of the faculty, now in force for one year, prohibiting the fraternities here from receiving any person into membership until a year's work has been completed, has had much to do in giving the fraternity system tone and character at Bucknell. Fraternity men say that these rules have enhanced the morality and scholarship of the fraternities at Bucknell more than any other contributing cause.

The college fraternity at Bucknell is purely social, but not convivial. It is not exclusive in the sense that it sets up an aristocracy which recognizes no one save the members of its own set. In many senses the college fraternity here is democratic, a spirit and condition of things that is all pervading in the institution. The fraternity men here recognize that there are just as good men in the undergraduate body who do not have any fraternity affiliation, as there are in these societies. Just as the rich man's son and the poor man's son are placed upon the same equality, socially and otherwise, in Bucknell, so the man in the fraternity and the man outside are put in the same scale, each standing, in every department of college life, upon his own merits.

The college fraternity has been represented at Bucknell almost since the founding of the University. At it grew so did the fraternities grow. They have played an important part in the social life of the college; they had a large share in its progress.

Happily, at Bucknell the fraternities are beginning to recognize scholarship, character and morality. From the college fraternity there has gone out much of the enterprise manifest in student life. In the application of energy, in the development of student life, the fraternity men frequently lead and second all movements looking toward the unity, harmony, growth and development of the student body.

Students everywhere group together. Just so it is with the college fraternity, it is simply an organized group. And now that the mission of the college fraternity is being understood, and because it is beginning to recognize its real place in the college life, the opposition to it has greatly decreased, and it is becoming more and more a power for usefulness.

CAN A POOR GIRL GO THROUGH COLLEGE?

In most secondary or High Schools, there comes a time when every girl must decide whether or not she will take a College Preparatory Course. She is a poor girl, let us suppose, and can expect no financial aid whatever from her parents. She is bright, and shows more than average ability in her classes. Her health is good and she is eager for a higher education. She has every qualification, but she has no money. Must a college course, as some affirm, be placed for her in the same category with a "coach and four," point lace or diamonds? Is it merely a luxury of which her circumstances will not permit her even to dream? She carefully considers all the possibilities. What shall she do? A fierce struggle, and the decision is made. She will do what her brother in college has done. Can she succeed? Certainly. If a girl starts out with the brave determination to overcome all difficulties, to surmount all obstacles, we maintain that a college course is possible.

Nevertheless, let us remember that she runs certain risks. First, she is in danger of losing her health. Even though on her entrance to college she may have had a strong and robust constitution, she is frequently compelled to violate certain well-known rules of health—to forgo her exercise, and oftentimes to devote even her holidays to work. Then consider the long days of the summer vacation which must be spent behind counter or desk in order to make it possible to resume her place in the college. What constitution can stand such a strain?

Then, she runs the risk of not doing justice to her studies. If she undertakes outside work, there will necessarily come certain times when either the lessons or the outside work must suffer. Or, perhaps she is haunted with the thoughts of unpaid bills and other financial obligations. How, then, can she concentrate her attention on mathematics and philosophy?

However, we do not say that every poor girl who goes to college will break down her health and become a physical wreck, or that it is impossible for her to stand well in her classes and still not neglect her outside work. Yet she must consider these risks carefully, and decide whether or not she is willing to take them before she determines to pursue a college course.

But the most formidable problem that confronts her is that of means. The idea of getting into debt is revolting to her. And yet there are many reasons why it is absolutely unavoidable.

In the first place, sufficient aid is not given her. Some one asks, "Where are the endowed scholarships, the college and student aid societies?" These noble associations have done much good, I admit, and may suffice for a girl in moderate circumstances; but what of the poor girl? How is she to obtain the money for board, books, and the necessary little expenses incident to a college life?

Then, sufficient opportunity is never given a girl for working her way through college. Has she not the same chance as her brother? Emphatically, No! There are no social prejudices hampering the ambitious boy. Ralph Waldo Emerson might eke out his narrow means by serving as waiter in the college commons, without detriment to his social standing. Yet that girl would be brave indeed who would dare to imitate his example. But the most unfortunate side of the question is, that the College Girl, no less than any other girl, under the present conditions of the employment and recompense of women, is seldom able to earn more than half as much as a boy, even though she may do the same work in the same way. True, in some of the Western Colleges there is a movement on foot to pay a girl just as much for her hour's work as is paid the boy. But how many Eastern Colleges do this?

In the third place, a girl's expenses are greater than a boy's. In most schools, no opportunity whatever is given her to regulate her own expenses. She must board in the college building and be subject to the same expenses as girls of more abundant means. A boy, on the other hand, may come to college, join a club with boys of like meagre means, board himself for two or three dollars per week, while it costs his college sister five or six.

However, in spite of every obstacle, more than one poor girl has successfully proved that, with the necessary pluck and perseverance, it is possible for her to acquire a college education. Garfield has been frequently pointed out to poor struggling boys as a striking example to encourage them in earning an education. It is a pleasant thing for girls to remember that at the very same time the girl who later became Mrs. Garfield and mistress of the White House, by her own efforts was working her way through college.

When the poor girl has successfully coped with every discouragement and hindrance, has she not obtained, not merely an education of the mind—a knowledge of the Sciences and Mathematics, but a rich experience, a strong and well-poised character, that training which will fit her to take a truly womanly part in the School of Life, and be in every need,

"A noble woman, nobly planned,
To warn, to comfort and command ?"

CAN A POOR YOUNG MAN GO THROUGH COLLEGE?

The problem of a college education is one that comes to the mind of nearly every ambitious young man for solution. Sons of well-to-do parents have little choice in the matter. Having completed the necessary preparatory work, they are sent to college, and the question of expense never concerns them. For such persons these lines are not written. Neither are they for young men of means, who, for some reason have not availed themselves of their opportunities. They may go to school at any time. We say this with the conviction that our statement is true; for neither business nor family relations need interfere, as is frequently shown by the presence of men well advanced in years, at college. But to the young man who has missed the advantage of a college education through a lack of means, and who earnestly desires a higher education, these lines are addressed.

The man who must work his way through college has to decide first, which of the many schools of the country it shall be,—one near home or remote; a large college or a small one. The current number of Ladies Home Journal contains an article on the subject under consideration, in which the author, a Princeton alumnus, claims that the best opportunities for self-help are found in large colleges. This is undoubtedly true; but there is closer competition, also. And in addition, expenses are much higher. While at a smaller institution, competition among those who assist themselves is no greater, and expenses are not so high.

Now, what are the necessary expenses? First to be considered is food. Here, board may be secured in clubs at prices varying from one and a half to two and a half dollars per week. For the school year this means from sixty to ninety dollars. The second item for consideration is tuition. If the prospective student be successful in obtaining a scholarship (and very few deserving young men are not), this means free tuitition; otherwise fifty dollars must be paid. The third item is room rent, and amounts to forty dollars. From twenty to twenty-five dollars will pay for all necessary books the first year. It is possible also to secure second-hand books at very reasonable prices. Then furnishing the study and dormitory is a matter not to be forgotten. Twelve or fifteen dollars will furnish these rooms respectably, and by purchasing second-hand goods the cost may be greatly reduced. But in making these purchases one must be thoroughly awake. The laundry and clothing bills come in for consideration, also. We merely suggest at this point that it pays even at college, to be neat and clean; to be cosmopolitan, not provincial. Lastly, we mention incidental expenses. It is well to make a liberal allowance for these. Many previously unthought-of purchases are necessary during the year. Summing up everything, and comparing accounts with numerous students, we find the average annual cost of attending school at Bucknell, exclusive of those having no scholarship, to be little short of two hundred dollars.

We come now to consider opportunities for self-help. These divide themselves into two general classes: first, opportunities to do work about the college, and secondly, to canvass during vacation. The service of a number of men is required at a place like Bucknell. Persons skilled in shorthand and type-writing may find something to do. Several young men are made responsible for a strict account of the attendance at chapel. One man is required to care for the Gymnasium, and another for the Laboratory. One or two assistants are needed by the Professors in the Laboratory. A limited number of men willing to work, may secure employment by the hour, on the campus. More or less repairing is always necessary about the premises, and this affords work for a carpenter.

But there is work of a different character, not given by the institution. Several men act as representatives of laundries in various towns, and receive some compensation for their work. A tonsorial artist or two may work up quite a patronage. Then, too, a young man who shows himself to possess the requisite ability may rise to the position of purveyor for a boarding club. For this service the pay usually given ranges from nothing to free board. Several enterprising young men might form a News Syndicate. This is the Princeton man's idea, and it is worthy of a trial. Then we must consider the singers. Young men who sing well, can rent their voices to the various churches in town, and attain to positions of honor in the chapel choir, also. Students who are type-setters have little difficulty in securing work in the various printing offices in town. One more method of self-help deserves to be mentioned. If the prospective student has had experience fighting at Mt. Gretna, in Porto Rico, or in the Philippines, he may be able to deliver a course of lectures descriptive of his experience, and thus reap a handsome reward.

Let us consider next the question of canvassing during vacation. Many general agents go from college to college in order to secure students to work for their houses during the summer. Foremost among students' friends are the stereoscopic view people. They will guarantee anywhere from seventy-five to one hundred and fifty dollars per month. Summer vacation means from two hundred and twenty-five to three hundred and seventy-five dollars. Assuming that expenses at college will be two hundred dollars for the year, this means from one to five hundred dollars in bank at the end of four years. Then there comes the book man with his inducements. He will furnish plans and specifications which, if followed, will enable the student to keep clear of all indebtedness during his college course. The tinware man also has work for willing students, and his business is worthy of a trial. Of late, however, the aluminum ware man offers the best inducements. His goods will last forever, and are absolutely unchangeable, even with respect to form. All that is necessary in order to do successful work in this business, is to have had a few weeks' experience debating in a co-educational literary society.

In all seriousness, we may say that unless the individual is very hopeful and hard to "turn down," he ought not try canvassing; for it is the hardest kind of work, and ill suited to build up a man, either mentally or physically. What a student wants, is good healthful exercise in the open air. Many kinds of work will afford this. There is a young man in Bucknell now who made more than enough money during vacation to pay all his expenses for a year. The work he was engaged in was—huckstering. Do you smile? Huckstering is a perfectly respectable business, and not one whit more to be "jollied" is is our friend, than was Garfield while driving mules on the tow-path. Then the summer hotel will furnish employment for many an ambitious student. True, the wages are not high; but on the other hand, the pay is sure to come. This is more than can be said of many of the large salaries promised by general agents, to men whom they employ. After all, however, the farm is the ideal place in which to spend vacation. And, although the same objection holds here as obtains against the summer hotel,—low wages, yet there are splendid opportunities. In each of the two positions last mentioned, if the young man shows himself to be interested in his work; if he shows himself to be earnest and trustworthy; and if he shows by his words and actions that he earnestly desires to become a better and more useful man, ten chances to one some worthy soul will come to his rescue, and supply him with sufficient means to enable him to complete his college course. This aid may be of the nature of a loan. If such be the case, it is better than if it were a free gift. By accepting a gift, a man obligates himself; by accepting a loan, he shoulders responsibilities, and thus becomes prudent. No young man in good health, and ambitious to make the most of himself, ought to be afraid to borrow money in order to acquire an education.

Can a poor young man secure a college education? Experience and Observation answer, "Yes."

LOVE'S PRAYER.

Kiss her gently, Night,
As I would kiss
Her eyes, her lips, her face,
In speechless bliss.
Nightly, that purest brow
Smooth in repose,
That she may dream of me,
My own white rose.

Touch her softly, Breeze,
With light caress,
As I have loved to touch
Each glossy tress.
Seek for the dimples hid
Now in repose;
That she may think of me,
My coy white rose.

Watch her nightly, Stars,
Unrivaled, when
Those starry dark eyes sleep;
Lovingly then
Watch as I fain would watch
Her bright eyes close.
Guard as I fain would guard
My pure white rose.

EDITORIAL.

With the present issue the eighteenth volume of the MIRROR closes. The work now falls upon other shoulders. During the last school year we have endeavored to maintain the high standard of excellence set by our predecessors and wherever possible to improve upon it. As to whether we have succeeded or not is for others to judge.

Whatever success we may have achieved is due in a large measure to the generous support we have received from students, faculty and alumni, to whom we offer our sincere thanks. They have always nobly responded whenever called upon. We believe greater interest has been manifested by the student body in the college publication this year than previously. This is as it should be. If the MIRROR is to be a true exponent of the literary life of Bucknell, the student body must take an interest in it; must feel that any weakness in it is a sign of their own shortcoming.

To the new staff, in whom we have great confidence, go our best wishes for success. We ask that the same generous assistance accorded us be given them; for it is only by all taking an interest in and working for the success of our college publication that we can have a truly representative magazine worthy of the institution for which it stands.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Registrar Gretzinger delivered the address in Lewisburg on Memorial Day.

The annual Field Day was held on the campus June 3. The MIRROR Cup was won by the Junior class,

President and Mrs, Harris tendered a most pleasant reception to the Senior classes of the College, Institute, and School of Music, May 16.

President Benaiah L. Whitman, LL. D., of the Columbian University, Washington, D. C., delivered a series of three lectures before the students of the University, in Bucknell Hall, Monday, May 15.

Work on the new college dormitory is progressing rapidly under the direction of Mr. J. C. Nesbit, Ex-'68. The foundation is of Hummelstown brown-stone. The basement and stone trimmings will consist of the same material. The formal laying of the corner-stone will take place on Tuesday afternoon of Commencement week, immediately after the graduation exercises of the Institute.

Owing to the largely increased attendance in the College, the friends of the University are attempting to raise $75,000 to increase the fixed and working capital of the institution. A friend in New York City has promised to give $15,000 of the amount. Not less than one-third of it is to be added to the working capital; the remainder will be used in erecting needed buildings.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

The 54th Regular Session Commences Sept. 25th, 1899, and Continues Thirty Weeks.

The lectures will be held in the large, new building, containing three amphitheatres and rooms for dispensary patients, chemical, pathological, histological, bacteriological, physiological and pharmaceutical laboratories, thoroughly equipped with modern conveniences. Instruction by lectures, recitations, conferences, laboratory work and clinics. Four year graded course. Clinical advantages unexcelled.

For catalogue and other information, address,

DR. JOHN PARMENTER, Secretary,
University of Buffalo, Buffalo, N. Y.

What will you do after Graduating?

If you desire to engage in a profession that is not overcrowded and that offers some opportunity for an immediate income, study

OSTEOPATHY

at the Boston Institute of Osteopathy.

OSTEOPATHY, (Drugless Healing)

Is a science based upon an accurate knowledge of anatomy, and is an art as well. Its marvelous results are reached by scientific methods not known or practiced by any other school of healing.

THE COURSE OF STUDY

In this school is of twenty months' duration, and embraces Anatomy, Histology, Physiology, Chemistry, Hygiene, Therapeutics, Pathology and Pathological Anatomy, Obstetrics, Theory and Practice, Clinical Osteopathy, Gynecology, Minor Surgery, Dphthalmogy, Otology, Dermatology, Neurology and Mental diseases.

BOSTON AS A RESIDENCE

During study offers SPECIAL ADVANTAGES in its fine public library, its museum, lectures and concerts, and in the opportunity for intercourse with some of the bright people of the country.

BUCKNELL MIRROR.

VOL. XIX. LEWISBURG, PA., OCTOBER, 1899. No. 1.

The Spring has done her work,
And summer's rip'ning days have passed.
The grain within the barn
The wain has placed ; the cribs are full;
The harvest time is done.

Autumnal days are here,
And with them comes that wondrous change,
Designed by Nature's hand,
In which the world is gayest garbed
Before her winter's sleep.

Come out with me to-day ;
On yonder hill now turn your eyes
And see the handiwork
Of Him who made the world and filled
It with such just designs.

NATURE STUDY.

"To him who in the love of nature holds
Communion with her visible forms she speaks
A various language;"

Truly a various language! Do the spring days breathe the same message as the summer hours, the autumn breezes whisper the same tale as the falling snowflakes? And yet this language of the seasons is only Nature's everyday vocabulary. There are as delicate shades of meaning within her power as our English tongue can boast of; treasures as rich as any our literature possesses lie hidden within her bosom.

"The meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears."

But we do not intend to dwell on this phase of Nature's language. To all who hold communion with her visible forms she may impart thoughts far deeper and nobler than any we could suggest. In the interpretation of this author, at least, every man must be a law unto himself. It is rather the study of the more delicate shades of meaning, the hidden beauties in this language that we are to consider.

This study will be like a voyage of discovery to those who have held only everyday communion with the "great mother" and consequently we must have reliable guides to map out the route for us. For these guides on this lifelong trip we will go to those who are wiser in Nature's lore than we, to those who have been in closer touch with her. The microscope will help us in discovering many of the hidden beauties. Just enough of this guiding to set us in the right path and keep us there, our own wits and Nature's great open book must be responsible for the rest.

Once in the path let us follow it to some haunt still unvisited by the too oft disfiguring hand of man. A shady wood—the leaves of many an autumn beneath our feet, murmuring over its stony bed a streamlet, here and there a rock or fallen tree, the hum of insects, the twitter and song of birds and about all nature's favorite color of restful green. Even in the bottom of the little stream there clings a blue-green, gelatinous mass. Perhaps it would surprise you to see a bit of that same slimy mass under the microscope. It contains myriads of delicate blue-green cells, some forming oscillating filaments, some like strings of dainty beads.

Have you ever seen the life in a drop of water from stream of field or wood ? If not, there is something beautiful, marvellous, fascinating in store for you. We might enumerate hundreds of these marvels, hidden to many, but hidden because the many will not seek them. From these lower forms of life—the slime fguni, the shapeless, yellow or often almost colorless mass that you perhaps have seen on some decaying log in the woods, the plant life found in the water of streams such as we saw in the blue-green slime and the water in which it lived, the bacteria of which we all know more or less, the algae which we know as seaweed and which has added beauties when seen under the microscope, the smut, molds, mildews and rusts, all of which have more to recommend them to attention and study than might be supposed—we can pass on through the middle forms of liverworts, mosses and ferns to the higher and better known forms of the flowering plants. And even here where we feel pretty well acquainted there are secrets that many of us have not yet discovered. The common weeds that grow along the roadside may be revelations if we have not yet learned that many times what seems one complete flower is in reality numerous smaller flowers each exquisitely perfect in itself. These flowers of the compositæ are not however the only ones that have greater beauty when observed more closely. Have you never noticed the silky, silvery texture of the arrowhead's blossom or the graceful beauty of Daucus Carota, or queenslace as the children call it ?

And all this is only Botany, a world in itself, food for a lifetime's study—yet think of what nature has in store aside from this plant world! In all this nature-study however we must not lose our way in a labyrinth of mere marvels. We must strive for discovery for ourselves or for the world it may be. It is the heart to heart touch with Nature, the study of life in its own peculiar environment that is really worth while. Here is profitable, pleasant, uplifting occupation for leisure hours. Those who have not experienced it can hardly realize how much greater interest a country ramble may have for one who is acquainted with the study of nature in some of its particular phases—biology, botany, zoology, mineralogy—than for him who sees no further than the surface of things. Be nature's priest, study her, yield yourself to her influences, try less of artificial life and more of life with her. If you are not better, and altogether wiser for it, you have been too long in the toils of man to be redeemed.

LIGHT AND SHADE.

I wonder why we're always sure to see
The dark clouds sooner than the bright;
Nay—even turn the bright ones wrong-side out,
As tho' their shining hurt our sight.
Is there a dearth then, of sad tears and wailing,
Of long, long heartbreak, and of pain,
That we should fain premeditate our sorrows
And turn our little sunshine into rain?

Surely the great World-Artist understands
A finely tempered light and shade;
Knowing against our darker griefs, the light
Is more effectively displayed.
Let be our woes—upon Life's canvas finding
A greater beauty all untold,
As, 'gainst the background of Night's sable curtain
We see the glimmer of the morning gold.

ADELAIDE WOOD GUTHRIE.

SOME NOTES ON COLLEGE EDUCATION.

The student is often met with the question "Why do you spend so many years in school?" Practical men cannot see what would induce one to spend the best years of life in study. The question with them seems to be "How many more dollars can you earn because of this college education? During those years you could have saved such or such a number of thousands. You do not need a higher education. You can succeed without it. This man or that man has grown rich and he has no higher education."

These men cannot know what education means. The world is larger than a silver dollar and a banknote is not the incarnation of ALL that is true, good or beautiful. "To give the student a luminous philosophy of life," says a recent writer, "is the aim of college education." What if you can't get any larger salary because of it? Salary has nothing in particular to do with the question. The larger life is the point. With every fact that is learned, with every principle mastered, with every increased training of intellectual power, the mental horizon becomes larger. The extent of the universe, for us, is limited by our power of grasping—of comprehending it. Each new fact or principle is a new key with which we can unlock the secret chambers of the world around us. "We can see only what is in ourselves" says Henry Wood. "If we wish to bring back the wealth of the Indies we must take out the wealth of the Indies with us" says Emerson. "For he that hath, to him shall be given" say the scriptures.

The true life of man is the inner life. The inner life is the life and environment in which the thinking individual really lives. It consists of all the knowledge of which he is master, all of his experience and all of his ideals. It is his organized mental content. A man can in great measure determine for himself the nature of this content. It is in this sense that a man makes his own environment. The development of this inner life and the increase of this content by which we interpret the external world is precisely the aim of higher education.

AN EVENING EPISODE.

All was quiet along the lake. It had been a sultry August afternoon and now since the bathers had deserted the white sand-beach, the clear calm of sunset had gradually given way to an indistinct twilight. The air seemed heavier as the shadows deepened among the mournful hemlocks and a brooded calm at last possessed the borders.

"Strange," thought I, "that no one comes at this, the best hour for rest and meditation. Why seek quiet and solitude upon the mountain-top and then despise the evening hush of nature ? Just then the softest whisper was wafted through the slightly swaying pines and a girlish laugh rang out clear and distinct. A rude sound, as of some boat suddenly turned on the landing, followed by the soothing drip of oars, told that at least someone else did not despise the twilight hour.

In a few seconds a light-colored boat glided quietly from out the darkening shadow of the wooded shore, into the open water that still vaguely mirrored the cloudless vault above.

"This is a perfect evening. Let us wait here." It was the girl who spoke and no further suggestion was needed. Immediately the rowing ceased and the oars hung lightly from the locks. The rower took a comfortable position in the bow while the boat drifted lazily on for some yards and then seemed motionless.

With the resting of the boat the last audible sound died away and again a deep silence reigned. Most fittingly the girl took up a stringed instrument and lightly trilled the clearest music. The darkness deepened somewhat and varied sounds increased blending most harmoniously. From the opposite shore came the splash of oars, nearer and nearer, until with steady stroke, a darkly-laden boat glided, like some heavy shade across the middle of the lake and a chorus of manly voices sang "The Pennsylvania Girl." The notes of a bugle, first low and distant, but soon swelling into a strong clear call, startled the slumbering echoes. The long lights shaking across the lake seemed to bring with them faint strains of orchestral music from the large hotel, and carried the merriment from within far out into the night.

Along the eastern shore a large fire burned brightly. From time to time some one would appear spectre-like—and pile fresh fuel while the crackling sparks lit up the great tree-trunks in the gloomy back-ground and sent a cheery glow high up into the branches. Here too, college yells and negro melodies were mingled in cheerful confusion. At times the corn-roasters were engaged in animated conversation, then again their voices would be drowned in hearty peals of laughter.

Near me some person of more sober thought, was slowly reciting the familiar lines from Tennyson:

"Twilight and evening star,
And after that the dark."

The beautiful poem was most appropriate and in the voice of the unseen speaker was a hearty earnestness that could not fail to inspire interest. Most intently I listened! Gradually all else was forgotten and at last even the sound of that voice grew fainter until it could no longer be heard.

* * * * *

A strange light caused me to open my eyes in alarm. Half dazed I sat up and faced some awful object, staring steadily at me with a single, searching eye of fire. Slowly it approached, grim and hideous, when, fortunately, for an instant I glanced aside and then the truth was slowly revealed. There on the right not more than two rods distant was the rocky ledge of the lake with its familiar laurel-covered banks above. Behind me was the overhanging bough of hemlock beneath which I had tied my canoe early in the evening. Not having fastened it securely it had turned round and, like a thing of life, was moving toward the landing. While I slept the moon had climbed above the wooded hill and its light first came upon me as I drifted round from underneath the shade.

It was now after midnight and as one might expect all was again quiet on the lake. A few crickets may still have been chirping but I cared not to listen. Without further meditation I paddled noiselessly and directly towards the now well-known head-light that shone forth friendly from the top of the great iron post on the edge of the pier.

POETIC IMAGINATION.

"Lovers, and madmen, have such seething brains,
Such shaping fantasies, that apprehend
More than cool reason ever comprehends.
The lunatic, the lover, and the poet,
Are of imagination all compact:
One sees more devils than vast hell can hold;
That is the madman: the lover, all as frantic,
Sees Helen's beauty in a brow of Egypt;
The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven;
And as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation, and a name."
—Midsummer Night's Dream, Act V.

Poetic imagination is not a distinct mental power or faculty but it is simply imagination as manifested in the poet. It is both creative and reproductive. When the poet combines old elements of his mental content to produce new forms, creative imagination is the predominating activity. When he reproduces and describes objects or states which he has seen, experienced or concerning which he has read, reproductive imagination is the power involved. It is at once obvious that these two forms of imagination are both involved in every productive act of the poet. The poet builds his creations from elements found in his past experience. The creation consists in new combinations, but in order to bring about these combinations, the old elements must first be pictured—which activity we have called reproductive imagination.

The imagination of the poet is not the mad raving of the lunatic. Neither is it the fierce passion of the lover who "sees Helen's beauty in a brow of Egypt." Nor is it the aimless wanderings of the fancy. It is a natural power of the sane man and its operation is one of the highest functions of the human mind. It acts under the control of the will and is directed by the aesthetic taste. It finds and projects the beautiful in nature. It interprets nature and life in beautiful and harmonious forms.

The poetic imagination is identical with the power of mind used in scientific investigation. The scientist forms an hypothesis, then works to ascertain its validity. That is, he imagines a condition of things which might be and which seems to explain the phenomena in question and then labors to verify his assumption. By this power Newton discovered the law of gravitation and Darwin produced a theory of organic evolution. Scientific imagination aims at the true and the useful; poetic imagination at the beautiful and the good. Scientific imagination deals with the actual; poetic imagination with the ideal and the potential.

We can see these facts concerning poetic imagination illustrated in the following lines from Milton:

"I walk unseen
On the dry, smooth shaven green,
To behold the wandering moon,
Riding near her highest noon,
Like one that had been led astray,
Through heaven's wide pathless way:
And oft, as if her head she bowed,
Stooping through a fleecy cloud."

The poet is not mad, neither does he teach a truth of science, but he has seen the beautiful, and his imagination has bodied it forth as a figure of speech. It is the province of the poet to give, not "to airy nothing", but to the beautiful "a local habitation and a name."

KEEP YOUR NERVE.

Keep your nerve, its just as well;
Never mind the shot and shell,
Even though your comrade fell
Keep your nerve.
Keep your nerve, in smoke or clear,
Even when the foe is near,
Face the guns and banish fear;
Keep your nerve.
Keep your nerve, Old Glory's there
Waving proudly on the air,
And for land and home you dare;
Keep your nerve.
Keep your nerve, though weary feet
Falter in the dust and heat;
Let your heart own no defeat,
Keep your nerve.
Keep your nerve, the battle's long—
Right prevails against the wrong;
E'en where dangers thickest throng,
Keep your nerve.
Keep your nerve, through all your life,
'Mid the battle and the strife;
Though the air with storm be rife,
Keep your nerve.

FOOTBALL SCHEDULE.

Oct. 21	Duquesne C. and A. C. at Pittsburg.
Oct. 28	Susquehanna University.
Nov. 4	State College at Williamsport.
Nov. 11	P. R. R. Y. M. C. A. at Philadelphia.
Nov. 18	Lafayette College at Easton.
Nov. 25	Baltimore Med. College.
Nov. 30	Univ. of Buffalo at Buffalo.

Coach Hoskins keeps the team down to hard systematic work and the new players are being rapidly developed.

The opening game of the season resulted in Bucknell defeating Wyoming Seminary by the score of 22–0. During the first half much fumbling was done on both sides but Bucknell succeeded in scoring two touchdowns. The second half was decidedly more interesting. Better team work was displayed. Bucknell secured two well-earned touch-downs and two goals.

Bucknell's eleven played the University of Pennsylvania team on Franklin Field, Oct. 4, and created a stir in football circles by twice scoring on Penn. The kicking of Mathewson, Bucknell's full-back, was the finest seen there in a long time and it was through his good work that Bucknell's team scored twice, as the ten points were made by him kicking two goals from the field; one from the 25 yard line and the other from the 30 yard line. Score at end of first half: U. P. 11, B. U. 10. In the second half Penn played a fast game scoring rapidly on their opponents, and making the final score U. P. 47; B. U. 10.

Our team easily defeated the Shamokin eleven on the college campus Sat., Oct. 7, by a score of 40 to 0. At no time did Shamokin come near scoring although at times she held the college line a little while. Bucknell made a number of long runs that were much admired.

Oct. 14th. Lehigh University at Bethlehem. Bucknell won by a score of 5 to 0.

EDITORIAL.

This number opens the nineteenth Volume of the MIRROR The new board enter upon their work with the hope that they can maintain the standard already reached by the MIRROR and if possible make some steps in advance. To do this the support and encouragement of every student, alumnus and friend of the University are needed.

Every college student is more or less interested in some phase of literary work. All have studied the principles of literature but very few have done any original literary work. Students are not expected to be Miltons or Shakespeares, neither are all going to enter literature as a life work, but no student can fail to profit by doing some original work in this line. Theory is good but it will avail you nothing unless you can put it into practice. You must be able to write what you know in good, clear, forcible English. The preacher must write sermons; the lawyer, discussions of cases; the doctor, articles for the medical journals. All in some way need the power of composition. It is the aim of the MIRROR to cultivate this power, especially among undergraduates. It is a field in which you can practice the theory which you know. It is the complement of the literary courses of the University.

Articles from undergraduate students are especially welcome and will receive careful consideration. Write something and hand your article to the Editors. You receive the same training whether the article is published or not.

RESOLUTIONS.

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Almighty God in his infinite wisdom to remove from this life the father of our beloved brother, W. E. Thompson, be it therefore

RESOLVED, That we thus express our sympathy for our brother in this his bereavement; and be it

RESOLVED, That we extend our condolence to his mother in her great loss and to his sisters and brothers in their sorrow; and be it further

RESOLVED, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to our brother, that they be spread upon the minutes of our meeting, and that they be published in the college papers and in the Sigma Chi Quarterly.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Dr. Harris delivered the opening address of the term on the subject "Character."

Dr. Lincoln Hulley, who with Mrs. Hulley spent several months in Italy, has returned to his work at Bucknell.

The first meeting of the Chemical and Physical Society was held in the Laboratory, Thursday, Oct, 5. Prof. Owens' talk on "Carborundum" was much appreciated.

The reception given by the Y. M. C. A. at the beginning of the term proved a very pleasant affair. Several addresses were made by instructors and upper-class men.

The Bucknell band met for the first practice under the direction of Dr. Aviragnet. Weymouth, '00, has again been chosen leader and Ayres, '01, business manager.

The College Glee Club has not yet been re-organized. Plenty of good material is available and once established under efficient leadership this important musical organization would soon attain its former standard of excellence.

Both Euepia and Theta Alpha have started the college year with unusually successful meetings and the important work done by the Literary Societies will be well supported.

The number of students in the Freshman class is ninety-one, and the attendance in Bucknell college three hundred and one. There is also a marked increase of new students in the other departments of the University.

The following are the officers of the Institute Alumnæ Club, chosen at the annual meeting on Tuesday night :

President, Mrs. H. Grant Dreisbach ; Vice President, Mrs. G. S. Matlack ; Secretary, Mrs. Wm. C. Gretzinger ; Treasurer, Miss Margaret Clingan ; Correspondent, Philadelphia Alumnæ Club, Miss Annie Van Gundy.

Delegates to the State Federation of Clubs to be held at Pittsburg, November 9th : Mrs. D. Bright Miller, Mrs. Wm. C. Gretzinger, Miss Sara Van Gundy.

The Lewisburg Club of the Institute Alumnæ will study Sociology this year at their monthly meetings. At the October meeting "College Settlements" were studied. Miss Jessie J. Wheeler spoke on the Riverton Settlement, New York City, and Miss Eveline J. Stanton, on the Hull House, Chicago. The subject for the November meeting is "The Poor."

The lectures of Dr. Lemuel Moss on Social Science will be given Oct. 23 and 24. Dr. Moss offers an "honor" in this subject open to all students in the college. The work will consist of:

(1) A report with comments on the lectures.

(2) The reading and written analysis of Shailer Mathews "Social Teachings of Jesus."

(3) A thesis on some related subject of not less than 2000 words.

Prof. Rudolp Schwill, a graduate of Yale and Doctor of Philosophy from University of Munich, assists in the department of modern languages. Frederick W. Brown, a graduate from Bucknell and in medicine from Michigan University, has been added to the corps of instructors in organic science. Vincent B. Fisk, Bucknell '97, is an instructor in the English department, and LaMonte Rentz, A. B. (Bucknell) assists in the department of mathematics.

ALUMNI NOTES.

Ex-'54. Joseph E. Jones, M. D., for forty-four years a practicing physician of West Chester, Pa., died at that place on May 7, aged 66 years.

Ex-'62. Rev. W. R. McNeil, formerly pastor at Emporium, Penn'a, has removed to Bridgeton, N. J.

'63 Died at his home in Lock Haven, Pa., on Aug. 14, Prof. W. J. Wolverton. He was born in Northumberland Co. in 1841. He prepared for college in Sunbury Academy. After graduation he taught school at Berwick and at Danville, and after studying law he was admitted to the bar. He did not remain long in the law, but returned to teaching. From 1881 to 1887 he was superintendent of schools in Northumberland Co. In 1888 he became connected with the Lock Haven High School, remaining there until his death. He was very active in church work, a man of genial personality and a loyal son of his Alma Mater.

'68. The First Baptist Church of Altoona, Pa., Rev. J. S. James, D. D., pastor, has spent $15,000 on extensive alterations to their meeting house. Among the improvements are two large memorial windows to Rev. Dr. Wm. Shadrach and A. K. Bell former pastors, and most earnest friends and patrons of Bucknell University during their lives.

'71. Rev. T. R. Evans has removed from Azusa, Cal., to Riverside, Cal.

'71. Rev. James Rainey, after twelve years' service as pastor of the Brainnim Baptist Church, Laceyville, Penn'a, has tendered his resignation. He will reside at Tunkhannock, Pa.

'72. Rev. J. H. Chambers read a paper before the Philadelphia Conference of Baptist Ministers on May 29, on "Does Pilgrim's Progress Portray Normal Christian Experience?"

'72. Rev. Rolandus Kocher has removed from Fowlerville, Penn'a, to Berwick.

'75. Rev. E. M. Brawley, D. D., is located in Darien, Ga., where he is pastor of one of the largest colored Baptist Churches in the state. He also does a large amount of editorial work.

In the meetings of various Baptist Associations in Pennsylvania, several Alumni have been honored with an election as Moderator: Rev. A. J. Irey, '79, of the Oil Creek Association, and Rev. C. A. Walker, '89, of the Centre Association, and Rev. J. H. Haslam, '90, of the Northumberland Association.

Ex-'78. Died at his home in Philadelphia, Rev. Wm. H. Humphreys, aged 50 years. He was for a number of years pastor of the Bethesda Baptist Church of Philadelphia, and had also several other pastorates. Failing health three years ago occasioned his retirement from the active service of the ministry.

Ex-'83. Assistant Surgeon George A. Lung, M. D., of the "Philadelphia," has received officially the thanks of Secretary of the Navy Long for his gallant services during the troubles with the Samoans at Apia last April.

'83. Rev. O. R. Thomas has accepted a call to the Second Baptist Church of Franklin, Pa.

'83. Rev. W. G. Watkins has resigned the pastorate of the North Main Ave. Baptist Church of Scranton, Pa.

'84. Rev. M. G. Smith resigns the pastorate of the Baptist Church, Towanda, Penn'a, after seven years of service.

'85. Rev. J. Madison Hare, formerly pastor of the First Baptist Church, at Burlington, and chaplain of the Third New Jersey Regiment of Volunteers, accepted a call to the pastorate of the Parmly Memorial Church, at Jersey City, and entered upon his duties on October 1.

'85. Rev. J. E. Sagebeer, Ph. D., addressed the Philadelphia Baptist City Mission on May 11, on "The White Man's Other Burdens."

Ex-'88. Rev. E. T. Derr, formerly a Baptist minister, has embraced the doctrines of Christian Science.

'88. Rev. D. M. Jones resigned the pastorate of the Baptist Church at Warrensville, Pa., but the church refused to accept it.

'88. Lincoln Hully, Ph. D., has returned from a three months' trip abroad, the most of which time was spent in Italy in study.

'89. Oliver B. Finn is located in Folsom City, California, where he is in the mining business.

'89. Rev. W. C. Leinbach preached the Missionary Sermon before the Central Union Baptist Association at Parkerford, Pa., on May 31.

Ex-'89. Rev. H. B. Rankin has become pastor of the First Baptist Church of Easton, Pa.

'89. The Lehigh Ave. Baptist Church of Philadelphia, of which Rev. R. M. West is pastor, is engaged in building a new house of worship.

'92. Llewellyn Phillips, A. M., has entered the Rochester Theological Seminary.

'92. Lieut. Geo. Shorkley, Ph. B.. of the Twelfth Reg. N. G. P., graduated from Hahnemann Medical College, Philadelphia, on May 10.

'93. J. B. Cressinger, M. D., who has been seriously ill at the home of his parents in Sunbury, is convalescent and able to be out.

Ex-'94. Rev. Chas. R. Williams is pastor of the West Baptist Church, Vineland, N. J.

'Ex-94. Rev. Theo. Heysham, Ph. D., has accepted a call to the Bridgeport, Pa., Baptist Church.

Among the summer ordinations to the ministry have been the following:

'94. Raymond J. Davis at Wissahickon Baptist Church, Phila.

'96. E. E. Hall on June 25, accepted pastorate at Broad Run, W. Va.

'90. Daniel E. Lewis who became pastor of Manatawna Baptist Church, Phila.

'96. E. T. Haddock was ordained to the work of the ministry, on April 24, and is pastor of the Baptist Church at Curwensville, Pa.

'98. John A. Cutler, who became pastor at East New Market, Md.

'96. Rev. E. R. Powell has resigned at Laporte and Eaglesmere, Pa.

'97. John V. Lesher is quartermaster with the rank of Captain of the 12th regiment, N. G. P.

'98. H. L. Purdy is in the employ of the Pennsylvania Railroad at Sunbury.

'99. D. H. Robbins is principal of Pottsgrove Academy.

'99. E. C. Conover and William Warren are at Crozer Theological Seminary.

'99. O. R. Levan is now on the Hamburg "Item."

'99. E. L. Nesbit is an assistant in the Chemical Department at Clifton Springs (N. Y.) Sanitarium.

'99. R. L. Rentz is an instructor in Bucknell Academy.

'99. H. C. Meserve has entered Hartford Theological Seminary, Hartford, Conn.

'99. C. F. Shipman is teaching in Rockefeller Township, Northumberland County.

'99. Messrs. Ballentine, Bayard and McQuistion are at Harvard this year.

'99. D. H. Krise is Principal of the Hicksville, Ohio Public Schools. Attendance 700 pupils, 14 teachers.

'99. J. Cattell is teaching in the Media Academy.

'99. E. W. Cober is assistant principal of the Myersdale public schools.

'99. A. R. Garner has entered the Hahnemann Medical College, Philadelphia.

'99. J. A. Herman is principal of McEwensville Academy.

'99. Ezra Lehman is teaching in the Shippensburg Normal School.

'99. B. W. Griffith is teaching in the Lock Haven Normal School.

'99. W. H. Engle is the manager of the slate quarry at Slatington.

THE ELECTIVES OF LIFE.

Address to the Class of 1899, on Commencement Day, June 21.

BY H. KIRKE PORTER, A. M.

A College Commencement has in it a peculiar fascination. To the undergraduates it forcibly marks the attainment of a goal toward which they are still striving. To the friends at home, the completion of a course to which they have looked forward in utmost sympathy, and for which they have often struggled as hard as the man himself. Many a mother has worked over a Latin grammar in the preparatory days as arduously as the boy to whom its rigid rules and multitudinous exceptions are much tougher exercises than a rail fence or a five-barred gate. To the graduating Senior it is a mile-post, often manfully reached, most earnestly desired, and yet come to with a sense of parting of the ways, and of uncertainty as to the future, that sobers any serious minded man. The outlook from a College platform of those just entering the lists in the world's activities, is full of interest. The cheap joke of carping critics upon essays, as if they pretended to be final conclusions, or the last word possible to utter, or the stateman's ultimatum, does not weigh much with a thoughtful man, who will recognize rather the endeavor of youth, actuated by an honest purpose, and fired by a noble ambition to study earnestly into some subject of present importance and of world-wide interest, or to learn by mental effort the true philosophy and the hidden meaning of things that have puzzled even the wisest sages. Every earnest commencement speech on any topic of current thought or historic importance, or even philosophical abstraction, is possessed of real interest ; and so far as it is honestly the young man's own, and any kind of fair expression of his own mind and mental process, it gives promise of growth and of harvest, as truly as the bursting seed and the germinating plant.

The graduating time has come. College courses have been followed from beginning to end, and these courses are completed. What is the result of it all in the individual life ? No one who has tried it, and no one of experience, and no thinking man, will expect that the education is complete. The unthinking often express surprise that the young graduate has not learned everything ; as if the posession of an encyclopedic brain might be looked for as the natural product of four years in college. Memory is but one of the mental faculties to be carefully cultivated and to be highly prized. No man of sense will undervalue it, or regard it as little important, but it is not the chief of all. Far more important is it that the man be developed and right, than that his mind be crammed. Has he learned to think ? Have Cæsar's annals aroused an interest in the great world forces that have been at work shaping the destinies of mankind ? Has Herodotus, father of History, and his myriad of successors enkindled a discriminating zeal to make him desire to know the real facts of the past ? Does he walk with eager eye and kindling enthusiasm where buried cities are unearthed, under the guidance of some Pausanias, and learn to make the dead past leap to life again ? Do Plato's reasonings arouse his mind to question all things living and inanimate, and subtler things than those of sense, to yield up their secrets to his eager seeking ? Is the dictionary and the encyclopedia all he wants, or does he long for real biology, and ask the meaning of life itself ? Are books enough, or will he have the living word ? Such are the questions fairly to be asked the young man as he receives his diploma, the certificate, we may trust, of meritorious work, and well worthy to be prized. It gives him title to a place among men to-day throughout our land, and in all the world, to which men who are not college bred look with longing and envy (I use the word in no harsh sense) ; but has it fitted him for a place and companionship with the good and best of all the ages ? If not, then another less favored than he may have come by some other road to the prize worth having, for there is no royal road to learning. Every man as he receives his diploma, this token of honor, must answer to his own conscience, if not to his fellows, or to the College President and Faculty and Boards ; and in his life, he will most assuredly answer to the world, as to the use he has made of opportunity. And this brings me to my theme,—

LIFE'S ELECTIVES.

For many college generations the best of educators have been studying as to curriculum ; and undoubtedly the theme will be as fresh and new fifty years from to-day as it is to-day, and as it was fifty years ago. Why should there not be change in this, as is in all the other changing things of our changing lives ? If we simply follow in our forefathers' steps as we seek for the principles of democratic government, and study the history of Grecian Isles, or when we read a finished literature of a classic age, yet we may not be content to rest where they were forced to stop. The study of history, of philosophy, of philology, and of science, have all grown and developed amazingly during this nineteenth century. Every branch of study has been divided and subdivided, analyzed and reconstructed and compared. In this day of investigation and compiling, new light has come on every department of human knowledge. Who had given them more than a hint as to the power of steam a hundred years ago, and who had even hinted fifty years ago at the greatest marvels of electricity ? Who had pointed out then the correlation of forces, or more than suggested many of the hidden mysteries of nature ? Many of these things are to-day elements of daily life ; many, many more are as subtle as the waves of ether, and eluding for a little longer the wand of Ariel, that sympathetic touch that shall release them to useful ministry for God and man. We should but shame the great teachers of the past if we did not seek this later knowledge that has come to light, and earnestly look for the deeper mysteries yet to be revealed. But in all this ferment of life and new revelations, the importance of old truth abides and can never be shaken. Solid foundations were laid for learning and for worth long, long ago ; and true wisdom needs no better justification than her own children.

Electives in college may be of great value, and a well chosen course for an individual mind may be of vast importance; but whether such special course shall be of such special value depends almost entirely on the wisdom of him who makes the choice.

Electives in college, other than in some broad and general sense, will be very apt to do as much harm as good, but the real test of a college is, does it fit a man for Electives in his life. For the purpose of college life and study is to train and discipline the mind, to teach a man to think, to discriminate as to sources of knowledge, and to learn how to select that which he needs, that which will give him power, first over himself, then over others, and over all natural forces, and then to make these do his will, and to be of use to all the world.

Now comes the test as to what his acquisitions really are. Up to this time he has had a college standing to which every one is naturally inclined to turn to mark his progress. This is as fair, in a general way, and as showing relatively the work that different men have done, and their attainments, as any system that could be devised. But in any individual case it will not deceive the teacher, nor his fellows, nor himself. Any system, no matter how good, no matter how faithfully followed—any system, is inadequate. What is the man ? Has he a clearer insight for this four years of privilege ? Does he judge of men about him, and does he judge himself justly ? When a course of action is to be decided, on what principles will he make his choice?

Discrimination is first of all. Is the thing before him plausible ? or is it right ? Can he decide ? Most of all he needs this ability to discriminate and select.

The next step I would mention in the process, is inclination. Knowing the right way, knowing the best, will he choose it ? No greater skill in teaching, it seems to me, is there than is involved in arousing and stimulating such right choice. To know the right is excellent ; to choose it is infinitely more so. The best is often anything but easy. To choose the difficult, hard thing is not natural. Every bicyclist knows how much easier it is to go down grade than up. Possibly some of us did not have to wait for the bicycle to reveal this.

And last of all in this elective course, is determination and will. Four years cannot do everything, but they certainly can show bias. Professor Gammell used to say that in nine cases out of ten, what the boy was from fifteen to twenty, he would be through life. Will he choose the right and then stick to it? Will he hold to the course in spite of its being hard and difficult? Though the struggle be arduous, will he go on unswerving? If so, then he can be trusted with Electives. Even when a sudden revelation comes, as it did at Santiago Bay to Captain Philip, that obedience to orders in an unexpected contingency, is wrong, then will the importance of Electives be seen as by a flash of lightning, and he will reverse as unflinchingly to escape the ram of the Brooklyn circling to take up her glorious swift chase, as he will be steady and firm and straightforward when his course is clear. Obedience to the Commander's battle orders are not lightly to be disregarded; but the grand jury of the world, and Admiral Sampson to approve the verdict, will adjudge Philip's conduct right in averting a horrible disaster rather than the exact obedience of the Camperdown in naval tactics off Beirout, to insane orders from the Royal Victoria, to wheel to her certain destruction. Electives in the college course, so far as careful experiment may show these to be wise, but Electives in life there must be. You go to take advantage of these. Be patient. The years just after graduation are often hard and trying. Do not think that doors are to fly open to you by magic. Do not imagine that the world is thinking about you, and troubled because you are not already come. It needs you (if you are fully ready), but it is very chary of plaudits until the battle has been fought. Many a man must go through life doing heroic service in the dark; arduous blockade service like that at Matanzas and Havana and Bahia Honda, and nobody even to read the official records, except in case of accident, and a court martial; and without ever a chance like Santiago and Cervera's fleet. And it is well that we all remember that that brilliant sea fight was simply keeping up the patient, toilsome target practice and naval drill of years, and that fight together with the Oregon's long voyage and magnificent preparedness; and Dewey's May-Day at Manila as well, began away back with Porter on the Atlantic, and Farragut in the Gulf.

All honor to the unnamed, undiscovered heroes who, in the nation's life, as in the nation's battles, have lived heroic lives, and worthy of coronation. Are Electives then a failure, if the hero be not crowned? Perish the unworthy thought. There is no failure to that man who, baffled in his plans, "dares live his life, accepts the ends that God loves as his own, and lifts a constant aspect." Though all men are conscious of many falls and frequent failure, yet the world has been blessed, and is to-day, with innumerable men and women worthy to wear medals of distinction and honor, and to receive cheers and applause in every grade of service. The highest reward to countless of such, is the consciousness of work nobly undertaken, well done, and of a goal that they were ever striving for, and yet forever projecting further on and higher. Michael Angelo could conceive no nobler architectural work than Brunnelleschi's dome at Florence, and when summoned to St. Peter's said, "I will repeat that, but lift it toward the sky." Lives of great men are for our reminders. True nobility is without race or color or sex or class. Ranks and titles and orders of nobility are as many as there are opportunities in life, and these need no ribbons or stars or decorations of any kind as their insignia. The cup of cold water given to one who had greater need gilds Sidney's name far beyond the touch of any king or queen, with the summons to "rise, Sir Knight." And Florence Nightingale and John Howard need nothing other than their name.

Let no man who has had four years here at Bucknell fail to realize what has been his privilege. By so much greater as have been his opportunities than have been those of others, by so much surer should be his choice. Only in this can there be shame or failure in our lives, that we have not rightly made use of that we had. But if this be our shame to-day in any measure, again is our privilege and obligation plainly upon us, to learn through failure, and now to make wise choice.

A COIN.

Rummaging over some odds and ends such as one always finds in those old-fashioned vases that sit so serenely on the parlor mantel and hold their burden of golden wheat, I found an old cent, one of those a dollar's worth of which would be almost ballast enough for a small boat.

There is a certain pleasure in trying to picture in fancy a day in a coin's history. For instance, I have an old Roman coin that I always believe was part of the price paid for a most beautiful slave; and I have a Greek coin which was the only possession of an idiot boy who lost his life defending the bit of metal from a ruffian who had been attracted by its brightness. So too, I fancied a day's experiences of this coin I had found in the vase.

I chose a day in spring time, for in spring time even money seems more active, and indeed, pennies, after their long winter's rest in tin banks, earthen jugs and wooden boxes with holes in their lids, seem eager for the great changing about in store for them before they are again laid away for another long winter's rest, from which they are disturbed but twice a fortnight, when one of their number is chosen to lend its part to the worship in the village church.

When the morning of the day I have chosen dawned, my coin was in the pocket of the village undertaker and was still congratulating itself upon not being either of its two companions that had been used to keep closed the eyes of the old beggar that had died during the night. From the undertaker's pocket the cent went into the till of the tap room and there it was in bad company sure enough, for right under it was a shilling which at some time had been pierced thro and thro, but afterward it had fallen into the hands of a good Samaritan who had poured lead into its wound and again made it whole. The cent was about to turn tail and run to a vacant corner when it was taken from the till and given to a little Indian beggar-boy who told such a sorry tale and told it so well that the hearing of it was worth far more than the copper he got. Indian mothers care but little for their own clothes and less for their children's ; this latter fact served well our coin for through a hole in the boy's pocket it slipped unnoticed to the ground and lay there enjoying its freedom until picked up by a sad-eyed child with a bunch of delicate wild flowers in his hand. He seemed to have picked up the coin as a matter of course, and putting it into his pocket he went along caressing his flowers. Stopping before a garden in which a kindly old man was working among some beautiful flowers, the boy seemed suddenly to realize the cent's value, and he offered it to the man for as many flowers as the latter might give. He wanted them for his sister, he said. As the man handed over the gate a great bunch of flowers he took the coin to humor the boy in the belief that he was really buying them and then planted it under a rose bush—"for luck," he said. The boy went on to the village church yard ; upon a little mound he placed his flowers and then arranged them so that to him they looked most beautiful—altho he could hardly see for the tears in his eyes, then sitting beside the mound he looked up to the skies as though wondering whether his sister were in the ground where he had seen her placed, or whether she had gone above as the minister had so often told him.

NOLI SPE.

A SUCCESSFUL COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

MAJOR GEORGE G. GROFF, U. S. V.,

Professor of Organic Sciences, Bucknell University.

All Americans are now interested in the success or failure of the National Government in its control of the new "Colonies." Especially should college students feel a keen interest in the subject, for in the government of these dependencies, there will be a need of the best men the country can produce.

Puerto Rico is a Spanish-American country, with one million inhabitants, who through oppression continued through hundreds of years, have been reduced to the most abject poverty and ignorance, not more than 15 per cent. being able to read and write. An American who has not seen such a country can form no real idea of the condition of the people. The American flag was unfurled over this Island one year ago, Oct. 18, 1898, and an orderly and successful Military Government has proceeded in its evolution without interruption, or friction, now for a little more than a year.

About a year before the American occupation began, Spain had granted to both Cuba and Puerto Rico autonomy, but the new Governments had not been fully inaugurated at the time of the occupation.

Under the scheme of autonomy there was a Governor General, and a Cabinet of Secretaries, viz: of State, of Finance, of War, of Interior, of Public Works and of Communication.

The Governor General remains, but there is now only one Secretary, called Civil Secretary, who has charge of the following Bureaus: Of State and Municipal Affairs; of Internal Revenue and of Agriculture.

The Civil Secretary and the Chief of the Bureaus are all natives and are appointed by the Governor.

There is a Treasurer of the Island, a United States Army Officer, and an Auditor, from the Auditor's office in Washington. The Customs Officers are all of the United States Army. There are nine internal revenue districts. All in charge of natives. There are eight Insular "Boards," appointed by the Governor as follows: The Judicial Board: Six Members—Four natives, Two Americans; Board of Prison Control: Six Members—Three Natives, Three Americans; Superior Board of Health: Six Members—Two Natives, Four Americans; Insular Board of Education: Six Members—Four Natives, Two Americans; Board of Public Charities: Eight Members—Two Natives, Six Americans; Advisory Board: Nine Members—All Natives.

There is also a United States Provisional Court, which is open to all Americans and Foreigners, and to Porto Ricans under certain restrictions. The old Spanish laws, except where they were too outrageously bad to be continued, are still administered in the Island, by the Governor, and the Boards above named.

The local governments remain undisturbed. These we may call County or more properly municipal Governments, presided over by Alcaldes. Of these, there are 68. The local taxes are gathered and expended, as before the occupation, by the local authorities.

The Customs receipts are all expended on the Island, which is proper and necessary. There is a postal Department, modeled after that at Washington, the employees of which are all paid from the Insular Treasury. While the Chief Offices of the Postal Service are held by Americans, all the minor posts are filled by bright young natives, who are training to take full charge of this service in a few years.

When an old law is found to be very oppressive or unjust, the Governor is petitioned, and he abolishes it, if convinced this course be best. When one of the Boards desires a new law, it formulates the same, and presents it to the Governor, who, if he approves, promulgates it as a General Order, and it is at once a law of the land. In this way the whole Spanish school law was superceded by a new law, drawn up by General John Eaton. Scarcely a day passes but some old law is abolished and a better one promulgated. All these changes go on quietly and without any friction. The Alcaldes (corresponding most nearly to the American Mayors of cities or Sheriffs of counties were formerly appointed by the Governor, as were also the Local School Boards. Now, when one of these Posts become vacant, an election is ordered, and under the guidance of Americans, is successfully held. No office holder is permitted to appear as an active politician in any election, a very hard thing for these people to learn, for they are all born politicians.

There is another agency employed in this Government, which must not be lost sight of. This is the Insular Police, a picked body of men, who patrol all rural portions of the Island, and who maintain the most complete order and quiet. Before this force was organized, burning of houses, and robberies and murders were common in the remoter mountain sections, which American soldiers could not stop. But all this has now ceased, and the Island is as quiet as a county in New England or Pennsylvania. In similar Police Forces, lies the germ of the Government of other Islands and Countries, without the aid of large armies. Indeed, the writer believes that all the troops could now safely be withdrawn from Puerto Rico, if only a contingent say, of 500 remain for a few years. It will be observed that the Spanish Government had a Civil Guard of 5,000 men, and 5,000 regular troops, or a total of 10,000 soldiers, where the Americans now have a police force of but 400 men and 1500 soldiers.

Five hundred young Puerto Rican men have been enlisted into the United States Army, and are making excellent soldiers. While at the same time learning the English language, and being disciplined in immediate obedience and correct habits of life. To the credit of these young men, it is said by their officers, that they are sending to their homes the most of the money they receive for wages. It would probably be a good investment for the Government at Washington to enlist a full regiment of natives in each colony, simply as a means of education. So far the people have enthusiastically welcomed all the changes made for their good. One man remarked a few days ago, "The future of my children is now assured. I can die content." Only the professional politicians are dissatisfied, and that only because they are out of office.

The present status should not be changed for a time. The people need such an amount of schooling in American methods, as will enable them to carry on their Government when the present Army officers withdraw. The writer places the minimum period for instruction at five years. Especially, should the Government be left in power long enough to work out fixed policies. The government we now have in Porto Rico may be continued along the same lines, a civil governor taking the place of the military governor. But he must have the veto power, and safeguards must be provided for, that there be no way left open for the country to fall into the political methods of the Spanish-American countries. Nor, must it any more be turned over to the home politicians as a spoil. We have not more than two such men on the Island now.

Americans may look for a phenomenal educational advance in Puerto Rico. It will not be a steady advance, but will be by jumps and bounds. The great need is money for school-houses, school-grounds and school appliances. The Spaniards did not leave a single school house in the Island, neither apparatus nor books. It is to be hoped that some rich American will see the advantage to the United States of furnishing a million dollars for a public school and university fund for the Island. Puerto Rico is the gate to South America and its yearly billion dollar trade. Can Americans afford to leave the gate guarded by any but full fledged Americans? The hope of the island rests in a good public school system ably administered.

The language which will admit us to South America is the Castillian, and every college student is urged to secure a speaking knowledge of the same. The world is to-day too small to admit the vast possibilities of South America to remain but partially developed. The whole continent will eventually come under the dominion of the Anglo-Saxon.

San Juan, P. R., Oct, 26th, 1899.

DR. JOSEPH PRIESTLEY.

In Riverview Cemetery, on the outskirts of the quaint old village of Northumberland, there stands a plain old tombstone with this inscription,

To the memory of the Rev^{d}. D^{r}. Joseph Priestley on the 6th Feb^{y}. 1801,
Anno Etatis LXXI.

Dr. Joseph Priestley, preacher, pedagogue, scientist, theologian and philosopher, was one of the clearest, most liberal thinkers of the latter half of the eighteenth century. No line of thought was too difficult and no object of investigation was too trivial to merit his attention. He had learned no less than seven languages, five of which he had taught. His lectures at Warrington cover such subjects as Theory of Language, Universal Grammar, Oratory, together with courses on philosophical criticism and civil law, while his published works number some eighteen or twenty large octavos.

In all the diverse fields of his researches, Theology was the line nearest to Priestley's heart. His greatest delight seems to have been theological controversy. He warmly defended his own views and it is said of him, that if no opponents presented themselves, he would go forth in search of them. But he was nevertheless a seeker after truth. He was too broad to be confined to any creed. In the very free discussions at Daventry, he says that he always found himself on the unorthodox side. Raised in a Calvinist family, he early adopted non-conformist views. Later, not satisfied with the Calvinistic doctrines, he drifted toward philosophical necessarianism and in middle life become a pronounced Unitarian. Not creed, but truth was the object of his search. He was an advocate of freedom of thought here as elsewhere.

The same broad liberalism is manifest in his work as a teacher. At Warrington Academy, he was "tutor in the learned languages," but in addition to this we find him delivering lectures on all conceivable subjects. He tried to instil his own love of freedom of thought into his students. "His object," says one of his pupils, "was to engage the students to examine and decide for themselves, uninfluenced by the sentiments of any other persons." We also find him performing simple scientific experiments before his classes and teaching them the use of philosophical instruments, which was something unusual in those days of extreme classicism. In endeavoring to interest his pupils in science, he became deeply interested in it himself. In fact it was this very circumstance which led him to scientific investigation.

While Priestley did some great work as a theologian, it is for his scientific discoveries that he will be longest remembered. His early education was entirely void of scientific training and he never became interested in science until he began to teach. But the thirst for science once aroused, was unquenchable. Soon we see him studying "fixed air" in the vats of a great brewery at Leeds and constructing rude home-made apparatus for the investigation of gases. Perhaps his most notable scientific work was the discovery of a gas which he called "dephlogisticated air." This discovery entitles him to rank among the founders of modern chemistry. It seems also that we owe a debt of gratitude to the Frenchman who invented for this gas the simple name Oxygen.

He was a tireless experimenter but there was little system in his work, as he believed that great discoveries were made by chance. "His mind, like Kepler's, leapt from point to point, indicating many main lines of modern discovery." "Trusting to mother wit to supply the place of training," says Huxley, "and to ingenuity to create apparatus out of washing tubs, he discovered more new gases than all of his predecessors put together." But Priestley did not live to learn the magnitude of his discoveries and some of the theories which he based upon them were, in the highest degree, absurd. His last scientific work, published but a few years before his death was a vigorous defense of the old Theory of Phlogiston.

He was too much of a theologian to stand very high as a philosopher and his politics are largely derived from Locke and Hume. He is a most notable figure in the struggle for freedom of thought. The Birmingham mob may destroy his papers, containing the results of years of patient thought and investigation but his invincible spirit was not to be shaken. A dissenter in religion, a liberal in politics and philosophy, he always held truth above creed and freedom of thought before everything.

DISCONTENT.

I built a castle ;
I filled it full of vivid imag'ry ;
I entered in,
And lived there in content.

No one was with me.
I pictured out an unreal destiny ;
I lived alone
In solitude and bliss.

I thought it pleasure,
Therein I erred. When true reality
Was round about,
My dreams seemed dark and drear.

I saw my folly
Myself the lord of foolish fantasy.
I then awoke
And seeks now, but for truth.

FIVE TO NOTHING.

HOW WE DID IT.

Well ! We did it. Probably no one was more surprised than the Bucknellites—even more so than “victorious” State which was dejected to a cutaleptic State by our solid line, wise ends, fast backs and the lack of punting from our famous Christy ; which was hardly needed.

The goal posts were whitewashed this year—Rocky's reason why we did it. “Mit” Carter said it was our year to win. The majority of the prognostications were like Dole's—way off.

The team did the work in the forty-five minutes playing that made a touchdown and kept State so far away from our goal that it made their eyes sore in straining to see it.

Coach Hoskins trained the boys—most of them green-horns—so well that the farmers run against a brick wall and their “slats” (Beef's expression) gave way to the Bucknell Ram, leaving large holes through which a few yards were made each time.

There was a large crowd at Athletic Park—the blue and white and the orange and blue both floated in the breeze over the heads of all. The former had a confident appearance, taking things easy ; the latter a defiant swing, struggling hard. As usual, the respective rooters occupied the sides which seem theirs by precedent.

Even before the game was begun, pandemonium reigned supreme. Old Rip would have sworn he struck a “still” going up, had he risen for the occasion. The boys did themselves well—the team was enthused by their cheering. And when the game started—why my ears are still ringing with the hooting—just as the old Roman's mind was expressed with the “Wild Man of Borneo.” It was rather incoherent ; yet it did the business. We made more noise than State. We won. The best part of it was that when we had the ball you could have heard a pin drop, when State had it, a cannon report wouldn't have been in it. Why old Randolph asked Young to keep us quiet ; think of it. Then we didn't give up. When the ball was in our territory—that made us root louder. Fisk had to do away with overtones in his two sermons next day; his congregation felt elated and asked for no excuses. Even Rowe came off his dignity and "voiced the sentiment of the crowd" with his baso-falsetto voice. Everybody yelled and yelled like—the old maid who stepped on her pet cat's tail.

But you want to do a little better next year. Let's see how we'll do State in 1900.

We all know "How we did it" generally, but there are a few specific reasons. You know the great man becomes great by looking after the details. So it is with everything else. The boys kept State guessing by the "detail" taught them by the coach such as—State knows now.

As in '96, so in '99, there was enthusiasm amongst the students. But what a difference. In the former year all hopes were for victory—this year few. In our freshman year we had a veteran team; in our senior year, a greenhorn. A few loyal students brought the boys together, endeavor was made for a system in leaving off their enthusiasm. You know when the pores don't work right, a sick person results. So with enthusiasm; if it isn't worked right, a defeat results. Something was accomplished: the croakers pooh-poohed ideas. What's the use of a band of noise, of rooting! Well, boys, see what it did.

Get together. Stick together. Don't wait until the week of State game. Begin early, stay at it late. You see now that you have some use for good musicians—hence keep your band up this year. Support it if you can't play on it, and when you want good music to celebrate a victory over State you will have it. Your college publicatians are for college life. Make use of them in their first issues; have your composers contribute good verses to be printed to the latest popular music. Be up to date. Sing them to your band music.

Again. Let each learn the yells. You have enthusiastic marshalls in Professor Fisk and a few boys of the upper classes.

Systematize your rooting. You made a noise on Nov. 4th. In 1900 do rooting. Noise is all right for beginners; but college men should root loud and strong. A hog—even the kind they raise at State's agricultural department—can make a noise; but it takes a more intelligent animal to make overtones, or do rooting. The modern Greeks at the games in Athens a few years ago discovered the lost key of the old Olympian games in the American college yell. It surprised, pleased, enthused them.

What does this systematic rooting do? The nerves of the players are at a state of tension. The team is losing ground, all at once, 'Rah'—'Rah'—'Rah'—then they grit their teeth with a "We will win," hold the ball for four downs and start the pigskin for the other goal, a touchdown and the game is won.

Then come your parades, celebrations and receptions. Oh! there is nothing like it. Rockefeller with an added Standard to his Trust is not so happy as Bucknell when she beats State; and State's deep gloom when defeat meets the team that can win from any in the U. S. (Press report) is the same as the men that the Oil King bests.

Take your band to the game with you next year in full dress—you are doing it, not those who are afraid of losing. And when you win you will get the present seniors' bequests more willingly and remind them of their loyalty to old Bucknell.

1900.

NOV. 4th, 1899.

I would not say I would
Before I knew I could.
I would not boast and smile
Before I'd made the trial.
I would not make display
Too early in the day.
I would not say I'd win
Then carry off chagrin.
In other words, good sense
Is not "State's evidence."

PARDONED.

Pardoned did you say ? Ah false, false word
For pardon cannot be where sin ne'er came.
O lovely vales of France blush crimson now,
For that word tells to all the world thy shame.

Pardoned ; Oh conscience of the wide, wide world
Arouse while sin is dominant to say
That man is pardoned to whom wrong was done,
Nor sleep till justice holds its powerful sway.

Pardoned. Oh perish now the traitorous thought
For innocence can ne'er forgiveness claim ;
But Prejudice has blinded Virtue's eyes
And Hate has fashioned for the Truth a chain.

Pardoned, But God still lives and overrules
And hate of men must moulder into dust ;
True innocence one day shall be revealed
The Father, tho' he suffer long, is just.

EDITORIAL.

One of the first things a new student should do is to learn to use the library. He should learn the location of the cases devoted to English, Latin and Greek Literatures, History, Social Science and Philosophy. He should learn to locate the various bound magazines and how to use the different indexes.

The library is one of the most important parts of the University and library work is one of the most important duties of the scholar. In a great library are to be found many thousand volumes which no individual student can afford to possess. It is intended to supplement and broaden every department of college work. Here the student learns to investigate for himself, to weigh opinions and decide on their value for himself.

The class of '99 gave about forty-five dollars to the library for the purchase of books on Political Science. This was indeed a praiseworthy act. The Political Science department of the library was very weak and a demand has long existed for some standard works along this line. The great increase in the number of students in this department which led to the establishment of the chair of Political Science also demands a corresponding expansion in the library.

This act of '99 is worthy of imitation by other classes. There are several other departments of the library which need new books. In Sociological and Anthropological studies, new volumes are being published every month which should be made accessible to our students. There should also be a few standard works on Mathematics, as histories and philosophies of mathematics and some treatises on the higher branches to supplement our long and excellent course in this department.

The MIRROR staff offers the following prizes to undergraduate students :

1. One year's subscription for the best short poem.
2. One year's subscription for the best short story (600 to 1000 words).
3. One year's subscription for the best essay (600 to 1000 words).

The contest will close Dec. 1st, 1899, the winners to be announced in the December issue. We reserve the right to publish any or all articles submitted. Address,

COLLEGE NOTES.

The first "At Home" of the year was held in the Institute parlors Monday, Nov. 6.

Registrar Wm. C. Gretzinger has been spending the past two weeks at Clifton Springs, N. Y.

A concert will be given in Bucknell Hall Tuesday evening, Nov. 21, under the direction of Dr. Aviragnet.

Adie Bell of the training ship "Saratoga" spent several days here last week, the guest of his brother Edward Bell, '00,

The stately brick walls of the New West College have already been reared to the height of three stories and work is progressing rapidly.

The new water system by which Watsontown and Lewisburg will be supplied with pure, fresh mountain water from White Deer Creek, will soon be completed.

Prof. and Mrs. Edwards gave their annual reception to the Institute and Academy Tuesday evening, Oct. 31. The Mandolin and Guitar Club rendered pleasing selections.

Dr. Putnam, of New York City, gave two excellent illustrated lectures in the Opera House on the evenings of Oct. 26 and 27. The subject of first was "Paris, the Queen City of Europe" and the second, "Rome, the Eternal City." The proceeds were for benefit of Athletic Association.

The Athletic Association is selling tickets for a course of eight popnlar entertainments to be given in the Lewisburg Opera House. The course includes the following splendid entertainments: The Ariel Ladies Sextette; Katharine E. Oliver, (Impersonator); Franz-Wilczek Grand Concert Co.; Rogers-Grilley Co. (Recitals); Patricola Grand Concert Co.; John Thomas Concert Co.; Slayton Jubilee Singers; Rev. Robt. Stuart McArthur (Lecture).

The members of the Freshmen class held their first annual banquet at the Broadway House, Milton, Thursday evening, Oct. 19. As the result of a compromise effected early in the term between the Freshmen and Sophomore classes, there was an entire absence of anything like interference to break up the festivities of the first year class. Prof. and Mrs. E. M. Heim chaperoned the young people. Landlord Schuyler's well-earned reputation for courteous and efficient service was well sustained by the excellent menu served on this occasion.

On Tuesday evening, Nov. 7, the members of the Bucknell foot-ball team were tendered a reception by the ladies of Lewisburg. Many were present to enjoy with the boys their victory over State College. Addresses were made by Profs. Hulley, Perrine, Rockwood, Edwards, Mr. D. P. Higgins, Hon. John T. Hyatt and Dr. Gundy. Coach Hoskins was presented with a beautiful diamond pin the gift of the ladies of the town. Mr. Hoskins responded in an able manner and paid a high compliment to the character of the men composing the team. Refreshments were served after which the younger people danced to music furnished by the band.

This exhibition of interest and good-will on the part of the town ladies is greatly appreciated by the boys of Bucknell, and will be an incentive for them to continue adding to their good record.

ATHLETICS.

The Duquesne C. & A. C. team against which Bucknell lined up Saturday, Oct. 21, was in every respect far superior to any other team our eleven battled against this year.

Bucknell did excellent work throughout and made a number of splendid gains, but to score against the giant team seemed impossible. Our team deserves special credit for the spirited work in the second half when Duquesne succeeded only once in crossing our goal line. Altogether Duquesne scored six times making the final score: Duquesne, 35; Bucknell, 0.

On Saturday, Oct. 28, Bucknell played Susquehanna University on the athletic field here and by quick, hard plays succeeded in scoring 45 points against their opponents. It was an interesting game throughout. The teams were almost equal in weight. Susquehanna won admiration by some excellent individual plays but they clearly showed lack of training in teamwork. Bucknell's team work was magnificent; as a result touchdowns and goals followed in rapid succession and when time was called the score stood: Bucknell, 45; Susquehanna, 0.

BUCKNELL, 5; STATE, 0.

Despite threatening clouds and chilling winds about four thousand people witnessed the annual contest between Bucknell University and State College at Athletic Park, Williamsport, Saturday, Nov. 4.

The game was started at about 3:07. Bucknell had the kick-off and Mathewson sent the oval to the 25 yard line. Cure punted it back. Another exchange of kicks followed and Bucknell's full-back had the better of it. Throughout the game Mathewson out-punted Cure by from 5 to 20 yards.

Then Bucknell began her assaults on State's line. The way the braves ploughed through the blue-jerseyed players, caused tin-horn, locust-rattle, cow-bell confusion to reign for a time among the Bucknell rooters.

Three, five and even ten yards at a rush the ball was advanced until the 25 yard line was reached. Bucknell attempted goal from field but failed. Cure punted out of danger and the line of scrimmage was then near middle of field. At this point, Stanton, Bucknell's speedy left half-back, took the ball and skirted the end for 35 yards being downed only 4 yards from the goal line. It was the most sensational play of the game. "The frenzied yells rolled over against the pine-clad hills and the old trees must have thought Father Time had turned back in his race and the red Indian was again skulking through the historic valley, whooping for the hirsute covering of his pale-faced brother's head." Three scrimmages, then Kase landed across the goal line, and Bucknell's winning touchdown was made. The trial at goal failed.

In the second half State took a firmer stand. The two teams alternately struggled for and desperately defended every foot of ground. Bucknell played a great game throughout, and the victory was the result of skillful coaching coupled with persistent hard work.

ALUMNI NOTES.

'52. Rev. A. B. Still is now living in Phoenixville, Pa.

'53. The death of Rev. J. Spencer Kennard, D. D., which occurred at Philadelphia on Oct. 16, removes the last surviving member of this class. Dr. Kennard was born in Philadelphia, September 24, 1833. After graduation from college, he studied theology at Princeton, and was ordained to the Baptist ministry at the age of 22. He was pastor at Bridgeton, N. J., Washington, D. C., and in 1866 succeeded his father as pastor of the Tenth Baptist Church of Philadelphia. He subsequently became pastor of the Pilgrim Church of New York City; Central Square Church, East Boston, Mass.; and Fourth and Belden Avenue Church, Chicago. The later years of his life were spent in evangelistic work and literary labor.

Hiram F. Reed, an honorary A. M. of Bucknell University, died in Philadelphia, October 16. In his early manhood, he was manager of the printing office of the "Christian Chronicle." He was also proprietor of the "Baptist Family Magazine" from 1857 to 1861. He founded and was president of the Eastonian School of Elocution and Oratory, and was for some time a professor of elocution in Temple College, Philadelphia. He became the publishing agent of the American Baptist Publication Society in 1853, and retained his connection with the society until his death.

Ex-'63. Hon, John I. Mitchell, Judge of Tioga Co. (Pa.) Courts, and formerly U. S. Senator from Pennsylvania, has been elected Judge of the Superior Court of the State, on the Republican ticket.

'83. Rev. M. J. Watkins removes from Factoryville, Pa., to Hallstead, Pa.

'85. Rev. J. E. Sagebeer, D. D., of Philadelphia, was a recent visitor at the college.

'88. Rev. R. B. McDanel, after a pastorate of five years at Oak Lane, Philadelphia, has resigned to take effect at the close of November. He has accepted a call from the Baptist church at Clarksburg, W. Va., a leading church of the State, in a growing and prosperous town.

Ex-'91. Rev. Thomas S. Cross has accepted an offer to become assistant professor of theology in Temple College, Philadelphia.

'94. R. B. Davidson is the new general secretary of the Student Christian Association at the University of Michigan and assumed his duties at the opening of the fall term. Mr. Davidson spent five years at the University of Chicago, where he took a theological course and earned the degree of Bachelor of Divinity. He also took a course which will soon entitle him to the degree of Doctor of Philosophy.

'96. Herbert Harris, son of Pres. Harris, was recently admitted to the Lycoming bar. He will enter the office of Candor & Munson.

EXCHANGES.

We notice among our exchanges The Normal School Herald from Cumberland Valley State Normal School, a first class literary quarterly, of which Prof. Ezra Lehman, Bucknell '99, is Editor-in-Chief.

The editorial pages of the Magazine of the University of Virginia are devoted largely to the poet Edgar Allan Poe, who was at one time a student of that University. This greatly increased interest in Poe is due to the recent unveiling of Zolnay's bust.

It is true "that America generally has come to give Poe his rightful place among her men of letters." Poe holds a unique position in literature. He is a school of his own. The spirit of his poetry is peculiar to him and cannot be imitated. We can hardly blame the Editor for claiming Poe as a southern poet, yet the name of Poe is dear to every fair-minded student of American literature and we beg leave to call him an American poet.

The Magazine opens with the following verses which are worthy of notice :

TO POE

Though shivering passion shook thy earthly frame,
  Waving in gusts thy weak will to and fro,
  And oftentimes temptation laid thee low,
Thus giving shadow to the sneerer's claim
That scorned among men should be thy name,
  Destined to dust and ashes soon to go,
  Scarce even such that one might pity show,
But scorn, reproach, sharp sneers, and bitter blame ;
  Yet bright in thee doth glow the truth divine
That glory dwelleth chiefly in man's soul,
  Since thou didst nought impure to words consign,
But melody and truth in beauteous whole ;
  Thy motto thus : "Though frailty be mine,
Art's perfect truth shall in my numbers roll."

THE FRESHMAN'S CONSOLATION.

"Tempus fugit," said the Romans.
Yes, alas, 'tis, fleeing on.
    Ever coming,
    Ever going ;
Life is short and soon 'tis gone.
But as I think of next vacation
Poring o'er these lessons huge,
    Ever harder,
    Ever longer,
All I say is, "Let her fuge."—Thielensian.

Oh Susan Van Duzon the girl of my choosin'
You stick in my bosom like glue;
When this you're perusin' remember I'm musin'
Sweet Susan Van Duzon of you.

So don't be abusin' my offer, and bruisin'
A heart that is willing to woo;
But please be excusin,' not cold and refusin'
Oh Susan Van Duzon please do.

Oh Susan Van Duzon before I'd be losin'
One glance from your eyes of sky blue,
I vow I'd stop usin' tobacco and boozin'—
(That word is not nice, it is true.)

I wear out my shoes'n I'm losin' my roos'n—
(My reason I should say,) dear Sue;
So please change your views'n become my dear Susan,
Oh Susan Van Duzon please do.—Ex.

ENGLISH IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Address before the State Teachers' Association at Gettysburg, July 5th, 1899.

ENOCH PERRINE, A.M., LITT. D.

There is evidence, clear and convincing, that the Colleges, in their quest for students, must in the future look rather to the Public Schools than to the Private and Semi-public Academies. This dependence of the Colleges upon the Public School bids fair to increase and not to diminish, consequent upon the establishment and perfection of the Public Schools, whose principals and teachers are found, in greater numbers, in the list of college graduates. So strong is the demand for better work that many who teach in these schools are not content with a Bachelor's degree but pursue, as time and opportunity permit, graduate studies in the University. To their credit be it said; since many of them run the prolonged courses of the College and the University not because of proffered reward but because of the love they bear to learning. For these reasons the College professor takes an increasing interest in the Public School of whatever grade and is anxious that it be brought to the highest state of efficiency. He feels that there is a clear line of separation between the work of the Public School, the work of the College, and the work of the University; he feels that he can do successful and happy work only as the foundations have been well laid for him in the Public School.

The requirements for entrance into college may be classed under five heads:—English, Latin and Greek, Mathematics, Science and the Modern Languages. These, except the English, are now fairly well met; i. e. where an attempt is made to prepare students for college in the Classics, Mathematics, Science and the Modern Languages, the attempt is measurably successful. So much, however, except in rare cases, can not be said of the preparation in English. More bold than the rest of us, the Washington and Jefferson College says:—"In English Branches candidates otherwise well prepared, are often found defective"; the Western University of Pennsylvania finds it necessary to say that "during the first part of the Freshman year an elementary [an elementary, not an advanced] textbook in Rhetoric is used"; we, at Bucknell, are compelled to announce that "candidates will be as strictly examined in English studies as in the Ancient Languages and Mathematics"; while all of us, to speak broadly, contrasting strangely with the professors in other departments, assert that "no candidate will be accepted in English whose work is notably deficient in spelling, punctuation, idiom or division into paragraphs". This latter sentence we borrow from a source higher than ourselves—the Committee that prepares these lists of requirements; and the fact that we all use it is proof that English, like a "poor relation," is everywhere still knocking at the door of the Public School and the Private and the Semi-public Academy alike, for permission to come in and be counted as one of the family. This condition of affairs is due to the fact that (1) many who control boards of instruction, contrary to the wishes of principals and teachers, are unwilling to provide efficient teaching or to give sufficient time for instruction in the English branches; except in rare cases the College professor is seldom asked to recommend a candidate specifically in English, and when he is so asked it is generally for a recommendation of the candidate's English as subordinate to his attainments in other branches; and (2) many believe that, as the instruction would be in their own language, dispensing with the aid of a teacher they can of themselves obtain the necessary information; and (3) many feel that it is quite enough if one succeeds in being understood without wasting effort in trying to make his expression correct or forcible or beautiful. When we shall all be willing to make public proclamation that next after his religion and family ties one's own language is his best inheritance, that it will be degraded unless constant watchfulness is exercised, that it needs to be developed or else one will go thro the world, to quote Beecher, "whipping with a switch that has the leaves on", that like any other branch of intellectual effort the study of English requires the inspiration, the organization, the classification and the direction that an able and faithful instructor can provide, and that in the scholarly study of its literature, the English-speaking people admittedly have one of the best means by which to deepen thought and brighten life known to men, when we shall proclaim this so persuasively that those who are in control shall be compelled to believe and act upon it as truth, then the problem of English in the Public School and in every other school, for the matter of that, will be solved.

The Colleges of Pennsylvania, with few exceptions, have adopted the scheme for requirements in English proposed by the Association of Colleges and Preparatory Schools of the Middle States and Maryland. Generally they add to this scheme the assertion that the candidate is expected to know the essentials of grammar and to be able to express clearly whatever ideas he may entertain. Surely these requirements are not too ambitious and doubtless if fulfilled they would serve to render the members of classes coming into College more nearly equal in attainments and better fitted to pursue not only the advanced courses in English but those of any other department to which they might proceed. The reasons other than those already mentioned, why these requirements are not fulfilled are (1) the haste displayed by many students to get into college with the result that they enter, as the hunchback King Richard came into the world, "scarce half made up," slighting, for obvious reasons, in their rapid journey thro the preparatory school the English studies most of all; and (2) the desire of many students who wish to be teachers to do as little as possible in collegiate English since they see that frequently in secondary schools the department of English is not differentiated as are the other departments, that the salary offered is not so tempting and that the position, for these reasons, has less prestige and offers less chance for advancement. It will be noticed that for these defects principals and teachers are not responsible and that except indirectly they cannot remedy them. In France and Germany, from which come many of our progressive notions in pedagogy, they do things differently; for there the best provision is made from the primary grade onward for the teaching of the vernacular with the result that in all his work, as he blazes his way thro that which is to him the undiscovered tracts of investigation, the student is using the brightened and sharpened weapon of his native speech, a result sure to show itself with splendid success when he comes to open to his own pupils the treasures of his acquired knowledge. Mr. Bryce and Professor Jebb declare with sorrow that other matters have driven the study of literature and topics of human interest from the Public Schools of England. Can it be that these have not been driven from the American School simply because they have never gained a strong foothold there? Some one is needed who shall speak out authoritatively and say that the scientific, critical, persistent study of English in ways suited to each grade must be pursued in all schools, high and humble. Especially is this true of Pennsylvania where because of early and late immigration from so many quarters and the disposition of many to use foreign forms of speech, there has resulted many idioms or rather numberless idioms sadly at variance with the standards that obtain wherever in the world an English, pure and undefiled, is spoken. However much these various idioms may deserve to be cherished as matters of historical or philological interest—and they are of great value in this respect; however much they deserve to be cherished as binding firmer the pleasing ties of home and ancestry—and for this they are most potent influences; the fact remains that, along with them, should go the very best possible training in English speech as a preparation for efficient work in the ranks of that great and overspreading race now pushing to remotest regions, and for due appreciation of its written literature whose unusual richness makes it the chief means of a general culture adapted to the conditions of the twentieth century.

We are rapidly approaching the time when directors of both public and private preparatory schools will see the situation in its true light—students being anxious to receive adequate instruction in English from teachers, who, assured of a prominent and permanent position and a good salary, have pursued courses in the College and, if you please, in the University. This instruction will begin on the very day when the pupil enters the primary grade and will continue uninterruptedly thro the grammar and high school grades, even to the day when he steps over the threshold of the College. At first it will be rather an individual and friendly matter between the teacher and his pupil and not so much that of dogmatic assertion, requiring the most skilful effort of the best teacher. It will be critical and directive on the part of the teacher ; on the part of the pupil it will be receptive and constructive. Pronouncing the words correctly, conceiving the idea clearly, constructing the sentence first forcibly, then beautifully—this will be the pupil's task. Uprooting the provincial pronunciation and expression, dispelling the fogs that surround the struggling thought, clarifying the paragraph as he frees it from all coarseness and roughness—this will be the teacher's task. The pupil because he, in some sort, creates, and the teacher because he adds the artistic touch that glorifies the work, should, and they will, take in this mutual contribution a delight that will cause their stay in the school-house to be, so to say, the path back to our lost Paradise. Apelles the painter became famous because he let no day go by without using his brush ; the teacher will know not to let a day pass without a line from his pupils, and as a result the work of teacher and pupil will not be repulsive but pleasant and highly profitable to both of them. Nor will it be considered sufficient in cases where no provision for the direct teaching of English has been made, if only the teachers in every other department bend their efforts toward improving the pupil's English—they can and they should be constant and valuable assistants in the work, because (1) they shall conceive this to be a part of their duty, (2) they shall have prepared themselves for it, (3) they shall be required to do it. Not to the detriment or even hindrance of their own work, but as concomitant and helpful, binding sandals to its feet that it may run its career the more quickly and easily. When the teachers of Latin and Greek, Science, Mathematics and the Modern Languages come to the rescue of the teacher of English fighting, in so many cases, his battle alone, we shall no longer see the valuable thoughts of these departments clothed by pupils in language that would make "Quintilian stare and gasp," we shall hear the harmony that results when "perfect music" has been married to "noble words."

Parallel with this critical work of the teacher and this constructive work of the pupil will develop on the part of both of them, the appreciative interpretation of literature in English. Not many days after he begins his school life—and the process should continue until that school life comes to an end—the pupil will be brought face to face with a classic adapted to his attainments—simple in thought, lucid in expression, inspirational in effect. And these classics will be read and studied not merely to consume an idle hour or to arouse an emotion for the patriotic, the aesthetic, the ethical that may soon pass off into cloudland—they will be read and studied, as well, for their effect upon the student's constructive work so that when he comes to think and write or speak it will be seen that he has been with the great authors and learned from them how they have instructed, inspired, delighted the generations sitting at their feet. As he progresses he will be introduced to these classics at the very time when he will best respond to them—Hawthorne's "Tanglewood Tales," Christian's fight with Apollyon in the "Pilgrim's Progress" and "Tom Brown at Rugby" for the growing, pugnacious boy; Scott's "Ivanhoe" and Shakespere's "As You Like It" for the youthful lover who at this time of his life is sighing like a furnace and writing woful ballads. He will not be introduced to excerpts and scraps and "middlings," he will be made acquainted with what master-men and women have seen fit to bless the world, not with what lesser people in their lack of wisdom and true feeling have determined to provide for him. Developed in this way he will be, when he enters College not a trifler, not omniverous, not a "bookful blockhead," but keen in his pursuit of the deeper things in the best of literature, as the hound in the pure morning air breaks his leash and speeds onward over the hills after his prey. His College professor will not need to coax and urge and force a shrinking victim to the executioner's block ; he will lead an eager comrade up this Alp and that, entranced with the "growing labors of the lengthened way." Thro his entire career, reading will not be a bore to him, because at each stage it will be of a world in which he then lives; speaking and writing will not be like the horror of deep darkness to him, because his mind, filled with the great thoughts of his books, and his heart, inspired by the noble company to which he has come, will combine to bid him: "Go and do thou likewise." On a foundation like this the College professor can build a structure "after the similitude of a palace." He is cheered as he sees more and more students who demand such training, and teachers in greater numbers who are anxious to qualify themselves to give such training, and boards of control that are willing to provide the opportunity for such training as rapidly as the general judgment of the people will sanction their efforts. He will be satisfied if candidates for entrance to College illustrate the training demanded by an educator, whose name I am unable to give: "I consider that they should be taught to read—not to know their letters glibly and get the sense of a paragraph in a book with quickness; but that they should cultivate and strive for the ability to take up the morning paper and read in an intelligent, pleasing fashion a column account of some happening of the day. I want them to learn to write, not so much to fill publishing houses with novels, treatises, or short stories, but to be able to sit down and write in legible script a comfortable or comforting letter to a parent or a friend. I want them to be able to speak the English language as it was intended it should be spoken—purely and simply, not to fill it with mannerisms nor to defile it with slang."

When all the millions of boys and girls in the public schools are subjected to a judicious and persistent training in English such as I have indicated, "may we not hope"—to quote the words of Professor Liddell in the Atlantic Monthly, "may we not hope for another such burst of thought as the one that gave us Shakespeare, and look for another Shakespeare to crown it all, another Shakespeare to whom some patient teacher in a public school may even now be giving his first instruction in English?"

OLD JOE'S HUSKING-BEE.

"Old Joe," as the fellows know him, was a countryman of the old school. On a few acres of run-down land he worked away with the same shiftless ambition that he had for years. His children had grown up and left the old home and now the old man and his faithful wife were left in that same antique little shanty in which they went to house-keeping, as bereft of domestic blessings as they were when married, save for the satisfaction of having reared a family.

Fate had placed his abode near an enterprising town in which a college was located. At first he had been a staunch supporter of the institution, but he was now opposed to all colleges, for the students, as most students are, were fond of a joke, and especially at Hallowe'en time. Old Joe being a seedy, harmless sort of a fellow, was almost invariably visited by these marauders on the 31st of October. That was the cause of his pessimistic views concerning colleges.

His health was poor this fall. All through the summer he had fought off the evident summons of nature to take a rest, but there was his good wife "Marm" to provide for and he must still struggle against the wolf at the door. Late and early he had worked through the spring seeding time. He had watched each crop as it yellowed and matured for the sickle, and carefully stored it away in his little barn. But now it was fall, the corn was all in shock and was "hurting" for the husking-peg.

It was the thirtieth of October. The good old lady was sitting by the fireside, in the evening, knitting away at a pair of winter socks for Joe. In a comfortable chair by her side sat her companion. One side of his face was puffed out with a monstrous quid of tobacco and ever and anon he would emit a quantity of juice into the grate. The low-ceilinged room was dimly lighted by a tallow candle, and a silence like that of death had fallen, save for the alternate tick of the clock and the click of the needles as they knit the heavy yarn.

At length he spoke. "To-morrow's Hallowe'en night, marm," he said, "an' I s'pose them Varsity fellows 'll be spoilin' some more property fer me. Well, some o' them may be in my fix some time. 'Bread cast upon the waters is sure to come back after many days'."

But let us look at another picture. On this same night, if one could have looked into one of the college rooms, he would have seen a fellow sitting comfortably on a bench whittling out a number of odd-looking wooden pegs that very much resembled a cigar or a miniature torpedo boat. The clock struck eleven, then twelve, but still he worked until he had thirty or forty of the instrumeuts manufactured. Then he went to bed to dream of his project for the coming night.

The following day a sign appeared on the college bulletin board : "All the fellows who want to have some fun to-night report at room No—, west wing, at 9:00 P. M., for information." Many of the students went out of curiosity, and some entered into the project.

At ten o'clock the town below was quiet and apparently deserted, except by the extra police force on duty that night. The full moon lighted up the country sufficiently for their purpose. Shortly after ten, thirty fellows in sweaters and "gym" suits stole quietly from the college, through the campus, through the shaded streets of the town and on into the country beyond, stealing along grassy lanes and over pastures till at last they were seated on the top rail of the fence overlooking "Old Joe's" cornfield. A gentle breeze was blowing and the long, thin blades of corn, as they fluttered to and fro, like the arms of an actress in a pantomime, seemed to beckon them on.

"Here we are, fellows," shouted the leader, "eight acres of corn to shuck before morning. Let each man forget to-morrow's flunk and think of poor old Joe."

Hurrahs rent the air and the good old man in the house, across the meadow, as he heard the shouts, said: "There's them Varsity boys again, marm, but I can't do nothin'; they'll have their way anyhow."

Shock after shock of the corn was pulled down and eagerly pounced upon by the active college boys. The yellow ears flew from dexterous hands into golden yellow heaps and on account of the merrymaking, songs, jokes, stories and yells, the time passed swiftly. Each one felt good because he was doing something for old Joe this year instead of against him.

Just as the moon was sinking behind the trees the job was finished. The yell was given and on the last shock, in a conspicuous place, was hung a card board on which was printed: "Please accept with compliments of the college students."

The next morning Joe came to the field to see what damage had been done. He slowly spelled the words on the placard and half an hour later when he came to the house he said, as he brushed a tear from his wrinkled cheek, "Marm, them Varsity fellows are all right, after all."

MY PRIMER.

My primer and I were both brand new
  That day we tottered to school,
And happy the hours together we spent
  By the side of the master's stool.
How innocent everything we did ;
  How much alike we seemed !
Together we grew my primer and I ;
  Together we slept and dreamed.
In primer's fair leaves my finger marks
  Some unknown way were placed ;
And into my mind the primer marks
  Of early life were traced.
The dog-eared leaves mean much to me
  When'er I turn them o'er,
The finger prints have much to add
  To memory's precious store.

WHERE TAM O'SHANTER RODE.

FRANK WEBER DILLON, A. B.

Two miles south of Ayr, in Southwestern Scotland, stands a memorial to the poet Burns. Within its marble columns constructed after the model of a Grecian temple, are grouped the figures of the poet and his literary characters and companions in country life, Tam O'Shanter and Souter Johnny, whose descendants still reside in the vicinity of Ayr. This Monument occupies a commanding site on the banks of the swift little river Doon and is close beside the old bridge of Doon. It is surrounded by well-kept public gardens. In the public square in front of the railway station in Ayr there is another statue of the poet by Lawson. Electric automobile cars run from the statue to the monument every half hour, and on each trip the car carries one or more admirers of the Scotch bard. The travelers come from many lands, and not the least enthusiastic among them are the Scotchmen born and bred within the sixty miles seperating Ayr from Glasgow. The automobile cars cover what was essentially the road over which Tam O'Shanter made his famous midnight ride. The Tam O'Shanter Inn is not far from the statue, and at the other end of the journey as the pedestrian passes the monument, he comes upon the old bridge of Doon at the key-stone of which the frightened Tam escaped from his ghostly pursuers.

The associations of these two miles of country road are many and interesting, especially so for the student of Burns' poetry. Everywhere the country-side seems full of the scenes and places touched upon by his pen. Far away to either side of the broad macadamized highway stretch the farms and homes of the peaceful and thrifty cotters, with here and there the residence of a prominent business-man of Ayr, until the village of Alloway clusters its several scattered houses to the left of the main road. The village is no more than a small hamlet of a few hundred population, but Burns was born here. His little white cottage stands, preserved as it was in 1759, on the right hand side of the highway, close upon the road and not conspicuous among the neighboring cottages except by the sign-board that indicates its identity. Old Alloway church slowly crumbling down to the level of the ancient stones in its churchyard, is on the same side of the highway about a third of a mile beyond the cottage. A little farther is the new church on the opposite side of the way, and a quaint tavern at the point where the traffic-bearing road turns off to the right and crosses the new bridge of Doon at no great distance from the old bridge and the Burns monument. A cottage opposite the monument contains mementoes of the poet and guards the entrance to the gardens and the beautiful banks of the deeply running Doon.

Few visitors come to Alloway who do not stroll along the banks of the river Doon, the youthful walk of the poet. Burns has filled us with expectancy by his stanzas, telling how,

"Oft hae I roved by bonnie Doon,
To see the rose and woodbine twine;
And ilka bird sang o' its love,
And fondly sae did I o' mine."

A well-trodden path extends along the brink of the river between the two bridges, and on the opposite side the bank rises to a prominent height, sloping gently upward and covered with trees and flowers in season. The bank on the monument side is not so steep but is high enough to give a feeling of seclusion from the world and intimacy with nature. The river path remains the Sabbath and holiday haunt of the lovers of Ayr and Alloway, and the vale a resting-place for the wearied tourist or farmer crossing the stream.

The river Doon has rather an inviting than a threatening appearance. It is not wide and the waters run smoothly, except perhaps in the floods of winter and springtime. It is quite deep enough to drown a man who is incapable of swimming the few strokes necessary to reach the bank from other reasons as suggested in the advice of Tam's "ain wife Kate,"

"She prophesied that, late or soon,
Thou wad be found deep drown'd in Doon."

Tam, however, seemed to have little trouble in crossing the stream the night when the witches were after him. In truth, the river proved his salvation since the evil spirits could not pursue beyond mid-stream indicated by the key-stone of the bridge.

Curious hieroglyphics and intertwined initials cover the "key-stane of the brig" and more accessible parts of the old stone structure. This mingling of the names and marks of lads and lasses with the inscriptions cut by the passing travelers attest the popularity of the resort as well as the indestructibility of the stone structure. One high stone arch spans the rapid river and the approaches are steep enough to try the strength of horses and the self-control of drivers in mounting to the top, which is far above the flood limits of the water. How often Burns may have stood looking over the stone side walls on the bridge up and down the green banks of the river, is only safe to conjecture after realizing how his poetical nature must have turned to so romantic a scene.

Years to come will not efface the ruins of the "auld kirk Alloway" from its prominent position in the history of the village; and its name in literature bids fair to outlast the sturdy ruined walls and tower and live as long as "Tam O'Shanter" preserves the interesting antics of the bogies and witches of preceding years. Burns, lying in his little cottage bedroom, may have heard the jolly cotters who had loitered too long in the taverns of Ayr after disposing of the farm produce on the weekly market-days, clatter home at midnight along the hard highway passing the cottage door. It is not beyond possibility that his youthful eyes, his mind having been filled with tales of goblins repeated by an old woman in the house, scanned the intervening space between his cottage and the old church, and his poetic instinct pictured to him the first faint outlines of the scene in the later tale of "Tam O'Shanter:"

"Before him Doon pours all his floods,
  The doubling storm roars through the woods.
The lightnings flash from pole to pole,
  Near and more near the thunders roll;
When, glimmering thro' the groaning trees
  Kirk Alloway seem'd in a bleeze;
Thro' ilka bore the beams were glancing,
  And loud resounded mirth and dancing.'

Such a view of the old church could best be obtained at the distance of the Burns' cottage during the playful frolics of the lightnings in a summer night's storm or in the spring thunder-storms. I had the accepted opportunity of seeing the ruined walls stand forth amid the lightning flashes of a sudden storm one evening late in April. I should not have been surprised to hear the old church-bell clang in the prevailing winds, except that the clangor was gone from it; but the ghosts were not in evidence, the reason and time of their departure, as I learned on the reported statement of the guardian of the Burns' cottage next day, being the burial of the poet's father, William Burns, and other village celebrities beneath the shadow of the now barren walls.

A visit to the birthplace of Burns is one of delight and interest. The bed in the chimney-corner where the Scotch bard was born into the family of a liberal-minded farmer has been looked upon by many learned professors who have wondered at the exceptional gifts given the illustrious young Ayrshire farmer whose boldness, truth and freedom won for him the respect of his fellow-poets and the everlasting love of Scotchmen. In the cottage are the chairs and tables he is said to have used, copies of his manuscript showing the plainly legible and distinct, though evidently delicate and refined, penmanship of the poet, and numerous mementoes of his life in the shape of gifts from influential friends and societies, and written contributions from men of letters who have been at Alloway. The penmanship of the poet shows in addition to a natural tendency to poetry a trained, self-educated and otherwise, accuracy and care for neat and finished production. His poetry of freedom was born of the open fields and, as Ayrshire men would have you know, of the traditions of a section of their native land that gave to Scotland from Lochmaben, daring, liberty-loving Robert Bruce.

SIDNEY LANIER.

There are in American literature a great number of minor poets who, while little read and unknown to-day to general readers, have done much to aid the development of our literature. They are of course outshone by Longfellow and Whittier, by Lowell and Holmes, yet many of them have written verses that are truly poetic and are well worthy the attention of students of American Literature. Such an one is Sidney Lanier.

He was first of all a musician. Among his ancestors were several men of high musical talent, and the hereditary trait of the family manifested itself in him while yet a child. He learned, without an instructor, to play the violin, flute, guitar, piano and organ, becoming especially skilful with the flute. In later life he supported his family and made quite a reputation as a musician by playing first flute in the Peabody Symphony Concerts at Baltimore. The evidences of this musical tendency are found in all of his poetical works.

Lanier was thoroughly educated. He graduated, at the age of eighteen, from Oglethorpe College, a Presbyterian institution of anti-bellum days located near Midway, Georgia. He then served as tutor in the college, leaving this position to enlist in the Confederate army, in a crack regiment, the Second Georgia Battalion. Later he was transferred to the signal service, and while on duty as signal officer on board a blockade runner, was captured and sent to Point Lookout Prison, where he remained until the close of the war. He spent his leisure hours, while in the army, practicing music and studying, learning Spanish, French and German and reading all the stray books that came in his way. He had the true spirit of scholarship and an insatiable love for learning. The poet, according to his theory, ought to know as much of everything as possible. He delighted in science, was not ignorant of philosophy, and had a thorough knowledge of Anglo Saxon and Early English at first hand. His work, "The Science of English Verse," published while he was lecturer on literature at Johns Hopkins, shows painstaking, scientific investigation, involving both a rare analytical and strong constructive power.

His most notable poetic work is "Sunrise," in the "Hymns of the Marshes." This poem was written, with great pain, just a few months before the poet's death. The first stanza will illustrate all of its important characteristics.

"In my sleep I was fain of their fellowship, fain
Of the live oak, the marsh and the main.
The little green leaves would not let me alone in my sleep;
Up-breathed from the marshes, a message of range
and of sweep,
Interwoven with waftures of wild sea-liberties, drifting,
Came through the lapped leaves sifting, sifting,
Came to the gates of sleep.
Then my thoughts, in the dark of the dungeon-keep,
Of the Castle of Captives hid in the City of Sleep,
Upstarted, by twos and by threes assembling;
The gates of sleep fell a-trembling
Like the lips of a lady that forth falter yes,
Shaken with happiness:
The gates of sleep stood wide."

Here there are some of the elements of first-class poetry. Here are musical rythm, almost perfect symmetry, "recurrence of euphonic vowels and consonants," alliteration and rhyme, the elements of poetry according to Lanier's theory. Alliteration and assonance abound, but they are unobtrusive, are delicately woven into the poem and are the chief elements of that musical character for which his poetry is noted.

"Corn," one of the first poems that brought him into literary prominence, is somewhat more pretentious, but does not rise to the poetic level of "Sunrise." There is more poetic substance in the former but "Sunrise" is much more musical and is superior in form. However, the poem as a whole manifests considerable poetic power. Here is a particularly fine passage :

"Look, out of line one tall corn-captain stands
Advanced beyond the foremost of his bands,
And waves his blades upon the very edge
And hottest thicket of the battling hedge.
Thou lustrous stalk, that ne'er mayst walk, nor talk,
Still shalt thou type the poet soul sublime

That leads the vanward of his timid time
  And sings up cowards with commanding rhyme—
Soul calm, like thee, yet fain, like thee, to grow
  By double increment, above, below ;
Soul homely, as thou art, yet rich in grace like thee
  Teaching the yeoman selfless chivalry
That moves in gentle curves of courtesy ;
  Soul filled like thy long veins with sweetness tense,
By every godlike sense
Transmitted from the four wild elements."

Here are seen the germs of imaginative power of a high order. No selection from the poem can give a fair idea of all its characteristics. It is somewhat long and varies both in power and substance. "This poem," says his editor, "was the first outcome of his consciously-developing art-life." It was written in middle Georgia, about sixty miles north of Macon.

Of his other poems few, except the "Marshes of Glynn" and the "Symphony," are of much literary value. His dialect poems are of some interest as showing the middle Georgia dialect and character, but he was not a success as a dialect poet. His one novel, "Tiger Lillies," is now little known and little read.

His power was late in developing and his life of literary activity was short, but he did some work of which American Literature may be proud. Lanier was truly, as Ward says, "much more than a clever artisan in rhyme and metre."

EDITORIAL.

One of the most difficult problems which confront the student is the selection of the course of studies best suited to his needs. The old system of required studies had its advantages, and the elective system has its defects. Many students take what they call a "pleasure course," picking out the electives which they can pass with least study. These men, however, are hardly to be classed as students and would not study under the old plan. This is not a defect of the system, but of the men.

Another class of students begin to specialize too early in their course. This may make good specialists, but such is not the aim of college training. Specialization means narrowness. If a man follows one line exclusively he comes to weigh the world in terms of that subject. Its method becomes his method of thought. Its limits become the boundaries of his world. College training should, first of all, make broad men; men capable of adapting themselves to varying environments; men with a "luminous philosophy of life." The educated man should live in and be able to enjoy the whole world. It is the business of technical and professional schools to make specialists; it is the business of the college to make men.

Liberal culture demands a broad range of studies, and this demand the elective system fills. In a college course one can gain some knowledge of all arts and sciences, and this is just what the student should do. There will be time for special courses after college years are over. While in college, become as broad as you can. Acquire as broad knowledge of life and of the world as possible. This will prepare you to live in the world. It will prepare you to specialize without narrowing and restricting your thought world.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Miss Henrietta Allen is a student in the dental department of the University of Iowa.

Coach Hoskins is retained as gymnasium instructor from Jan. 2, 1900 to June 20, 1900.

The second entertainment of the Brockway Course will be given in Music Hall, Dec. 16, by the John Thomas Concert Co.

Wm. J. Coxey, A. M., of Camden, N. J., has contributed a large number of new books to the sociological department of the library.

Dr. Perrine delivered an able sermon at the union Thanksgiving services held in the Lewisburg Evangelical church on the morning of Nov. 30.

Arrangements are being made for a debate between Franklin & Marshall and Bucknell. This year the debate will be held at Lancaster and will take place some time in February.

Zeta Literary Society held a most interesting open meeting in the institute chapel during the Thanksgiving recess. The meeting was largely attended and the program was successfully rendered throughout.

Registrar Gretzinger has returned from an extended sojourn at Clifton Springs, New York. Mr. Gretzinger is much improved in health, and has again resumed his office work. We trust he will soon completely regain his former good health.

Work on the new building is progressing. The brick work is finished and the roof has been started. The roof will be of slate. The contract for the roofing slate has been awarded to Madoc Slate Company of Allentown, with which C. R. James, '77, and Wm. H. Rodgers, '97, are connected.

The several classes will have the following courses of Monday morning lectures for the next term :

Seniors—History and Philosophy—Dr. Hulley.
Juniors—Dynamic Geology—Prof. Davis.
Sophomores—History of Art—Prof. Martin.
Freshmen—Rhetoric—Prof. Perrine.

The first entertainment of the new Bucknell Dramatic Club will be given in the Opera House on the evening of Dec. 14th. Two farces will be produced : "A Proposal Under Difficulties" and "The Unexpected Always Happens." Excellent music will be furnished. The amateurs are talented and enterprising and a first-class entertainment may be expected.

Suitable services to honor the memory of the late Dr. Robert Lowery were held in the chapel, Wednesday morning, Nov. 29. Prof. W. E. Martin delivered an able address in which he paid glowing tributes to Dr. Lowery's untiring efforts in religious, educational and musical work. Several of Dr. Lowery's most beautiful hymns were sung by the student body.

The electives to Juniors and Seniors for the second term are : Advanced Algebra, Integral Calculus, Roman History, Chemistry, Advanced Composition, Phaedo, Eng. Bible, History of Art, U. S. Constitutional History, Logic, History of Europe, Human Anatomy, Histology, Economics, German, Spanish, French, Blackstone. To Sophomores : Animal Physiology, Chemistry Course 3, Advanced Algebra, German.

The first preliminary Junior debate was held in Theta Alpha society hall Thursday evening, Nov. 16. The number of debaters (seventeen), was larger than in any previous preliminary contest. The following were elected to appear in the second debate: L. E. Ayres, Bechtel, Bidelspacher, Burpee, Myers, Shields, Snyder, Timlin, Trax. This second debate will be held some time during the winter term and the question for discussion is: Resolved, that the government should own the railroads.

ATHLETICS.

Capt. H. B. C. Riemer, '01, was again elected captain of the foot ball team for the season of 1900.

On Saturday, Dec. 2, Bucknell lost the last game of the season to the University of Buffalo by a score of 30—0. Buffalo was at her best and played an energetic game of straight football throughout. Bucknell was seriously handicapped by the absence of two of her strongest men—Armour and Mathewson; besides the unfortunate results of a lack of harmony among some of the players could clearly be seen in the miserable teamwork of the first half. At the end of the first half Buffalo had rolled up 24 points.

In the second half Bucknell took a better stand and played well up to her old time standard, so that it was with greatest difficulty that Buffalo made the one touch-down of this half, which brought her final score up to 30.

The annual autumn election of the Bucknell Athletic Association will be held Saturday, Dec. 16. A foot-ball manager for the coming year will be elected, as well as the following officers of the Athletic Association: A president, vice-president, secretary and two members of the finance committee. The greatest interest will center on the selection of a foot-ball manager. However the entire election is a most important one and no student can afford to shirk his duty and lose his vote by neglecting to become a member of the Athletic Association. Athletics rightfully claim a prominent place in college life and training and the successful maintenance of a high standard of excellence depends largely upon the support of the student body.

LAFAYETTE 12 ; BUCKNELL 0.

On Saturday, Nov. 18, Bucknell met Lafayette at Easton and in a hard-fought contest was defeated by a score of 12—0. Lafayette's team was heavier, and she had the very great advantage of playing on her own gridiron, yet the two elevens were quite evenly matched and the entire contest was most interesting. Trout, the left guard, made the touch-down for Lafayette in the first half, while Bray kicked the goal. In the second half Platt finally succeeded in getting through Bucknell's right tackle for a touch-down and again Bray kicked the goal.

ALUMNI NOTES.

'52. The many friends of Dr. Lowry were grieved to hear of his death in Plainfield, N. J., last Saturday. Dr. Lowry was seventy-three years old, born in Philadelphia, March 12, 1826. He graduated from Bucknell, then the University at Lewisburg, in 1852. While in college he was prominent in undergraduate circles and was a member of Phi Kappa Psi. At one time he was Professor of Rhetoric at Bucknell, and was also pastor of the Lewisburg Baptist church.

Ex-'63. James W. Pennepacker, for many years an employee of the Pennsylvania R. R., died at St. Petersburg, Fla., whither he had gone for his health, aged 61 years. Interment took place at Lansdowne, Penna., where he resided.

'69. John Spratt Wrightnour, D. D., has investigated the properties of liquid air, and invented an apparatus, which was patented November, 1899, for furnishing cool, oxygenated air to hospitals, hotels and private residences by the use of liquid air.

Ex-'87. Rev. E. M. Lake, of Pontiac, Ill., is rejoicing over the fact that $6,500 has been recently secured, thereby covering all indebtedness resting upon the First Baptist Church, of that city, of which he is pastor.

'88. Rev. G. W. Hatch is pastor of the Baptist Church at Cherry Valley, Ohio.

'90. Miss Eveline J. Stanton is down for an address, "Now-a-days at Bucknell," at the quarterly meeting of the Philadelphia Alumnae Club, March 12, 1900.

'94. Rev. T. S. Fretz, after a pastorate of several years at Beverley, N. J., has resigned to accept a unanimous call to Centralia, Wash.

'96. Albert C. Rohland, Esq., has opened a law office at 435 Diamond St., Pittsburg.

'97. James Stober is teaching at Albright College and is well liked by the student body.

'97. Rev. Carl Summerbell, A. M., is president of Palmer College, LeGrand, Iowa.

'99. Messrs. Albert Hutchinson and M. L. Ross are students in the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania.

The Phila. Club of Bucknell University held its annual meeting and banquet at Boothby's last Monday evening. Over fifty were present. A. J. Rowland, D. D., presided. The principal address was made by President Harris. Addresses were also made by Charles R. James, Esq., Joseph E. Sagebeer, Ph. D., George E. Rees, D. D. and Mary Moore Wolfe, M. D. The following officers were elected: A. J. Rowland, D. D., President; Bernard E. MacMakin, Secretary; and Clement B. Lowe, M. D., Treasurer.

MARRIAGES.

COLESTOCK–KUNKLE.—In Williamsport, Penna., by Rev. H. C. Hall, D. D., ('82) pastor of the Erie Ave. Baptist Church, Rev. Henry J. Colestock, (class of '96), pastor of the First Baptist Church, Madison, Wis,, and Miss Emma E. Kunkle (class of '96 Inst.), of Williamsport.

MCMANN–RUFFNER.—In Kansas City, Mo., July 20, 1899, by Rev. E. B. Meredith, of Topeka, Kan., assisted by Rev. S. M. Brown, of Kansas City, Rev. Chas. F. McMann (class of '94), pastor of the Baptist Church at Concordia, Kas., and Miss Emma J. Ruffner, of Allegheny, Penna.

Miss Margaret Elizabeth Stoner and Mr. Ralph L. Melick, a graduate of the Academy, were married at Sunbury on Thanksgiving evening. Mrs. Melick is a sister of Mrs. Wm. C. Gretzinger.

EXCHANGES.

We are glad to see The Allegheny Literary Monthly and The Western University Courant among our exchanges.

The Red and Blue has a well written and interesting sketch of Joseph Rodman Drake. The November issue appears in a new and more attractive cover.

We also acknowledge receipt of The Amherst Literary Monthly, The Messenger, of Richmond College, The Saint Johns Collegian, The Alfred University Monthly, The News Letter, The Lafayette, The Cherry and White, The Gettysburg Mercury, The Amulet, and the Vidette, of which L. B. Sinnette, B. U., '97, is business manager.

Among our exchanges we find four magazines from colleges for women. The Mount Holyoke is well edited and compares favorably with any of the journals from men's colleges. "The Circus on the China" in the October number, is especially worthy of mention. The October Sibyl, of Elmira College, contains a short sketch of Thomas Bailey Aldrich and a number of well written short stories. The College Folio, of Allentown College for Women, reflects well the life of the school. The Lesbian Herald, of Woman's College, Frederick, Md., for October, contains a good story, "His point of View." The plot of the story is old but it is very well presented.

ELEGY WRITTEN IN A COLLEGE LABORATORY.

NOT BY GRAY.

The welcome gong now sounds the close of the lab.
The whistling crowd troops gaily out the door.
Each man betakes himself his separate way,
And leaves the room as silent as before.

Beneath that rugged pile the dust heap there,
Where daily increase heaps it higher still,
The sad remains of shattered test-tubes lie,
Which thus their ordained destiny fulfill.

For them no more the blazing gas shall burn,
Or busy student ply his awkward care,
The paths of learning lead through unseen ways,
And future bills cause sadness and despair.

Then hark, O zealous student entering here,
Prepare with fortitude thy path to tread ;
For ruin and disaster wait you here,
And dangers hover daily round your head.
The News Letter.

A Freshman was wrecked on an African shore,
Where a cannibal monarch held sway ;
And they served up the Freshman in slices on toast
On the eve of the very same day.

But the vengeance of heaven followed swift on the act,
For ere next moon was seen,
The tribe was by cholera morbus attacked
For that Freshman was dreadfully green.

A Recipe.

A tireless tongue,
A pound of fun,
Of naive and grace about enough,
A smile, a laugh,
A bit of chaff,
And some exasperating bluff.
Stir well and serve with self-conceit,
'Tis the fin de siecle maid complete.
—Ex.

When he proposed, he looked so cheap,
And she was only human;
The bargain she could not resist,
So she took him—like a woman.
—Ex.

If I were rich how differently
I'd view the world! The land and sea,
The pleasant shore by breezes fann'd,
The ocean in its bed of sand
Would be a playground then for me.

How suddenly society
My hidden genius then would see!
How I'd be quoted through the land!
If I were rich.

And then most strange of all would be
How some sweet Gladys or Marie
(Just why it's hard to understand),
Most quickly with her little hand,
To make me happy would agree,
If I were rich.

ROBERT LOWRY, D. D.

DIED NOV. 25, 1899.

Address at Memorial Services, Bucknell Hall, Nov. 29, 1899,

BY WM. E. MARTIN, A. M.

We are to contemplate a life to-day ; a vigorous, energetic life ; a beautiful, a fruitful, a victorious life. This life, in its buoyant youth, its tuneful Spring, made our campus vocal with happy shout and holy hymn. This life took form and strength, grew full and round, in the discipline of our institution ; this life kept fresh and warm its attachment to College and to town, for full fifty years ! How few men in the land have maintained such constancy of interest and sympathy, of affection and helpfulness, to their Alma-Mater, through fifty years ! This is why we ask students to pause to-day in our routine work to consider this son and friend of our institution, this ever youthful-hearted lover of his college, this one-time teacher in her halls, this peerless preacher in the college church, this brother of 45 generations of graduates in fellowship of college memories, in devotion to mutual culture and abiding friendship.

Robert Lowry was born in Philadelphia, March 12, 1826 ; was converted in the 1st Baptist church, and baptized by Dr. Geo. B. Ide in 1843. He entered the academic department of the University at Lewisburg in 1848 ; was graduated from the Collegiate Department with the honors of his class, in 1854.

That was a day of great expectations. The school in all its departments met in the basement of the original Baptist church edifice, then occupying the site of the present Music Hall. The Academy building was soon completed, to which the institution moved in a sort of triumphal procession. Soon the west wing of the college afforded students' rooms, while all class-rooms and study halls, and chapel and library and museum occupied the Academy building. But if the external structures were cramped and narrow, the spiritual building, the ideal plans of founders and faculty, were most generous for the times.

An institution of learning is an aggregation of men and books, in appropriate buildings, devoted to instruction. But the qualitative standard for its work must be found in the men it sends forth to the world's work. The graduates of this institution have always furnished a worthy index of its aims, its character, its results. Surely the students of the early day walked by faith and not by sight. That they gave such loyal devotion to their school is proof of their appreciation of the training received. Their enthusiasm had great influence throughout the state, and to them we of later days owe a debt of gratitude--to none more than to Robert Lowry and Francis Tustin, students from the first church, Philadelphia.

Robert Lowry was already a song-writer and choir-leader while a student. A feature of the time was the chapel choir and the vocal commencement music. The era of brass bands had not yet reached the University. The musical enthusiasm centred upon and haloed the leader, already famous for his original compositions. Little did he dream of the outcome of his youthful efforts in song ! To be famous the world around ; to be granted an ovation in the chief city of christendom by delegates from all civilized lands as the writer of hymns that bind all hearts in generous enthusiasm of prayer and praise—is granted to few men in any age !

Fifteen years of pastoral labor, of church-building, of Sunday school leadership and song-writing followed his graduation. West Chester, Pa., New York City and Brooklyn witnessed the growth of Robert Lowry as a preacher. Always a faithful student he kept pace with the great movement of his age, kept in touch with the great books of all time. He was a growing man, in the front rank of the powerful pulpit orators of an age that tested such to the utmost, "the sixties," the times that tried men's souls! In 1869 to the successful pastor of Hanson

Place Baptist Church, that seemed as permanently wedded to him as Plymouth to Mr. Beecher, or Pilgrim to Dr. Storrs, the call of his Alma-Mater came to become Professor of Rhetoric and Pastor of the College Baptist Church. He has said that from any other institution, or by the hand of any other man than President Loomis, it would not have been considered for a moment. Judge how he loved his college!

A preacher by supreme preference he came to help train other preachers; no less than to teach all students the secrets of Rhetoric, Logic and English Literature. It was one of the choice privileges of a life-time to be his pupil. To be for even a brief time in daily contact with so rich an experienee, so sane a personality, so sweet a spirit, so magnetic a teacher; to have at call, not text-book learning only, but culture from an acquaintance with the best in literature and thought; to drink in choice diction by unconscious imitation, rather than by rule, was much to be grateful for. To be thrilled by profound emotion, to be charmed by classic speech and eloquent delivery, to have imagination kindled and heart stirred, to develop admiration that is akin to love—such possibilities to a youth mean a coloring of his entire future. And surely the students from '70 to '78 or '79 will bear witness that their lives contain few influences so sweet, so abiding, as those emanating from this teacher of their youth.

To an observer of his six years' service in the college it was apparent that the teacher was outgrowing his best pupils. How he devoted every energy to preparation for every class and every sermon! And how manifest the expansion of the teacher and the preacher! What inspiration comes from the young to men privileged to guide them! What reaction, what stimules to do their best! Thus Professor Lowry grew, but the task was too severe, the double labor too arduous! The college was too poor to part from the church, the church too burdened to part from the college. He saved both the need of separation by his sacrifice of a position in which he had spent the six most intense years of his life; the six years of widest influence, since he sent forth his impress on men who became leaders of men.

Professor Lowry bore from the scenes of his educational labors a token of the esteem and affection of his late associates in the new designation, expressive of his recognized attainments, Doctor of Divinity.

Dr. Lowry's year of rest at his new home in Plainfield, N. J., was broken by a proposition to organize a new Baptist church and to build a new meeting house in a growing quarter of the city, if he would assume the pastoral care. A beautiful house was erected at a cost of fifty thousand dollars, and the new enterprise flourished from the start. Here Dr. Lowry continued in the active ministry for nine years. Since 1885 he has lived a retired life in study and musical composition,—varied by travel and occasional preaching, honored and loved by a host of friends, and interested in the progress of all good things.

Dr. Lowry was a unique personality. Of frank and open countenance, his eyes danced and sparkled with good humor. His greeting was hearty, sometimes explosive. His hand-grasp meant an electric thrill. Super-abundant health and vitality bathed him in an atmosphere of cheerfulness. The kindly smile always reflected the sunny depths of the soul within. It was a benediction to meet him. His artistic temperament of sensitive responsive feeling, his delicate features informed by emotion and lit by impassioned utterance became expressive of meaning too deep for words. The whole soul shone forth in glance, in gesture, in attitude, and we knew the stirrings of genius, the flashes of inspiration, the melting tenderness, the all-conquering love within. It is thus that oratory ever appeals to men; it is self-revelation. All veils are drawn aside and we see the heart of the speaker in full play. It is a great privilege for any young man to come under the spell of such self-revealing eloquence when the personality behind is a Lowry! That day a bell is rung in the soul's dormitory. That day resolution takes her station, decision is made, the future is assured!

The personality moulded by culture, trained by experience, the product of education and all the forces of heredity and environment, holds converse with God, with nature and with men. The communication with God is prayer ; it is the inner harmony of the entire personality with the will of God as perceived by the soul; it is the interpretation of the character, work and being of God; it is adoration of the highest spirit by the lower spirit. This veneration, this adoration, this converse, is more than thought about God; it is personal association and agreement with God. Theological thinking, in itself, is not piety; only harmonious converse with God is piety.

The outlook of the personality upon nature may be artistic in its apprehension and appreciation of beauty, truth and science; or it may be interpretative of nature in terms of its relation to a higher, even God. Now the preacher had to do with nature as the expression of God to men. The homiletic habit of mind is not artistic, but mediatorial, always revealing the spiritual and unseen to the eyes of the spiritual and unseeing, using the objects of nature as glasses to help growing sight. He did not describe nature as nature but as God's work. He had the true poet's perception, the true artist's appreciation, but the preacher's purpose.

His use of music was not in deference to the artistic approval of the centres of musical criticism, but was all-concerned with the service of song to burdened hearts, to sorrowing men and women, to infants lisping praise. Service was the criterion of his artistic appeal to human hearts, and these hearts responded to his appeal in every corner of the globe where his songs penetrated. He was popular in the truest sense, of service to the most. Rather was he universal.

Dr. Lowry's style was fashioned by his personality. He was not essentially a controversialist and so his style was not that of the arena. He was not given to the scientific development of abstruse questions, and so his style was free from metaphysical terminology. He was busy with life, and his style was eminently concrete. He saw life in its relation to its culmination, its perfection, its ideals, its sanctification; and his style was filled with symbols, pictures, representations of the facts of life in natural and biblical imagery.

Imagination wrought its finest chemistry upon the elemental words; they seemed to crystalize in sight of the hearer; they sparkled with diamond facets of reflection; they glowed with the seven banded spectrum of prismatic beauty. But you never lost sight of the truth in the corruscating gleams of the crystal speech. He was not rhetorical for rhetoric's sake. He was not pyrotechnical in speech for the sake of the smoke, but for the light, and he turned the light full upon the theme in hand.

In his prime Dr. Lowry's ear was as perfect for word harmony as for tonal harmony. His modulation of voice was effortless and faultless. Music is of the soul as truly as of the ear. Harmony was the dominant characteristic of his mental, moral, literary and musical constitution. It was God's gift, which he cultivated to the utmost for God's service.

It must not be inferred that this dominance of harmonic unity, this perfection of culture, this keenness of sensibility argued a weak will or an unmanly man. You cannot polish a brick! But you can polish granite until it becomes a mirror. Dr. Lowry had a will of granite texture ; but he kept it in the control of a sweet reasonableness and an ideal beauty of conduct and christian kindness of spirit. When provoked to the defense of truth as he thought it assaulted, he could deal sledge-hammer blows; but he was not angry in his own behalf ; he was a defender of the faith, a champion of the truth; as such he struck ; when battle was over he was himself again. Persuasion was his aim and not conviction or forensic victory. Not the conquest of his fellows, but their glad acceptance of his message pleased him.

But all expression is relative to that which is to be expressed, the personality. This is the true style. This nature of finest grain, of resplendent polish, of harmonious development, of keenest sensibility—this happy combination of well-proportioned excellences, this rounded totality of being, had been early fused in the fire of a holy ambition. Mark the term "granite" used a while ago of his character. Remember whence the granite's perfect unity ; what elemental fires fused its pebbles into consistency and coherence to endure for ages ! Happy the youth that is molten and fused by this fiery baptism of the Holy Ghost! Sad and disjointed the life that knows it not. Dr. Lowry was a christian student. The passion of a holy love for men and for his Savior consumed the dross of youthful folly at its first approach to him. And this fire of love, this enthusiasm for his Master and his fellow-men glowed as the never-dying altar fire upon his heart 'till his latest hour.

The true penetralia of our life is in the emotions. There need be no depreciation of the intellectual powers, no minimizing of the importance of regnant will, but in the emotions resides the central fire, the motive energy, the dynamic of personality. Well for us if early in our student career the divine flame of love has kindled our souls!—has quickened will and intellect to new and fresh activity, to high consecration, to noblest ideals, to the uttermost service, to the Christly sacrifice. This divine flame became the beacon light for Lowry's educational progress; it guided him through the mazes of History by its unerring ray; it vivified Literature; it made a cosmos of the universe; it centred Philosophy in spirit; it illumined humanity with a light divine. Man in his possibilities of redemption was no longer sunk in inextricable sin and misery. The youthful minister went forth to rescue, to save, to realize the divine intent in every life.

Is any experience of humanity comparable with that of the early years of service of the earnest christian minister? Who will write the soul history of a Jewish Priest? Let him next essay the portrayal of the Christian Minister. Recent attempts are only external studies,—not vital psychological representations of the totality of experience. The transforming power of this greatest affection left its impress upon every fiber of student Lowry's being. The pastorate quickened into expression his vision of God, and gave him the key to human hearts.

Dr. Lowry was a toiler. He seldom depended upon the inspiration of the moment, though to few men did moments of inspiration so frequently come. He wrought in secret the thought that in public seemed so spontaneous. The true orator is ever a delver for ore, a smelter of the ore into metal, a fashioner of the Damascus blade in fire and with file. We see the finished product and its execution, and too often expect to rival it without expense of the effort,—the forge, the anvil and the lathe. Let not extemporaneity be a delusion and a snare to the youthful aspirant for the honors and the service of oratory. The words that breathe, the thoughts that burn are kindled in the soul that toils, in the will that directs, in the love that sways the whole man. Oratory is earnest work, consuming work ; yet how signal its victories, how eminent its services! And the pathway to success in it is obvious. "Have somewhat to say!" thunders Carlyle, anxious that formal speech shall not hide poverty of message. Find your message as Robert Lowry found his, in passionate devotion to a great work.

To be devoted exclusively to expression, to become a tailor in words, would be a poor sphere for any man of worth, and might entail the loss of any real ability he possessed. So we rightly withhold our approbation from mere form. But when form is the fit expression of precious thought, of worthy feeling, we recur to Solomon's praise of the "apples of gold in the pictures of silver," and we speak of the fine art of literary composition. The form is incidental but the substance is vital.

Dr. Lowry was a scholar. He knew and loved books, was able to extract their sweets, to live in their atmosphere, to utilize their energies. He says of them in a casual private letter: "Books! why they are meat and drink, air and sunshine, bath and wardrobe, elixer and medicine, drum corps and orchestra, to me. Some of them I shall never open again, but they smile at me from their shelves. They wink at me, and talk to me, and sing for me, and think with me, and ward off the sere and yellow leaf by their perpetual freshness. There is no loneliness, no ennui, no cussedness when my books encircle me. We dance together, we confide with one another, we tread the shady walks in company, we forget that there is any outside world when we sit down together and tell our love." This is not the language of a mere book-lover who buys and pets his books, who cherishes them for their covers or their rarity. No more is it the word of the man who puts them on his shelves, but locks them out of his heart, who never permits the life-giving rills from their snowy peaks to refresh his desert life. The scholar uses books as he uses friends, for their stimulus to his own thought, as sources of refreshment and reinvigoration, as treasuries whence to bring things new and old, for the delight and improvement of his associates.

In cherishing the memory and emulating the example of Dr. Lowry, the students of our University will aid in perpetuating the choicest traditions of our history of fifty years, in preserving the memories of its earliest distinction, the outline and embodiment of its purpose and end. They will also honor one, who, with devoted zeal, strove to perpetuate the affiliation between colleges and their sons, and to make them mutually helpful. No man of our time of equal station and prominence has so devoted himself to perpetuate throughout the after days, the friendship formed in college life. He has been an example and an inspiration to all alumni and fraternity workers who desire to see the worthiest fruits of friendship clothe the trees planted in student days. In so doing he has strengthened the bonds between all true students, who view their culture unselfishly and patriotically.

REV. ROBERT LOWRY, D. D.

Rev. Robert Lowry, A. M., D. D., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., March 12, 1826, and died at Plainfield, N. J., Nov. 25, 1899. He was the valedictorian of the Class of 1854 of Bucknell University, and that same year was ordained and called to the pastorate of the First Baptist Church of West Chester, Pa. In 1858 he was called to the pastorate of the Bloomingdale Church of New York City, and in 1861 became pastor of the Hanson Place Church of New York City where he remained eight years. In 1869 he became Professor of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres at Bucknell University, and pastor of the Lewisburg Baptist Church. During the six years of his labors there the present beautiful edifice of the Lewisburg Church was erected. From Lewisburg he went to Plainfield, N. J., when he became pastor of the Park Avenue Baptist Church, retiring from the active work a few years ago. As a writer of sacred music, Dr. Lowry had an international reputation, and his melodies are sung in every English speaking land, while some of his hymns have been translated into foreign tongues. Some of his best known pieces are: "Shall We Gather at the River;" "One More Day's Work for Jesus;" "Where is My Wandering Boy To-night:" "I Need Thee Every Hour;" "The Mistakes of My Life,"

While the doctor has said, "I would rather preach a gospel sermon to an appreciative, receptive congregation, than write a hymn," yet in spite of his preferences, his hymns have gone on and on in many languages, preaching and comforting thousands upon thousands of souls, furnishing them expression for their deepest feelings of praise and gratitude to God for his goodness to the children of men.

What he has thought in his inmost soul has become a part of the emotions of the whole Christian world. We are all his debtors.

At the Robert Raikes Centennial in 1880 he attended the meeting of delegates in London, in which speeches were made by representative men from all parts of the world. Near the close of the meeting, the chairman, a member of Parliament, rose and said, "I am told that Dr. Lowry, the author of 'Shall We Gather at the River' is present, we would be glad to hear from him." The effect was startling. As Dr. Lowry came forward and stood on the platform, the whole audience broke forth in applause. Persons rose to their feet and waved their handkerchiefs. For some moments it was impossible to say a word. Not more than a dozen Americans in the room had ever seen the man, but they gave spontaneous tribute to the song writer whose name had been a household word to them for many years.

The funeral services were held at his late residence on Tuesday, Nov. 28, and were conducted by Rev. J. W. Richardson of the Park Avenue Church, Rev. D. J. Yerkes, D. D., of the First Baptist Church, Rev. Geo. A. Peltz, D. D., of Philadelphia, and Chaplain Cumming, of the Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity. He is survived by his widow and three sons, one of whom is Rev. H. M. Lowry, of Rahway, N. J., Class of '77. A noted preacher, a tender pastor, a loving friend, a loyal alumnus of his beloved Alma Mater. Dr. Lowry has gone into that glory about which his inspired pen so beautifully wrote while on earth now, and in eternity by and by, an unnumbered host calls him blessed.

DR. LOWRY AS A FRATERNITY MAN.

Dr. Lowry was a member of the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity. He took a lively interest in the general welfare of the fraternity and was particularly interested in the chapter at Bucknell, of which he was a member. Dr. Lowry was president of the fraternity from 1888 to 1890. In 1893 he published the first song book of the fraternity.

ROBERT LOWRY AS A STUDENT.

REV. DR. GEO. A. PELTZ.

Those who knew Robert Lowry as a student are becoming very few. Of his own class the majority are gone. The class immediately preceding his has not a surviving member. Of those graduating earlier hardly half a dozen remain, and of those in college with him and graduating later there are not a score. Of his instructors only two have survived him. So it has come to pass that opportunity for personal reminiscences of his student life is quite restricted.

He entered the Academic Department of the University at Lewisburg (now Bucknell University) in 1848, was matriculated as a Freshman in 1850, and graduated in 1854, in a class of nine members. On this occasion he delivered an oration on "The Vengence of the Future," and also the valedictory address.

Few men who attain Dr. Lowry's age carry so much of their youthful appearance to the end. He never lost his elastic-quick movement nor his fresh, clear complexion, nor the brilliancy and depth of his eye, nor his resonant voice and decisive enunciation. His hair showed some silver threads, but in color and cut were much the same as in his youth. Indeed, to the eye of the writer the Robert Lowry of last July, when three days were spent most delightfully together, was all but the identical Robert Lowry whom he first met on the old board-walk at Lewisburg in May of 1852. Those who ever saw him need change the image but little to fit it to the student of a half-century ago.

College sports were few in those days. The ruder demonstrations, hazing, "painting the town red," making night hideous, etc., were unknown arts. Town ball was played on the campus back of the West Wing, and hand ball against the blank east wall of that newly erected building, and in these games Dr. Lowry was an enthusiastic expert. Vocal serenades at midnight hours were popular also, and the voices of Bob Lowry, Ed. Taylor, Mac Taylor, Had Loomis and others could easily be detected in those sweet disturbances of balmy sleep. Most of these singers have been gathered about the throne above, where they sing on as in student days.

In the class room Lowry was ever at the front. Nothing was too much for his keen perception, his superb intelligence, his matchless expression. Specially was he conspicuous in political economy and mental and moral science. He had thoroughly studied such topics. He had opinions on them and he could state and defend his opinions. Many a time has the professor's skill been taxed as Lowry jabbed his rhetorical and logical lances into the text books, and even into the professorial dictum.

In the literary societies of the day he was an inspiration. No man could approach him in the use of language. His essays and poems led all his associates. For the sake of stirring up the boys he would occasionally launch out into some unexpected waters, such as an elaborate defense of Judas Iscariot, or an exhaustive study of the character and conduct of Athaliah, or some other obscure personage of antiquity. He delighted to fling all his force against slavery, then in the height of its arrogance, and on all possible occasions he would smite it with terrific blows.

He was a humorist of rare quality. He could caricature men and things with marvelous point and power. A letter of his lies before the writer, dated in 1854, and in twelve pen pictures it tells a story as no verbiage could have done. In our daily walks, at our boarding house table, anywhere, everywhere, Lowry would toss together a bunch of unusual words that would amaze us with their fitness and convulse us with their fun.

In all his intercourse with other students, with the townspeople, and especially with his instructors, Robert Lowry was the gentleman. He was ever frank but never rude, ever manly but never domineering, ever positive but never arrogant, ever courteous but never cringing. He was popular everywhere, praised by all, equal to any occasion, conceded to be a leader, recognized as a man destined for a high place, and yet he was our own genial, gentlemanly, beloved "Bob Lowry."

His Christian character was, however, his crowning grace. It did not show itself in gush, or cant, or whining, or criticising, or theorizing, but in a manly separateness from sin and adhesion to right. In the students' prayer meeting, the local Sunday-school, the church prayer meeting, the church choir, the school house missions, the neighboring churches, the college chapel, the daily life, Robert Lowry was a worthy example. He was an instructor of the ignorant, a comforter of the sorrowing, a friend of every man. A closer approach to "the perfect man" it will be hard to find in any company of undergraduates.

RESOLUTION OF PHI KAPPA PSI FRATERNITY.

Hall of Penna. Gamma Chaper, Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity, Lewisburg, Pa.

Nov. 27th, 1899.

Whereas, It has pleased Almighty God in his infinite wisdom to remove from this life our beloved brother, Dr. Robert Lowry;

Whereas, By his death our Fraternity has suffered a great and irreparable loss;

Whereas, This local chapter has lost one of her most loyal sons, be it,

Resolved, That we the members of Penna. Gamma Chapter, Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity do hereby express our sorrow and grief which we as brothers have sustained;

Resolved, That we extend our sympathy to his family in their bereavement.

Resolved, That these resolutions be entered on the records of Penna. Gamma, that a copy be sent to his family and also be published in the Shield, and the college papers.

A. J. Sherwood,
D. E. Hottenstein,
S. C. Smith.

THE FINAL SERVICE.

On Tuesday, November 28th, 1899, a sorrowing company assembled in Plainfield, N. J., for the funeral service of Dr. Lowry. His body lay in the parlor of his late home, surrounded by floral tokens from many loving friends. The face was expressive of perfect peace and the light so shone upon it as to invest it with a charming radiance. About him gathered comrades of his Greek letter fraternity, the Phi Kappa Psi. Elsewhere clerical and musical friends assembled. His study was occupied by the family and relatives. Other parts of the spacious house were filled with friends and neighbors, and upon all rested the deepest solemnity.

He had chosen the hymns to be sung and the singers and speakers for the occasion. At the appointed hour sweet music stole through the apartments and a choice company of muiscal friends sang, "Shall we gather at the River?" and then came the reading of Scripture selections by the Rev. Mr. Richardson, Dr. Lowry's pastor, followed by prayer, led by the Rev. Dr. Richards, of the Presbyterian church. After another hymn, "It won't be long," the Rev. Dr. Yerkes, of Plainfield, spoke of Dr. Lowry as a preacher. Singing followed again, and then the Rev. Dr. Peltz, a life-long and intimate associate of Dr. Lowry, spoke of his departed friend as a man, a friend, and a Christian. "Up from the grave he rose" was then sung, after which the Phi Psi ritual for the dead, arranged by Dr. Lowry himself, was read. The body was borne from the house by Fraternity bearers. At the Hillside Cemetery, near by, Dr. Lowry's son, the Rev. H. W. Lowry, said the final words, and the loved form was left to await the resurrection morning.

EDITORIAL.

The literary department of this issue is devoted to the memory of our honored alumnus, Dr. Robert Lowry. In all his long intercourse with the University, Dr. Lowry has encouraged every worthy enterprise we have undertaken. His articles have frequently appeared in L'Agenda and he was always a ready and willing contributor to the MIRROR. He will long be remembered and his assistance missed by every department of the University.

We are frequently asked if we will accept contributions from students. In the first number of this volume we stated that contributions from undergraduates are especially welcome. One of the MIRROR's aims is to open a field for practical work in English composition to undergraduate students. We want stories, essays and poems and will be glad to receive them at any time and from any student in the University.

A certain class of our students are always wishing that they could go to one of the great universities. The impression seems to be that a large college has some patent appliance by which it can open a man's head and pour learning and culture in. This attitude is due not to any defect of the smaller college, or to any special advantage to be gained by going to a larger one, but to a very common mental state, i. e., chronic dissatisfaction with one's present condition, a certain longing for the unattainable. The old German proverb, Unser gluck sei nur dort wo wir nicht sind, states the case exactly.

Considerable discussion has been going on recently as to the relative merits of the large and the small colleges, both in the college magazines and in some outside periodicals. Many of the arguments in favor of small colleges have been refuted, but some very strong points still remain untouched. Direct contact of professors and students is one advantage which the great university can not give. Few students realize the benefit of coming in personal contact with the professors under whom they work. More is sometimes gained by this association than from the texts studied. Culture and inspiration are to be derived not from solitary study of text books, but from personal association with men more cultured and learned than ourselves.

We may, however, view the question from another standpoint. The student who can get nothing at a small college has no one to blame but himself. Does he study? No. How, then, can he expect to accomplish anything here or any place else. What a man gets from any work depends on himself. He gets out of his study just what he puts into it. Do the thing and you shall have the power, is the substance of a doctrine taught by the Sage of Concord. Study, think, become interested, and you shall have the learning and culture. Do not waste your time complaining because you cannot go to a larger institution, but go to work and make use of the golden opportunities which are before you.

COLLEGE NOTES.

Chas. J. Pearse, '00, of Erie, Pa., has not returned to his college work on account of ill health.

The University has received $300 from the Bachus estate which has been expended in books for the Library.

The third of a series of Basket Ball Benefit Assemblies was held in the Armory Thursday evening, Jan 11.

John A. Hague, '01, was a successful competitor in a prize tenor solo contest held at Plymouth, on Christmas Day.

On the evening of the 19th inst. Dr. R. S. McArthur will deliver his most interesting lecture "The Empire of the Czar" in the Opera House.

Rush H. Kress, 1900, has accepted a lucrative position with the Southern Syndicate of 5 and 10 cent stores, having charge of the main office in New York City.

Llewellyn Phillips, A. M., formerly Instructor in Elocution at Bucknell but now pursuing studies at Rochester Seminary, was here during the first week of the term.

The opening address of the winter term was delivered by Dr. Harris in Bucknell Hall, Monday morning, Jan. 8. The subject of the address was "Ulysses S. Grant."

The Bucknell Glee and Mandolin Club will give an entertainment at Northumberland some evening during the coming week. Arrangements are being made for an extended trip and the series of entertainments will be announced later.

The University catalogue is now in press. It will show a total attendance of 486 in all departments of the University of which number 314 are in college and 91 in the Freshman class.

According to precedent all Seniors are requested to hand the subjects of their Commencement themes to the Professor of Rhetoric within two weeks from the opening of the winter term.

The Freshmen will use "Specimens of Description" as their text-book in Elocution for this term, while the work of the Sophomores will be based on Miss Buck's book on "Argumentative Writing."

Regular classes in gymnastics have been organized for all students. Systematic gymnasium work is required of Freshmen and Sophomores, while special work including wrestling and the art of self-defense may be pursued by any students who desire to do so. All training is given under the personal direction of Instructor Hoskins.

E. H. Dutton, '98, was the guest of his mother at her home on Sixth Street during the holiday vacation and greeted many of his old college friends during the opening week. Mr. Dutton has abandoned his second year's work at Rochester Theological Seminary to accept the position of New York State Secretary of Y. M. C. A. Home Mission Work.; at the same time Mr. Dutton will be private secretary to the distinguished christian worker, John R. Mott.

The opening meetings of both literary societies were well attended. Euepia organized for the term by electing the following officers:

President—M. A. Carringer.
Vice President—L. J. Ulmer.
Secretary—A. M. Weaver.
Critic—Edward Bell.
Treasurer—Tiffany.
Curator—Irvin Bartholomew.

Theta Alpha's officers for the ensuing term are:
President—Chas. H. Miller.
Vice President—A. S. Bechtel.
Secretary—Reese Harris.
Critic—Edgar Reed.
Treasurer—T. P. Kyle.
Censor—G. Miles Robbins.
Curator—H. B. C. Riemer.

ALUMNI NOTES.

'55. Rev. Chas. H. Malcom, D. D., died at Newport, R. I., during the summer. He was at one time pastor of the Second Baptist Church in that city; but afterwards united with the Episcopalian faith.

Ex-'62. Hon. Wm. S. Shallenberger, Second Assistant Postmaster General of the U. S., was elected Moderator of the Columbia Baptist Association at its recent meeting in Washington, D. C.

'75. Rev. E. M. Brawley, D. D., of Dauer, Ga., was elected Secretary of the Berean Association of Negro Baptists, organized in August, in Savannah.

'77. Rev. Geo. T. Street, of Braddock, Penna., and his people, are contemplating the erection of a new house of worship.

'78. Rev. J. E. Perry, Ph. D., formerly Principal of Peddie Institute, Hightstown, N. J., has been called to the pastorate of the Baptist Church, in Allston, Mass., a suburb of Boston. Dr. Perry has been taking a post-graduate course of study at Harvard, and during the time has been supplying pulpits with great acceptance in the vicinity of Boston.

'79. Rev. A. J. Irey, pastor of the Baptist Church, at Warren, Penna., was recently called to his old home at Aaronsburg, Centre Co., by the death of his mother.

'81. Rev. F. H. Shermer has removed from Cape May Court House, N. J. and has become pastor of the Pearl St. Baptist Church of Bridgeton, N. J.

'81. Rev. Frank H. Shermer, of Cape May, C. H., N. J., has been invited to the pastorate of the Pearl St. Baptist Church, Bridgeton, N. J., and has announced his acceptance.

'84. Rev. C. A. Gardner is treasurer of the Baptist Minister's Conference, of Toledo, Ohio.

'84. Rev. F. M. Goodchild, pastor of the Central Baptist Church, New York City, recently underwent a serious surgical operation which has temporarily laid him aside from all pastoral work. His recovery is assured.

Among the readers of papers at the recent Baptist Congress at Pittsburg, Pa., were Rev. O. P. Eaches, D. D. '63, and Rev. S. Z. Batten '85.

'85. "The Bible in Court" is a strong, vigorous, and exhaustive book, written by Rev. Jas. E. Sagebeer, Ph. D., pastor of the Second Baptist Church, Germantown, Philadelphia. The book has aroused much favorable comment. It is from the press of the J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia.

'91. Prof. J. H. Minnick is editor of periodicals and textbooks in the publishing department of Eastman Business College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.

'94. Geo. E. Deppen, '94, has been appointed from Co. K. Quartermaster Sergeant of the 12th regt., N. G. P.

'94. Rev. Geo. H. Waid is secretary of the Baptist Ministers' Conference, of Detroit, Mich.

'95. Rev. R. R. Snow, of Marquette, Mich., was elected 1st Vice President of the Michigan B. Y. P. U., recently held. An excellent likeness appeared in the Christian Herald (Detroit), August 17, among a group of B. Y. P. U. officers of that State.

'96. George A. Jennings is studying medicine in Baltimore, Md.

'97. Instructor Fisk was married to Miss Anna Belle Briggs, of Erie, on Dec. 27, 1899. They have taken up their residence in the Evans home on N. 3d street.

'98. Prof. James P. Stober is professor of physics and chemistry in Albright College, Myerstown. A rich citizen of Reading recently presented Albright College with a complete cabinet of apparatus for the department of physics.

'99. Miss Grace DeWolf is at Columbia, giving her attention almost entirely to Mathematics and especially to Astronomy.

'99. Miss Bertha C. Watkins, who recently spent a short time among Alma Mater friends, has accepted a position in the Chicago schools.

'99. J. E. Calvin is attending the Divinity School of U. of C.

BUCKNELL ALUMNAE CLUB.

The December meeting of the Bucknell Alumnae Club was held Tuesday evening, Dec. 12th, in the Institute parlors, Mrs. Annie Kaler Dreisbach, president, in the chair.

A vocal solo was rendered by Miss Mary Matlack, and a letter of greeting from Mrs. Katherine B. Larison was read by Mrs. Wm. E. Martin. The club then took up the discussion of the sociological problem, adopted as the subject of study for this year.

Miss Annie Van Gundy discussed "Prison and Capital Punishment." Miss Eliza Bell spoke on "Reformatories and Penitentiaries," with special reference to the Reformatory at Huntingdon, which she has visited. Mrs. Wm. E. Martin spoke on the "Drunkard and Liquor Laws." Mrs. W. G. Owens gave a description of the Girls' Reformatory at Albion, N. Y. An instrumental solo by Miss Mary Thornton followed.

After the literary program was disposed of, the annual feast was held and every one present had an enjoyable social hour.

MARY S. GRETZINGER, Secretary.

EXCHANGES.

The Converse Concept has appeared among our exchanges. It is a neat, well-edited literary magazine and contains a number of very good stories.

The exchange column of The Red and Blue discusses college verse in a friendly and unbiassed spirit. A more critical discussion of this subject would be of much value to college editors.

The Saint John's Collegian contains a valuable and interesting article on Education and the Arabs. It is based on personal observation and, while not intended to be exhaustive, shows a thorough knowledge of the subject.

The College Student contains an excellent article on the Schwenkfelders, a peculiar religious sect of Montgomery, Berks and Lehigh counties. These studies of subjects near at hand can be made most interesting. Writers for college journals often seek for subjects sublime and distant, forgetting that their own neighborhood contains good literary material.

Our life is but an ill shaped isle,
  Afloat upon a boundless sea;
The past, immeasurable, behind,
  Before us dim eternity.

A Junior with a young maid sat
  Beneath some shady trees;
He gazed upon her winsome eyes,
  And longed her waist to squeeze.

"All flesh is grass," at length he sighed,
  The maid replied, "How true,
As all must know who've sat beside
  A yap as green as you."

ON LOOKING AT MY FIRE.

See the flames, lurid flames,
How the hemlock timber tames
  To the dying fire's feeble, scattered power!
And the embers faintly throw
Light that 'round the room doth show,
With a cheerful, merry glow,
  All the luxuries that riches on us shower.

But beyond those ruddy deeps
Something pitilessly peeps,
  Significant of wretchedness forlorn;
And my thoughts drop down the steeps
To the mirky, dismal keeps,
Where the loathsome creature creeps:
  Have I aught accomplished since the happy morn?

NIL DESPERANDUM.

I asked a maid in fair Bordeaux
To marry me. I loved her seaux.
Ah, me! It was a crushing bleaux
When she replied, "You booby, neaux."

So then I journeyed to Cologne
To wed a girl I long had knogne.
When I got there, my bird had flogne,
And I, alas, am still alogne!

So now I linger in Marseilles,
With a cheerfulness that never feilles—
Hoping that soon some favoring geilles
Will put new wind into my seilles.

SONG OF THE NATIVITY.

Dedicated, Christmas, A. D. 1899, to My Mother.
Aet. 88 yrs.

Lo ! Angels bring
On heavenly wing
Tidings of love—Dear Mother ;
Sweet, precious thought !
Tis love unbought,
And Joy above all other.

Two thousand years !
And still appears
That same bright star—Dear Mother—
By Shepherds seen ;
Still doth it gleam
On high, to guide the Wanderer.

The Angels sang
Good will to man—
Let Peace abound forever—
This day was born
The true God-Man,
Messiah, Christ, Redeemer.

Oh happy day—
Oh blessed way—
For "God is Love"—Dear Mother ;
The Father, Son,
And Spirit—one
In Triune love—God, ever.

Oh Lord, our King,
Of Thee we sing,
Our Saviour—Mediator—
At thy right hand,
Grant we may stand
With Thee, Dear Lord and Saviour.

THE BONNY FOLK OF AYRSHIRE.

FRANK WEBER DILLON.

Ayrshire folks are not so greatly different from their countrymen of the south of Scotland. They breathe more freely the open air of the fields apart from the thickly populated manufacturing centres between Glasgow and Edinburgh. They labor in factories also, but their woolen mills are few compared with the acres of broad lands on which may be found, as formerly, the husbandmen of their soil. In general characteristics, the Ayrshire men mingle the active, liberty-loving spirit of the old Scotch blood with the stern and persevering energy of the northern English farmer.

Their first acquaintance I made at the annual spring show of the Ayrshire Agricultural Society held in the town of Ayr late in April. Some twenty thousand ruddy-faced and honest appearing farmers with their bonnie wives and lassies were on the fair-grounds. There were such folks as "the humbler ranks of human-kind" of whom Burns wrote,

"To lower orders are assigned
The humbler ranks of humankind,
The rustic Bard, the lab'ring Hind,
The Artisan ;
All chuse, as various they're inclin'd
The various man.

"Of these am I—Coila my name ;
And this district as mine I claim,
Where once the Campbell's chiefs of fame
Held ruling pow'r."

Coila is the name applied to the southwestern part of Scotland and more particularly in its original importance as a poetical form of Kyle, a district in Ayrshire, where the burial-place of Coilus, a king of Picts, is still shown. What wonder that "The tree of Liberty" should flourish in a country where Scotchmen

"sing auld Coila's plains and fells,
Where muirs red-brown wi' heather-bells,
Her banks and braes, her dens and dells,
Where glorious Wallace
Aft bure the gree, as story tells,
Frae south'ron billies."

To Coila, including the shires of Ayr and Dumfries, history has bestowed a train of memories, noble, heroic, and inspiring; memories which the modern Scots recall in pleasure but with no desire to repeat except against a mutual foreign foe, so closely have the parts in the kingdom of Great Britain been united for years; memories of the bloody battles of the great Wallaces, of the birth and prestige of the Bruces, of the sway of the Stuarts, and of the uprisings of border chieftains. Campbells, Maxwells, and Douglases are associated with the history of Ayrshire. Wallacetown is a part of the burgh of Ayr, named from the famous leaders of Richardton, and an old tower of William Wallace stands in the High street. Ayrshire saw the early exploits of Wallace and produced the patriot-leader Robert Bruce who secured the independence of Scotland at Bannockburn in 1314. Bruce, reputed to have been born at Lochmaben, held his territorial rights as Earl of Carrick in southwestern Scotland. Maxwelltown is opposite Dumfries and the "Maxwellton Braes" and ancient home of the Maxwells, Caerlaverock Castle, are not far distant. The reading and learning about such famous men of Scotland must have led the poet Burns to chide his people for their seeming decline in the latter part of the eighteenth century and impelled him to say:

"Wild beats my heart to trace your steps
Whose ancestors, in days of yore,
Thro' hostile ranks and ruin'd gaps
Old Scotia's bloody lion bore."

Burns honored Scotland too greatly for what it had been; he looked too much upon the dark side of his own times, no doubt because of the harshness and incongeniality of his surroundings; and he saw too little of the improvement and growth of the future. We who live now can judge the poet as we honor him for breathing liberty and honest self-esteem into the life and work of his fellow-men. In the days of Burns, Scotland, not Ayrshire alone, was changing from a land of border uprisings crushed with loss of life and destitution of property, to a land of superiority in agriculture and manufactures. The last of the border wars ended in the middle of the eighteenth century; agriculture on a scientific basis was introduced in Ayrshire; and workshops sprung up later to turn the wool and iron into products of modern life. For years these changes have been complete and the half-barbaric freedom of the wearer of the tartan and the followers of the slogan has been subdued in loyalty to their queen. When thoughts of war had passed, the pursuits of peace prevailed. Ayrshire became known by the products of farms rather than of mills, the Ayrshire short-horn cattle, the Clydesdale horses, Cheddar cheese, butter and grain, and the wool furnished for the world-known Scotch cloths. Because of such products, the burgh of Ayr, grown to the substantial population of thousands of mill-workers, fishermen, and tradesmen, welcomes the shire folk to semi-weekly markets and, at stated intervals, to more pretentious displays in agricultural fairs and animal shows. Markets and fairs retain many old customs and the merriment of the taverns, now coupled with more progressive intellectual life fulfilling "The vision of Burns, whose Ayr,

"Low, in a sandy valley spread,
An ancient borough rear'd her head;
Still, as in Scottish story read,
She boasts a race,
To ev'ry nobler virtue bred,
And polish'd grace."

"CHANCE" IN LIFE.

In the classroom a discussion was recently held on chance as relating to the individual. Chance, as popularly applied is a misnomer. Bently has stated, or defined, it in its true sense as "but a mere name and really nothing in itself; a conception of our mind and only a compendious way of speaking, whereby we would express, that such effects as are commonly attributed to chance, were verily produced by their true and proper causes, but without their design to produce them." Many think that the welfare of man in numerous instances is due to chance, or, as otherwise expressed, "luck." One would say that the chance by which one is born into the race determines his after life. Another that the chance of hereditary temperment affects his development. Again that the chance of environment materially decides his education. Such is not the case. Chance is unknown to the successful man in any vocation that he enters.

It is not by chance that the child is born, no less than the fact that he possesses a mind. As Todd states, "In the beginning is mind, already equipped to receive sense impressions, to attend, to discriminate, to feel, to form its own faculties of the more complex and higher sort." Temperament is a matter of causation, "a mental constitution and development due to the inherited characteristics of the bodily organism." Consequently it is incorrect to speak of the chance of the temperament in the crude sense. Besides there are many influences that tend to control, change and develop the temperament; such as home life, parental teaching, companions in school, college and business.

The environment is not a matter of chance. When the child comes to the reasoning age, nay, even earlier, it is a matter of choice. For example, the fatherless babe of the deserted mother is left in the orphan asylnm. It is by choice that the childless wife is attracted to it, takes the babe to her own home and rears it under the influence of a fine environment. Or at a more advanced age, the temperament of the boy is such as to cause him to be dissatisfied, to leave the loathsome atmosphere to which he has been confined and finds one more suited to his tastes. The theft of the knave becomes a matter of habit caused by the recurrence of the action ; it is by choice that he is such and not by chance.

The influence of temperament and environment in the character is seen in all phases of life. It is by some means that change is made in moral qualities for better or worse.

It is not chance that makes the man. Success cannot be attributed to luck. Predestination is a thing of the past or of the mind not modern. Every man has a free will, to discriminate and decide with, according to his own judgment. It matters little whether he is born in the family of the millionaire, college professor, farmer, laborer, or in the slums. The boy in the slums, in many instances starting as a newsboy or bootblack, lacking the good influences of the more fortunate youth, becomes the master of the latter by perseverence in work and determination to win. The dullard of the class became Sir Isaac Newton. Cooper, born a cripple, handicapped by the intense pain of his disease, was afterwards the first Earl of Shaftsbury and the author of the Habeas Corpus Act. It was only by determination to succeed accompanied by pluck, good judgment and fearlessness of decision that the son of a poor English clergyman is now the controlling financier in the De Beers Mining Company ; it is even averred by the Boers that Cecil Rhodes provoked the present war in the Transvaal.

It is through embracing his opportunities that the person of good judgment and common sense succeeds. The superficial call it chance or say that it is luck. The world is in need of fine artisans, good business men, skillful surgeons. Tallyrand truthfully stated that "The art of putting the right man in the right place is, perhaps, the first in the science of government, but the art of finding a satisfactory position for the discontented man is most difficult." The one may fortunately, not by chance, be more gifted than the other. But many geniuses are failures. Every man has the power to do good. Each has equal "chance" of advancement. There are hundreds of positions open for the man. Two presidencies of railroads have been vacant for the past six months for the lack of the men. It took Yale almost a year to decide on a man for president; no chance placed Hadley in the chair. "What men want is not talent, it is purpose; in other words, not the power to achieve, but the will to labor," written by Bulwer years ago, still applies to all vocations. How often it is to be seen that "victims of circumstances" never amount to much. They are usually the ones who are looking for the chances to the road of success.

Do as Longfellow advises, "Study yourself, and, most of all, note well wherein kind nature meant you to excel." Do not wait for the opportunity to arise. It is utterly impossible to keep a good man down. Altho suppressed for the time, he will rise and become a leader.

Lose no opportunity while in college in studying to make yourself as perfect as it is in your power. The leader is the man with the fewest faults, especially great ones. Find your own, then eliminate them from your character. And finally, do not wait for your chance; it is before you daily and if you do not accept it, use it, educate it, the time will pass and then you may truly state that you have lost your "chance."

ROBERT MORRIS.

I gazed adown the scroll of heroes bold
  Of world-wide Revolutionary fame.
Methought I saw in characters of gold
  One peerless, yet full oft-neglected name.

That name, with honor spoken far and wide,
  As firmest bulwark to his country proved ;
His time he gave, self-interest denied
  To save the glorious cause he deeply loved.

He gave so freely of his hard-earned store
  To save his country from the tyrant's sway,
And stood behind the rolling clouds of war
  To help the weak republic on its way.

How mighty England in her conscious power
  Gazed mocking on the little patriot band,
And proudly thought to crush them in an hour
  With all the legioned hosts at her command !

But thou didst conquor, noble hero band,—
  Invincible alone through Right and Truth,—
The scales were touched by God's unerring hand,
  Columbia stood in free exultant youth !

Then when the mighty din of conflict ceased
  Our hero still with vigor labored on
Until the young republic's strength increased,
  And that was saved which was so nobly won.

And can we mark his pitious decline
  Without a tear-drop springing to the eye,
To think that one so noble, so benign
  Should by the land he saved neglected die ?

O, let us crown him with a nation's praise !
  Tho' tardy tribute, heartfelt may it be.
All honor, patriot of the early days,
  For thy devotion rare, we render thee !

—Oriana M. Williams.

FITZ-GREENE HALLECK.

Tuckermann says: "The poems of Fitz-Greene Halleck, altho' limited in quantity, are perhaps the best known and most cherished, especially in the latitude of New York, of all American verses." In all there are but four thousand lines of coarse print published under the name of Fitz-Greene Halleck. Moreover, but very little concerning his life is accessible to the general reader; we have only its mere outline.

He was born at Guilford, Connecticut, in 1795. When eighteen years of age he went to New York City and there entered the banking house of Jacob Barker. He was associated with this house for many years and subsequently became secretary in the private office of John Jacob Astor. After the great millionaire's death he retired to his old home in Connecticut, where he died in 1867. In 1822-23 he traveled in England and on the continent.

The one glimpse we have into his private life is his great friendship for Joseph Rodman Drake. Duyckinck in his Cyclopedia of American Literature gives the following account of the beginning of this friendship: "Halleck's acquaintance with Drake arose in a poetical incident on the Battery one day when in a retiring shower the heavens were spanned by a rainbow. DeKay (a relative and great friend of Drake) and Drake were together and Halleck was talking with them. The conversation taking the turn of some passing expression of the wishes of the moment, Halleck whimsically remarked that it would be heaven for him, just then, to ride on that rainbow and read Campbell. The idea arrested the attention of Drake. He seized Halleck by the hand, and from that moment they were friends."

Although Halleck is said to have written verses very early his first literary fame was gained by the Croaker Papers, written in connection with Drake. These papers were poetical squibs dealing with the fashionable and political follies of the day. They were first published in the Evening Post in 1819 and afterwards a few of them appeared in the National Advocate. These verses are not published in the collection of Halleck's poems on account of the personalities they contain. They are, however, well worthy of a permanent place in literature. For their keen wit and finely moulded phraseology they are valuable as poetical effusions. For the references to the political history of the city of New York found in them they deserve a place in civic annals.

Among the published verses of Halleck are "Fanny," which appeared in 1812, a poem satirical in style, directed at the fashionable, literary and poetical enthusiasms of the time; "Alnewick Castle," which grew out of his trip abroad; "Connecticut," which combines his serious and lighter views; "Young America," published in the New York Ledger in 1864, a poem of some three hundred lines, rather a series of lyrics in varied measure, and "Marco Bozzaris," the best war lyric in our langunge.

In his serious poems Halleck shows the influence of Campbell while his lighter ones remind us of the best parts of "Don Juan." The one great characteristic of his poetry, however, is its music, its perfection of versification. Speaking of this a critic says: "In no poet can be found passages which flow with more sweet and liquid smoothness; but he knows very well that to make this smoothness perceived and to preserve it from degenerating into monotony occasional roughness must be interposed. This roughness often takes the form of a sudden ludicrous turn to the thought and may be seen in the following stanza of a song from "Fanny,"

"Theres music in the dash of waves
  When the swift bark cleaves their foam;
There's music heard upon her deck,
  The mariner's song of home.

When moon and starbeams smiling meet
  At midnight on the sea—
And there's music once a week
  At Scudder's balcony."

This stanza likewise illustrates the poet's evident dislike to anything having a suspicion of sentimentality.

Halleck's kindly face, the spirit of geniality pervading his work, his connection with old New York, all remind us of him who immortalized the Hudson and its traditions. And like Irving, Halleck is enshrined in many a heart. Whose blood has not tingled in his veins to the powerful music of these lines from Marco Bozzaris ?

"Strike—till the last armed foe expires ;
Strike—for your altars and your fires :
Strike—for the green graves of your sires ;
God—and your native land !"

Who has not felt the deep tenderness of his tribute at the death of his friend Drake ?

"Green be the turf above thee,
  Friend of my better days !
None knew thee but to love thee,
  Nor named thee but to praise."

A survey of Halleck's work leaves us but the one regret—that he wrote so little.

EMELIE POOLEY.

DARKNESS AND DAWN.

It is December. The sun has set, but the soft, white snow relieves somewhat the gloom of approaching night. No light shines in the little brown cottage on the hill. It stands, solitary and dark, against its white background. In one of the rooms sits an old woman. Her face is wrinkled and careworn, her shoulders are bent, her entire attitude is one of despondency. To-morrow they will take her to the poor-house. She is too old to work, too poor to pay her debts. She is simply an incumbrance to the community. Yet, think you, because she is old and poor, that she feels the disgrace less keenly than you or I might ?

Fifty years ago she was young and pretty, the belle of the town. She might to-day be living in luxury and ease if she had only thus chosen them. Yes, on just such an evening as this there was offered to her a mansion, instead of a cottage, wealth, instead of poverty, ease instead of suffering, and she refused it. Why, oh why had she done thus ?

It is night now. The gathering storm has broken. The wind shrieks around the tiny cottage, shaking it like a leaf in its grasp. She looks out of the window to the place where two graves lie under the trees, but she cannot see them save in her imagination. The first was filled when many, many years ago she laid her baby there. Oh, the awful blackness of the time which followed, when the baby feet no longer came running at her call, when no childish laughter rang through the house ! Only a week ago was the other filled. How desolate her life had been since ! No one to comfort her, no one to help. Her life is empty now, no joy, no hope, no desires—except for death.

A light glimmers in the window of the mansion in the valley. That home was full—full of comfort, luxury and ease, full of young life and hope. Two old people sat side by side, looking with content on those around them. Death had not entered there. And she might have enjoyed all this, if she only had wished it fifty years ago.

Her heart had said "no" then, and now, even in her sorrow, she would not wish it changed if it were possible. There would have been no love in the mansion for her. Suddenly her own life appears in a new light. As, in the distance, the road which we have traveled with toil and trouble appears smooth and pleasant, as the stones and rough places disappear, so the trials of those fifty years seems lighter, the road smoother, and all is aglow with the light of love. Oh, what a glorious life had hers been ! A smile of sweet content steals across her face.

And God in His mercy, lifted the veil of sorrow from her life. After the darkness, dawn,

> "And with the dawn those angel faces smile
> Which she has loved long since, and lost awhile."

LITTLE JIMMIE'S GONE ABOVE.

Broken was the family circle,
Empty was a little chair,
And the mem'ry of his prattle,
Only mocked their dark despair.

Mother's heart was filled with anguish,
And her eyes with tears grew dim,
As her loving glances lingered,
Where once sat her little Jim.

For his little place was vacant,
His knife and fork lay there,
And the mother, broken-hearted,
Sent above a fervent prayer.

He had left this happy gathering,
He had left the family group ;
He had gone upstairs with father,
Just because he'd spilt the soup.

REMINISCENCE.

"'Tis man's prerogative to dream the common royalty of peasant and king."

Fifty years ago I was an ambitious schoolboy tenderly cared for by a patient father and a loving mother. Nought of care I knew, but even then ambition had begun to stir in my soul. I built air castles; saw myself rich, learned and powerful. Soon, however, my yearnings became more practical and thought I, "when I have finished my work in High School and carried home my diploma, I will be supremely happy; Then indeed I will begin to live." That glorious day came at last, and with it the expected satisfaction? No indeed, I found to my intense surprise that my ambition had assumed larger proportions. Some of my chums had attended the Academy in the neighboring village and their brilliance and learning completely dazzled me. "If I can only go to the Academy and graduate," I thought, "then I will be contented." To the Academy I went and finally commencement day came with its honors and disappointments. The glamour was all gone. I realized that I had hardly started on the road to learning. I was but prepared to enter college.

College days came bringing their dreams. A college degree was my absorbing ambition. "Then surely I will be learned; I will have insight into life; I will have reached the goal at last." College days passed, Freshman, Sophomore, Junior, and at last the coveted Senior year was reached. But learning was yet farther away. I began to realize that man can know but little. I began to see a deeper meaning in the words of the poet,

"They told me knowledge only was divine,
And so I strove straightway to make it mine.
I read all works, held converse with the wise,
Travelled all lands and searched the distant skies.
Then standing on the edge of learning's sea
I heard the breakers calling thus to me:
'In vain, O man, my depths thou wouldst explore,
Thy soundings all lie close within the shore.' "

I began to see that we are indeed "picking up a few pebbles on the shore, while the great ocean of knowledge lies unexplored before us."

From the commencement platform I looked out into a future filled with boundless possibilities but all hope of gaining permanent satisfaction had disappeared. A profession appeared as my next ideal and this meant more years of study and preparation. At last I plunged into what I thought would be real life. I sought wealth ; I sought fame, but, as before, my ideal had disappeared into the misty future. I experienced life's burdens and responsibilities, its joys and its sorrows, but there was no change. I was still longing for something greater. Thus I have gone through life striving after ideals. But always when I thought that I had at last reached the goal, I would find my ideal far beyond.

But why should man seek satisfaction? The man whose ambition is satisfied is dead. Life is progress, movement. When ideals cease to grow the man ceases to live. Yet one cannot help wondering sometimes what it all means. If my life has a purpose, what is it? The sphynx, however, persistently refuses to solve her own riddle. We must go on stumbling blindly through life, learning by our own, and others errors. Through life I have studied mastering "Many a quaint and curious volume," yet here like Faust

"I stand with all my lore,
Poor fool, no wiser than before."

EDITORIALS.

There has been a noticable increase in the interest taken in the College Literary Societies. This is a good indication. The training given by the societies is a most important part of education. Nearly all college men will engage in public life in some form, either directly, as preacher or political speaker, or indirectly as a leader of some society or convention. Training in public speaking and in the conduct of public assemblies is the object of Literary Society work. The society can help you and your presence will be a benefit to others. Attend your Literary Society.

It is not an uncommon thing to find some of our students reading trashy novels. This habit is one of the worst that a student can form. It is, in the first place, a great waste of valuable time. No good can possibly be derived from reading such trash and the practice long continued so weakens the intellect that it becomes impossible to read works more profound. Again, it is a kind of literature better adapted to the mind of early youth than to the mind of a collegian who is expected to have some degree of learning and culture. The great masterpieces of our literature are not much more difficult to read while they are just as interesting and certainly far more valuable. There is no excuse for anyone reading "The Seven Blue Devils of Eldorado" or any of its kind while Dickens, Scott, Bulwer, Thackery and a dozen other great novelists are still unread.

"Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom." This is a favorite theme of the old Hebrew moralists. We find it again and again. "Get wisdom, get understanding : forget it not." "The wise shall inherit glory." "Happy is the man that findeth wisdom and the man that getteth understanding." "Say unto wisdom, Thou art my sister ; and call understanding thy kinswoman." "For wisdom is better than rubies ; and all things that may be desired are not to be compared to it." Wisdom and learning are twin sisters. To be very wise one must also have learning, yet learning is not always accompanied by wisdom. A man may be possessed of great erudition and yet be of little use in the affairs of actual life. Knowledge of Greek roots, or infinitesmals will not in themselves give him the tact, foresight, in short the wisdom necessary to successful conduct of real life.

Erudition may be gained by poring day and night over books, by tabulating, analysing, committing, but this process alone produces the "bookfull blockhead, ignorantly read, with loads of learned lumber in his head." Wisdom must be gained by a joint process of study and experience. The student must keep in touch with the world. He must be constantly using the power and knowledge he has gained. He must become resourceful and tactful.

COLLEGE NOTES.

The new dormitory is now under roof. It will be known as "The West College."

Rev. Henry M. Wolf, Jr., '80, alumni poet for next commencement, has accepted the honor.

Several students received invitations to the recent reception given by the girls of Wilson College.

The second preliminary Junior Debate will be held in Bucknell Hall Thursday evening, March the first.

The Ball to be given in Armory Hall on the 23rd inst. by members of the Junior class promises to be highly successful.

Miss Eveline Stanton, principal of the Institute, will be the guest of the Philadelphia Alumnæ Club at the March meeting.

Rev. Calvin A. Hare has been engaged to assist in the movement of raising funds for the new building and the endowment.

Dr. Perrine delivered an instructive address before the members of the recently organized Shakespearean Club on Thursday evening, Feb. 15.

The college girls gave their annual reception in the Institute on the evening of Feb. 16. The event was a most successful one in every respect.

The Citizens' Band, of Steelton, one of the finest organizations in the state, has been engaged to furnish the music at the 50th commencement.

The University Orchestra is now in a promising condition. Weekly practice is given on Tuesday afternoon under the direction of Dr. Aviragnet.

Judge E. A. Armstrong, of Camden, N. J., and Mr. Thomas Y. England, one of Philadelphia's leading business men, have been elected trustees of the University.

Dr. Rudolph Schwill gave a very practical talk at a recent meeting of Euepia, urging the importance of literary society training as a means of developing thoroughly modern men.

"The Weather Bureau" was the chief topic for discussion at the first February meeting of the Chemical and Physical Society. Prof. Owens' address awakened much interest in the subject.

Mr. F. M. Gilbert, a graduate of Yale and secretary of the student volunteers in the United States, delivered a series of addresses in Bucknell Hall on Feb. 3rd and 4th, setting forth the needs and claims of mission work.

A joint meeting of the two literary societies was recently held in Theta Alpha Hall. The question discussed was, "Resolved that Great Britain is justified in making war on the South African Republic." Sherman, '00, and McCracken, '02, represented Theta Alpha, and Timblin, '01, and Bidelspacher, '01, represented Euepia. The judges, Profs. Hamblin, Perrine and Edwards, decided in favor of the negative on the ground that the affirmative had not fully established their side of the question.

The Keystone Academy Alumni Club held its first meeting in the parlors of Bucknell Institute on Friday evening Feb. 9th. An organization was effected by electing the following officers: President, C. E. Bunnell; Vice Pres., L. E. Ayres; Secretary, Miss Carolyn Patterson; Treasurer, E. A. Sterling. The next meeting of the club was held in the Laboratory Tuesday, Feb. 13, at which time some splendid stereoptican views were presented by Prof. Davis and Sterling, '02. A constitution will soon be adopted so that the organization will be a permanent one with regular meetings.

ATHLETICS.

Bucknell 29—Danville 12.

Bucknell's basket-ball season was opened by a game with Danville in Tustin Gymnasium on Friday evening, Jan. 12. During the first half both teams did good team work and for a time the visiting team seemed superior. Bucknell, however, continued to play with swift accurate passes throughout the game and the results were all that could be expected.

Bloomsburg 15—Bucknell 5.

The Normal School has an exceptionally strong team and the attendance at this game was very large. Both teams did quick, hard work. At the end of the game the home team had five field goals to her credit, while Bucknell had tossed two.

Pittston 21—Bucknell 12.

The game at Pittston was played on a smooth and very slippery floor. The home team has been made up of the same players for several seasons and as a result is very strong.

Bucknell 15—Dickinson 12.

The game was played in Dickinson Gymnasium Saturday, Jan. 23. Dickinson played with much spirit from the first ; Bucknell for a time assumed the defensive. Wassell threw the basket on a foul. First half closed six to one in Dickinson's favor. During the second half three baskets were thrown by Dickinson and seven by Bucknell.

Bucknell 15—Dickinson 12.

Dickinson college played her return game, in Tustin Gymnasium, Thursday evening, Feb. 1. Bucknell's goal throwing in the first half was not very successful and Dickinson held the lead. With the call of time Bucknell immediately began an offensive game. During this half the visiting team was unable to score and the final score again stood 12–15 in favor of Bucknell.

State 11—Bucknell 6.

This most interesting game was played at State College. Our team was treated royally and Coach Hoskins was greeted with applause when he appeared before the game. It was hard, fast ball from beginning to end. State secured in all four field goals and three goals on fouls, while Bucknell threw two field goals and two on fouls. State will play a return game here on March 2.

The Cornell University team played Bucknell in Tustin Gymnasium Thursday evening, Feb. 15. Score 29-10 in favor of Bucknell.

'96. Rev. Thomas Lewis Josephs, Pastor Baptist church, Ebensburg, Pa.

EXCHANGES.

There has been considerable discussion recently as to what criticism the exchange column should contain. As a matter of fact the exchange editors do not seem to know exactly what to do. Most criticism is nothing but vapid compliment while adverse criticism is sparingly and very timidly used. There is however no cause for this hesitation in offering candid criticism, providing of course that it be unprejudiced as well as candid.

Most college editors are not afraid of criticism ; if they are they will not long remain editors. The editors must of course avoid stirring up ill feeling between the colleges. They should rather inspire friendly feeling and draw the colleges into closer bonds of intimacy.

The Allegheny Literary Monthly for January contains a number of well written articles. "Chemistry, A Creditor" is an interesting exposition of the value of chemistry to modern life. "Horace's Sabine Estate" is principally derived from Boissier and some other authorities. Yet the references have evidently been verified by the author and the study is well written. The poem "Twilight," is superior to the average work of college poets. The discussion of Fra Paoli Sarpi is well written but shows no indication of independent thought. "The Verdict" is a very entertaining little story. On the whole the editors are to be complimented on the high standard which they maintain.

"Thumb-Nails Sketches" are an interesting feature of the January Free Lance. The sketch of Hawthorne's Early Life" is also very good. The standard of this magazine is high but we consider that the side talk between "The Editor and the Critic" is carried to the extreme.

DEBATING AS A FACTOR IN EDUCATION.

EDWIN MAXEY, D. C. L., LL. D. *

The collapse of the scheme for a series of debates between the leading Universities of this country, on the question "What order of studies is best adapted to fit the average man for his duties in the world of to-day," is prolific of interesting speculation. Why did the scheme fail? Surely it was not because the question was not debatable, practical and interesting; nor yet could it have been because of an aversion on the part of students to competing for the very liberal prizes offered. I will not incur the odium incident to impiety by even suggesting that the Universities misunderstood Mr. Walker's motives and indulged for a fraction of a moment the utterly erroneous suspicion that his benevolent proposition might perchance be in part a Cosmopolitan advertising scheme in which they were to play the part of the fabled cat; neither will I hint at the equally unfounded suspicion that they looked upon Mr. Walker's detailed arrangements of times and places of debates as savoring of over-officiousness. Nevertheless they bolted, those Stubborn Presidents, and the contests will not take place. And since the world has lost the benefit to be derived from such a series of debates upon a question of so great interest, I trust that I will be pardoned for pointing out some of the defects in the system of education prevalent in our secondary schools, colleges and Universities. It is apart from my purpose and out of keeping with my ability, were I so inclined, to compile a complete catalogue of all the weaknesses of said system; I will rather content myself with noticing those which could be cured in part, if not entirely, by giving a reasonable amount of time and energy to the practice of debating.

* Dr. Maxey, Bucknell '93, winner of Leiter Prize in '98 at University of Chicago. Author of A Comparative Study of the Law of Real Property; Abridgment of the Principles of Equity; The Demagogue; Monograph on The Court of Star Chamber; Ex-President of Palatinate College; Sometime Lecturer in Illinois College of Law, etc.

The first defect in our system of education, for which I would suggest debating as a remedy, is a failure to cultivate the virtue of originality; students become to an unholy degree parasites on the body of organized knowledge as contained in text-books and presented by instructors. Protests of instructors against this avail little so long as the character of work in the carricula admits of it, and in fact too often puts a premium upon it. With the great majority of students that kind of work, and that kind only will be done which is essential to maintaining a good standing in class; and there are comparatively few studies in which one's standing will not be high, provided they absorb the facts of the text and the lectures. This is impossible in debating and the debater soon finds it out. One must form his own plan of debate and make it conform to his own aptitudes. It is true that some few, true to their parasitic nature, will fasten themselves to some set form of debate as found in Brookings and Ringwalt, Baker et al., but only a few will suffer themselves to be thus handicapped by the necessity of running their thoughts and facts into a fixed mould.

From the moment preparation begins the debater finds himself under the necessity of using his own ingenuity in locating material; in choosing; and in organizing it. Thus there are general principles in logic which assist one somewhat in much of this work, just as there are treatises which furnish valuable hints to one in writing essays and orations; but the individuality of the writer must play a large part, otherwise the product will be painfully mechanical. And what is true of the writer is doubly true of the debater as he must not only judge of the strength of his own side but also of that of the opposition, and right here is one of the great virtues of debate, viz: it creates a habit of mind of looking on both sides of a question, a virtue which far too few possess. The habit of looking upon but one side of a question—for it is a habit—and its kindred failing of jumping at conclusions which is proverbially American, cannot co-exist with the habit of research which is a necessary characteristic of the debater.

Whatever puts a premium upon individual research, and debating certainly does, goes a long distance towards developing true students. That the true student is one who investigates according to a plan of his own and not one suggested by the text or the lecturer, is recognized by all graduate schools; in fact it is the basis of all really graduate work. But it is extremely hazardous to postpone the developement of this habit till one begins graduate work, particularly as very few have the opportunity of pursuing a course of graduate study. Therefore for the great mass of students the cultivation of habits of investigation must be had in the public schools and colleges.

Yet it is not the preparation which is the severest test of a debater's originality. That which constitutes at once the severest test as well as the best training for one's original genius is found in the debate itself. Opposition is the essence of debate. Hence the debater must develop the power to meet opposition successfully. Time is an important element—as the whole method of defence may have to be reconstructed within a few minutes. Rebuttal, which is the characteristic feature of debate and distinguishes it from the oration, the lecture, the sermon etc., develops the following qualities: The power to analyze quickly and accurately the strength of the opposition and its vulnerable points; to determine quickly how the debater himself can best meet the arguments of his opponents, i. e. he must take an inventory of his own powers and of the impressions made upon the minds of the judges; then of the relative adaptability of the means at his disposal to the accomplishing of the end, and all this almost instantaneously. The most common arguments of the opposition may, it is true, be known in advance and the defence prepared along with the preparation of the argument in chief; but there is always room for surprises as well in the matter as in the form of stating it, there should always be the utmost freedom for change of tactics in order to meet the opposition in the form in which it is stated. Without the capacity to do this the debate, if debate it may be called, soon becomes lifeless and uninteresting. Few things can be more humiliating to a self-respecting debater, or more wearying to an assembly, than to be caught disregarding the argument his opponent did actually make and answering with painful accuracy and elaboration, arguments which he might have made but did not. And this is unfortunately not rare among inexperienced debaters. As there is room for almost infinite variety in the manner of presenting any broad question, anticipation as to form and matter would require an approximation to omniscience. It is the ability to meet these variations and annihilate your opponent on his own ground that gives life and interest to a debate and wins the decision. This ability is largely a result of well directed experience. While each debater develops a style of his own, these are some distinctive types which it may not be out of place to notice very briefly. There is the style of debate, which I may term Gladstonian, of simply overwhelming your adversary by a deluge of facts poured forth upon him in such a torrent that it seems to fairly sweep the ground from under him and leave him a helpless wreck upon the waves of the flood, bewildered and grasping hopelessly for the broken fragments of the structure he had builded. This is in general the style used by Webster, by John Sherman, and by Herbert Spencer. There is the opposite of this—used by Disraeli and Robert Ingersol, which is to laugh the other fellow's case out of court by the use of ingenious ridicule and sarcasm. This however is an exceedingly dangerous style and can be used by very few ; for except in the hands of an artist it makes the user and not the opposing argument ridiculous. There is another style which in my judgment, is superior to either of the above—it is a combination of them both and may be called from its master the Lincolnian style. It has the advantage of being more interesting to the average audience in that it gives room for greater variety and is better adapted to the abilities of the debater, except he be one of a few rare geniuses. If you will allow the comparison, the first is characteristically German, the second French, and the third American.

In addition to cultivating originality, debating possesses in a preeminent degree the rare virtue of compelling one to take a practical view of things. The pedant soon comes to grief in debate. He cannot hope to win because a narrow view, in others, does not appeal to the judges. The muddled metaphysics of Mediaevalism must give way to plain, practical common sense. In an age when our philosophy is tinctured with the commercial spirit the narrow theorist finds little welcome. The character of questions debated, in which there has been a marked improvement within the last 20 years, puts a premium upon practicality. If one will but look through the minute-books of debating societies or the record of inter-collegiate debates he will find that the questions for debate are no longer—Resolved: "That there is greater pleasure in pursuit than in possession" or "That hope is a more powerful incentive toward righteousness than fear," but that they are now in the vast majority of cases questions of interest to practical men such for instance as: "Shall the U. S. retain the Philippines," "Shall the city of Chicago own and operate her street railway lines," "Has the Speaker of the House of Representatives too much power." And in dealing with questions of the latter type narrowness will not be tolerated. The necessity of viewing such questions broadly in order to handle them successfully begets the habit of taking a broad, practical view of all questions. The importance of this will readily appear when we consider that the mission of the schools is no longer to prepare for the learned professions but the vastly higher mission of preparing for citizenship. And even in the learned professions pedantry and bigotry and all forms of narrowness appear at a decided disadvantage alongside of liberalism, which is an outgrowth of looking upon both sides of a question and being forced to recognize the cogency of opposing views. A debater soon learns to have a wholesome respect for one who holds views different from his own; because to be successful he must learn to see things from the standpoint of the other fellow. To seriously underestimate the strength of your adversary's position is fatal in debate as well as in war. There is equal opportunity for the display of generalship in conducting a debate as in conducting a campaign. There is the same necessity for determining the weak points in the enemy's line and of judging of the most effective order of attack and defence. And the same tactics are by no means amiss in real life.

The last matter to which I shall refer is the development of self-control, or if you please, mastery of one's own powers. And for the attaining of this I know of no exercise which gives a training equally valuable with that furnished by a well conducted debate. Systematic discussion is at once the best mirror for revealing a man's mental powers to himself and the best crucible in which to dissipate his efferescent emotionalities and leave but the crystalized grains of pure truth. The individual as well as society is not so much in need of an increase of mental force as of fully appreciating the amount on hand and of properly directing the output. The fault is not so much with the fountain as in a failure to control the flow. Training in debate cannot fail to teach economy of energy, nervous as well as mental ; and here, as elsewhere, the prerequisite to economy is the recognition of limitations and the relative effectiveness of means at one's disposal. For instance, the debater soon learns that to lose control of his temper and that to disregard the rights and feelings of others is worse than useless. In short, a debater who loses his head is ipso facto out of the contest. Here again the necessity begets habits which become constitutional, i. e. become a part of the very nerve and fiber of his being and are carried over into the other activities and relations of life.

I am aware that I have by no means exhausted the list of qualities which go to fit men for real life and for the development of which debating is preeminently adapted (for I firmly believe that it cultivates a wider range of faculties which are factors in determining one's usefulness than any other exercise), yet I trust that I have emphasized some truths which though they seem self-evident are nevertheless too often lost sight of. However, I am pleased to note that intercollegiate debates are attracting more and more general attention as can be seen by the increased space given to them in the columns of the cosmopolitan dailies. In fact it is not uncommon to accord one-tenth as much space to an intercollegiate debate as to an intercollegiate foot-ball game. And, being naturally optimistic, I entertain, with some degree of assurance, the hope that soon the press may consider an abstract of the arguments in a debate between such universities as Columbia, Harvard, Princeton, Yale, Chicago, Pennsylvania, etc., of as much importance as a mass play on tackle for two yards, a tandem-buck between centre and guard for no gain, a criss-cross play around right end for a loss of one yard. And there is the further hopeful sign that some of the graduate schools, e. g. the University of Chicago, has established regular courses in debate under some of their ablest instructors and to eliminate the excuse so often given by the student that he has no time for outside study, the same credit is given to these courses as in Coptic, Assyriac, Paleontology or Quaternions.

SHAKESPEARE'S INFLUENCE IN ENGLISH SOCIAL LIFE.

FRANK WEBER DILLON.

At some time in our lives, we have felt the influence exerted upon us by the reading of a book. The book may have been the grandest of all works—the Holy Bible, or it may have been some favorite author; and the influence upon our intellect, our thoughts, our very words and actions, possibly unnoticed at first, developed through the acquisition of kindred influences, and became a part of our existence. Such influences are often not evidenced to others until by the mingled relations of society, a similar or contrary expression brings out the hidden thoughts. Thus individual influences become social influences, broaden into national and international influences, and surviving from generation to generation, permeate and exist as settled influences in civilized life.

Again, there is the influence of acts of life presented before our eyes, many scenes arresting our attention as they are passing, others appearing in our recollection and daily talk for some time after. Who has seen Henry Irving upon the dramatic stage and forgotten his delineation of characters? Who forgets our own famed Booth and Barrett? Who has not heard of the lasting triumphs of David Garrick, the tragedian of other years? These men, and many others, interpreted Shakespeare; they presented Shakespeare's characters to people who had been reading Shakespeare since childhood, and the result was more lasting influences.

Have you not marvelled at the general acceptance of Shakespeare as an authoritative and standard work? So far back as we can remember, Shakespeare is held the model of dramatic literature, a grouping of chatacters portrayed as truly to themselves and to their associates when judged by the people of our own times as in the sixteenth century. This truthful reality to life in the dramatis personae existed and has existed until these characters have taken such a prominent place in our social world, have exercised such influence in the growth of men and principles, and have become such a recognized part of our intellectual and conversational existence in society of various degrees, that next to the Holy Bible, Shakespeare holds the prime position of influence in the Anglo-Saxon mind.

These influences of reading and knowing, of seeing and interpreting of feeling and repeating the knowledge from books, from lectures, and from stage presentations comprise in general the scope of that influence induced by Shakespeare, and augmented during the passage of time, upon English speaking society. One expressed opinion would not make it stronger now than in Elizabethan England; but I have observed that the influence of Shakespeare in America is as great, if not greater, than in his native England to-day.

Recently I was calling at the home of an elderly Scotch lady, somewhat of a Puritan in her worldly views, residing in a small town near Edinburgh. "Do you never go to a theatre, Mrs. Mackey?" asked I. "No," she answered, "at least not to the common shows that seem to please the people; but whenever Shakespeare comes along, I like to see the plays, for there always is such humanly sound sense in them." I can assure the readers that Henry Irving, or any Shakespearian celebrity does not appear at the hall in the town referred to, which goes to prove that, no matter how poorly presented, there is a popular opinion of the worth of Shakespeare's productions sufficient to draw a crowd of patrons who, otherwise, seldom attend theatricals. The dramatic season of a town in Great Britain is incomplete without one or more renditions of Shakespeare.

The major part of Shakespeare's influence is produced, not through the indirect medium of the stage and players, but through the direct contact of people with the published works. We need not digress to estimate the extent of Shakespearian bibliography, nor the countless hours of diligent study employed by scholars to reveal the wealth of subject matter for thought stored beneath the surface. Those of us who do not get below the surface thoughts are pleased and educated; those of us who conduct deeper researches are developed in strength, in lucidity, in keenness, in earnestness, in depth, and in accuracy of thought and language. Some study Homer for the beauty and diversity of the highly polished Greek literature, Cicero for the strength and vigor of the Latin speech, Moliére and Schiller for the refinement and usefulness of the foreign French and German; but Shakespeare for English embracing the essentials of correct and classic language. Shakespeare, excluding a few antiquated forms and obsolete words, is the model language and literature of the schools, and colleges, and universities in Great Britain. In England as in America, to the children, Shakespeare is entertaining; to the students, interesting and instructive; to the progressive thinkers, a fund of information concerning the formation and development of characters and a mine of knowledge in the realms of original thoughts.
